Mr. Grocott: As the evidence is overwhelming, is it too much to hope that the Secretary of State will acknowledge that the Broadcasting Act 1990 was a disaster; that morale in the industry is at an all-time low and that about one third of the work force in independent television—skilled people—has been lost since the 1990 Act was passed; that there has been a steady drift of production facilities to London away from the regions and that there has been a very worrying and, indeed, frightening concentration of ownership within the industry?

British broadcasting, which was once admired throughout the world, is now drifting inexorably towards American-style broadcasting. Is it too much to hope that the Secretary of State, who is responsible for our national heritage, will acknowledge that broadcasting, which used to be part of our national heritage and which was admired, needs to be preserved and that he needs to review the 1990 Act if he is to do that?

Mr. Brooke: I would not for a moment dream of accepting the language that the hon. Gentleman used in posing the first part of his question. Indeed, many think that the transition which has flowed through the introduction of the 1990 Act has been remarkable. As to the further substance of what the hon. Gentleman said, I think that he knows from other places that I am as concerned as he is about ensuring that we retain a critical mass in British broadcasting which, as the hon. Gentleman rightly says, is admired throughout the world.

Dr. Spink: I am amazed at the Luddite attitude of the Labour party. Does not my right hon. Friend recall that it was the Labour party which opposed the introduction of ITV——

Madam Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman should remember that we ask questions about Government policy in Question Time.

Dr. Spink: The Labour party also opposed the introduction of Channel 4. Will my right hon. Friend join me in deploring the Labour party's continued hostility towards the extension of choice?

Madam Speaker: Order. I recall calling the hon. Gentleman to order previously on these matters. Hon.

Members must question Government policy at Question Time. The hon. Gentleman has one more minute to have another go.

Hon. Members: No.

English Tourist Board (Redundancies)

11. Mr. Bayley: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage when he intends to meet the chairman of the English tourist board to discuss staff redundancies.

Mr. Sproat: My right hon. Friend and I intend soon to meet Adele Biss, the new chairman of the English tourist board and the British Tourist Authority, to discuss a range of issues, but I see no particular need to discuss staff redundancies.

Mr. Bayley: Given the disastrous state of the balance of payments, would it not make sense for the Government to put more resources into promoting tourism in Britain, to encourage our own citizens and citizens from abroad to go on holiday in our country? That would help our balance of payments.

Mr. Sproat: Well, the hon. Gentleman makes a fair point, but, as I said in answer to an earlier question, last year the number of tourists in this country rose by 9 per cent. In the first quarter of this year, it has risen by another 8 per cent. on top of that 9 per cent. We have good exchange rates for tourists, low interest rates and low inflation. The tourist industry is doing extremely well. In those circumstances and in view of the economic constraints which we face, the actions that were taken were, on balance, very sensible.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS COMMISSION

Select Committees (Staff)

27. Mr. Bayley: To ask the Chairman of the Public Accounts Commission what is the policy of the National Audit Office in respect of secondment of professional staff to assist departmental Select Committees.

Sir Peter Hordern (Chairman of the Public Accounts Commission): The policy of the National Audit Office is to respond positively to any request to second staff to a departmental Select Committee.

Mr. Bayley: Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that it would be good for the staff of the National Audit Office regularly to be seconded to departmental Select Committees so that they would see how those Committees and the Public Accounts Committee complement each other in their work? On how many occasions, with the exception of the Defence Select Committee, have professional members of the staff of the National Audit Office been seconded to departmental Select Committees?

Sir Peter Hordern: There are three staff seconded to a Select Committee at present. Besides the Defence Select Committee, staff are seconded to the Social Security and Trade and Industry Select Committees. Altogether, staff are seconded to 47 organisations at home and abroad.

NATIONAL HERITAGE

Fine Arts Heritage

12. Mr. Carrington: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what measures he is taking to ensure the retention of Britain's fine arts heritage in this country.

The Secretary of State for National Heritage (Mr. Peter Brooke): The Waverley system of export controls, grants to national museums and galleries, the National Heritage Memorial Fund and several capital tax concessions encourage the retention of Britain's fine arts heritage.

Mr. Carrington: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for that answer. Does he agree that the Waverley rules still allow too many examples of our national heritage to leave these shores? Will he consider tightening up those rules to ensure that more funds are available for retaining our prized fine arts heritage and that galleries are given more time to raise the money necessary to retain them?

Mr. Brooke: I do not think that I would take the view that there was a failing in the Waverley rules, which are responsible for particular items being considered under export licence, but I understand the concern of a number of people about the amount of funds available to meet some of the appeals which consequently arise. In the past five years, just under half the applications that have been made have been refused and the item concerned retained in this country.

Dr. Howells: Does the Secretary of State agree also that some of the money that is required to retain some great works of art in the country might be found if fewer fat salaries were paid to the culture vultures who run the administration of the arts in Britain, and the arts councils in particular?

Mr. Brooke: The accounting behind that question must necessarily be somewhat indirect, in that the Arts Council of Great Britain is not responsible for funding applications under the Waverley rules, but the Government have recently employed consultants to review the Arts Council.

Mr. Cormack: Does my right hon. Friend accept that the system can work satisfactorily only if the in-lieu system works satisfactorily? In that context, has he seen the article in today's issue of The Daily Telegraph by Mr. Godfrey Barker, which speculates about the future of the Museums and Galleries Commission? Will my right hon. Friend give an assurance that the commission will not be wound up, as it is not populated by fat cats receiving large salaries, to quote the hon. Member for Pontypridd (Dr. Howells)?

Mr. Brooke: I have seen the article to which my hon. Friend refers. I can give him a categorical assurance that there is no intention of winding up the Museums and Galleries Commission.

Film Industry

15. Ms Eagle: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what is the current level of support for the British film industry; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brooke: My Department plans to spend £24·4 million on film support in 1993-94. In the 1979-80 financial year, direct Government support for film amounted to some £12·5 million at 1993 prices. The Eady levy on box office receipts raised a further £17·25 million at 1993 prices in support of the film industry.

Ms Eagle: Will the Secretary of State acknowledge that, as was said earlier, our film industry has many great talents in all areas of production—acting, directing and so on—but that other film industries around the world are being given a great deal of Government support to attract investment mainly from America and having production happen in their countries? What is the Government's reaction to what is happening in the global film market? What will his Department do to ensure that Britain's national pool of talent is preserved and expanded?

Mr. Brooke: I salute the hon. Lady for the seriousness of her question. In terms of support in other parts of the Community—perhaps I should confine myself to that at this juncture—some of the subsidy support is going straightforwardly on liguistic grounds for the cultural side of film and ensuring that films continue to be made in specific languages. I have taken the trouble to find out what assistance is available throughout the film industry and what it is in terms of the rest of the world. Because of that, we are having the conversations that I described earlier with different sectors of the industry.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Disabled Access

28. Mr. Corbyn: To ask the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed, as representing the House of Commons Commission, what expenditure has been authorised for accessibility for the disabled to the Palace of Westminster.

Mr. A. J. Beith (on behalf of the House of Commons Commission): A comprehensive review of disabled access to the main public areas of the Palace of Westminster has recently been completed by a specialist consultant architect. That report is expected to be submitted to the Accommodation and Works Committee later this month. Cost estimates and a programme of work will be prepared once the Committee's recommendations are known. It is not possible to provide any meaningful estimate of the cost of work already undertaken as part of an ongoing policy to improve access for disabled persons.

Mr. Corbyn: It is more than 20 years since the Chronically Sick and Disabled Persons Act was passed by the House. I am sure that there are many who feel that it is inadequate that it should take so long before the House of Commons Commission produces a report on the matter. I ask the right hon. Member representing the Commission to expedite the report and publish it as quickly as possible, and recognise that the House is fundamentally inaccessible to many people who have sight difficulties, those who need wheelchair access, those who have hearing difficulties or those who simply want to come into the building to watch proceedings in their Parliament.

It is a disgrace that, in 1993, we still do not have full accessibility other than people in wheelchairs being taken in goods lifts by a different route. I ask the right hon. Gentleman to ensure that the report is not simply published and costed immediately but acted on immediately so that this disgrace and insult to the disabled of our country is ended once and for all.

Mr. Beith: It was the dissatisfaction of gaining access to the building for disabled people that led to the appointment of one of the most experienced and respected specialist architects in this field to produce the report. There will be wide support for the sense of urgency that the hon. Gentleman gives to the matter, and I will certainly communicate that to the Committee.

Mr. Matthew Banks: Does the right hon. Member representing the Commission agree that it is entirely right for the House to put its house in order before it seeks to legislate for other buildings further throughout the United Kingdom?

Mr. Beith: The hon. Gentleman advances a good principle.

Visitors

29. Mr. Flynn: To ask the Chairman of the Finance and Services Committee what financial provision has been made for improvements to the arrangements for hon. Members' visitors to Westminster.

Mr. Paul Channon (Chairman of the Finance and Services Committee): The first report from the Catering Committee on refreshment provision for line of route visitors, published on 25 May, recommends certain improvements in facilities for visitors, including a visitors' centre. These have yet to be costed, and their implementation will need to be co-ordinated with the results of the Catering Committee's current inquiry into proposals to modernise the kitchens and review the House's refreshment facilities. Specific provision will have to await any necessary approval by the relevant authorities and the House.

Mr. Flynn: Does the hon. Member agree that the House is looking for swift action on those proposals? Will he look at another matter, which causes great frustration; the absurd regulation—for a Government in the mood for getting rid of regulations—which limits the number of people in a hon. Member's party to 16? The usual number in such a party is a busload, 48. That regulation causes great frustration, irritation and extra work for hon. Members, their staff and the House of Commons staff. Can the limit be increased to 48?

Mr. Channon: The second part of the hon. Gentleman's question is not a matter for me, but I will ensure that what he has said is noted by the relevant authorities. As to the first part of his question, the difficulty about the visitors' centre is that if the Westminster Hall cafeteria is turned into a visitors' centre, alternative accommodation will have to be provided for those who currently use it—and there is a great shortage of space in the House.

Sir Anthony Grant: On the second point raised by the hon. Member for Newport, West (Mr. Flynn), what is intolerable is the inconvenience and discomfort experienced by parties we bring here to see the House of Commons and the House of Lords. To take a party round the House nowadays is like getting in between the British Lions and New Zealand All Blacks rugby scrum. Rather than increase the numbers, either there should be better organisation of the timing at which parties visit, or the numbers allowed should be smaller.

Mr. Channon: I note what my hon. Friend says. Again, I will ensure that the relevant authorities examine that matter.

Smoking

30. Mr. Austin-Walker: To ask the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed, as representing the House of Commons Commission, if he will make a statement on the policy with regard to smoking in the Palace of Westminster; and what plans he has to review this.

Mr. Beith: By long-established practice, there are certain parts of the House where smoking is not permitted, such as the Chamber, the Members' Lobby and part of the Tea Room. The Administration, Accommodation and Works and Catering Committees, and the Board of Management, have responsibility to determine whether any changes need to be made in areas for which they are responsible.

Mr. Austin-Walker: Is the right hon. Member aware of the report of the Health Education Authority on the impact of passive smoking? Is he further aware of a recent out-of-court settlement involving a local authority and a claim against it for compensation from one of its employees? Does he not think, in the light of the advice given by the Health Education Authority, that he has responsibility for the health and safety of people who work in the Palace of Westminster? Is not the House somewhat behind public authorities throughout the country, and many private employers, in the provision of a healthy and safe environment in which to work?

Mr. Beith: I am aware of all those matters. If it were left to me, smoking would be confined to a small area on the roof. The areas for which the Commission is responsible are those in which employees of the House work. I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for drawing the matter to the Commission's attention, and it will be placed on the agenda. Hon. Members generally have a responsibility to the staff they employ—including those in these buildings—for the atmosphere and conditions in which they work.

Health and Safety Checks

31. Mrs. Anne Campbell: To ask the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed, as representing the House of Commons Commission, how frequently health and safety checks are carried out on office accommodation occupied by hon. Members and staff.

Mr. Beith: Regular safety checks of offices are carried out by departmental safety representatives, staff of the Parliamentary Works Directorate and the Fire Safety Manager. In addition, the Occupational Health Manager carries out visits to Members, Members' staff and staff of the House to give advice on health and safety matters. It is not possible to provide detailed statistics on the frequency of these various checks.

Mrs. Campbell: Does the right hon. Member share my concern that we ask staff to occupy accommodation which is subject to less rigorous health and safety checks than that of outside organisations? May I draw his attention to the building which I occupy where there has not been a fire practice arranged in the past year, as far as I am aware, and where fire doors are frequently left propped open?

Mr. Beith: It is the policy of the Commission that checks and procedures in the House should be no less rigorous than those in force elsewhere. The hon. Lady's point will be drawn to the attention of the appropriate authorities.

Mr. Ian Bruce: Can the right hon. Gentleman say whether he provides written records of the inspections, so that people can see that we are complying with all the regulations that Opposition Members would like to see introduced by the European social charter?

Mr. Beith: I believe that many of the checks to which I have referred are the subject of written records. If I can give the hon. Gentleman any more information on that point, I will certainly do so.

Line of Route (Facilities)

32. Mr. Skinner: To ask the Chairman of the Finance and Services Committee what financial provision is being directed towards improving facilities for members of the public on the line of route.

Mr. Channon: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago to his hon. Friend the Member for Newport, West (Mr. Flynn).

Mr. Skinner: Yes, I was listening to that. Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that, when I took a party of disabled people round this place, we got into Westminster Hall and they could not get to a toilet there without climbing the stairs to the one in the Jubilee Room or going down the stairs to an interview room? Will he ensure that toilets are introduced that are suitable for the disabled? If it is possible for this mother of Parliaments to have 16 bars and boozers, there ought to be decent toilets for the disabled.

Mr. Channon: I have some sympathy for the point that the hon. Gentleman raises. He will have heard the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) announce a moment ago that there is to be a comprehensive study of the House and the needs of the disabled. Indeed, if the new visitors' centre is created, that will resolve the problem.

Working Hours

34. Mr. Skinner: To ask the Lord President of the Council whether he is now in a position to report on his discussions on the hours of work of the House; and if he will make a statement.

The Lord President of the Council and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. Tony Newton): Discussions are continuing through the usual channels. Meanwhile, every effort is being made to arrange the business of the House in a way which reflects the recommendations of the Jopling report.

Mr. Skinner: Is the Leader of the House aware that in 1970 there were more hours worked in this place than are worked at the present time, and that it seems that, if the recommendations go ahead, there will be more opportunities for people to go on trips, which have gone up by 10 per cent. in the intervening 23 years? There are 15 per cent. more moonlighting jobs in the 23 years. Will he, therefore, bear in mind that, if the Government go to the European Assembly and argue the toss against a 48-hour week for people outside this place, it is bordering on hypocrisy to say that hon. Members can do a 30-hour week, yet those outside the House have to do more than 48?

Mr. Newton: I will merely observe, as generously as I can manage, to the hon. Gentleman that I should be very surprised, knowing him, if he did not work at least as many hours as the difference between 30 and 48—without validating his figures—in service to his constituents in other ways. I am absolutely certain that most other hon. Members put in at least as many hours, and, indeed, many more. It is because of the desire to meet the many other requests, demands and needs of our constituents in other ways than by attending the House that there is the demand for some further reform of the hours.

As for the rest of the hon. Gentleman's question, I cannot validate the statistics that he has given, but from my recollection of the first two Parliaments of which I was a Member, from 1974 to 1979, the House did sit rather longer hours than it does now. That is perhaps some measure of the progress that has been made, and I know that this will be welcome to my right hon. Friend the Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Mr. Jopling) as some indication of the progress that has been made already by informal means.

Mr. Jopling: Does my right hon. Friend agree that it is doubtful whether any hon. Members work less than 48 hours a week? Does he recall that, in the report of the Select Committee, we pointed out that the House sits more hours and days than almost any other assembly in the western world? Does he agree that the unanimous report on an all-party basis has been lying on the table for long enough? Is it not time that the shadow Cabinet got its act together and came to a conclusion, and allowed the House reach its agreement on the basis of the report of the Select Committee, which has broad acceptance and welcome throughout the House?

Mr. Newton: I certainly endorse what my right hon. Friend says about the basis on which his Committee's important report was made. My opposite number, the right hon. Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett) is unable to be here today, but the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown), who deputises for her, will have heard what has been said and will, I hope, transmit the message.

Mr. Maxton: Does the Lord President of the Council agree that the best way to reduce the working hours in this place is to devolve a large part of the business elsewhere by the establishment of a Scottish parliament, a Welsh parliament and, if required, regional parliaments throughout the rest of the United Kingdom?

Mr. Newton: No, I do not agree with that. I agree that new opportunities can perhaps be created for debate on Scottish issues in the ways outlined by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland. We shall seek to make progress on those matters in the same way as on the report of the Jopling committee.

Mr. Dalyell: On a point of order, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: We shall take the statement first.

Flooding (Wales)

3.30 pm

The Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. John Redwood): On Thursday and Friday last, several areas of Wales experienced very heavy thunderstorms which resulted in local but very severe flooding, particularly in the Llandudno area and Cardigan. I am sure the whole House would want to join me in sending our sympathy to all those whose homes have been damaged and lives affected by the disaster.

I am pleased to say that, as a result of strenuous efforts by the various service organisations and authorities, the flood waters have now been largely drained and cleaning up is in progress. The weather forecast is for some more moderate rain but not thunderstorms, which caused last week's events. I hope—as I am sure does the House—that the weather allows the clean-up to continue unimpeded.

I am sure many hon. Members will have seen pictures of the flooding on television. I visited the areas affected at Llandudno and heard first hand accounts from residents and officials. More than 5 in of rain fell in four hours and water was flowing in sheets off the hillsides. The streams and drains just could not cope. Many properties that would not normally expect to be at risk from flooding had water flowing right through them, including the ground floor of the local hospital. Those at the bottom of the hills fared even worse as the water collected. Pumps which normally drain the area were put out of action as they were overwhelmed by huge and unexpected quantities of water. We were very fortunate not to suffer any loss of life in those incidents.

The damage has been very extensive, with 500 to 600 people in the Aberconwy area having to be evacuated from their homes. I understand that the number of properties affected in some way is very much greater, with many families living upstairs or living in apartments in upper floors of blocks. Damage to the hospitals and their equipment is going to be extensive, particularly at the Llandudno general hospital, which was worst affected. There is also considerable damage to roads and services.

In the Cardigan area, the damage does not appear quite as extensive, but is nevertheless quite severe in places. Up to 100 properties seem to be affected and a few people, mainly elderly, have had to be evacuated. I am told that there is extensive damage to highways and other utilities.

Much of the praise for dealing with matters so well must go to the emergency services, particularly the fire brigades, the local authorities, hospital staff and the National Rivers Authority. Welsh Water has also been involved. I am sure that all hon. Members would wish to join me in expressing appreciation for the dedicated work of that organisation, and for the work of the voluntary services.

Relief under the Bellwin scheme will be available to local authorities for emergency work. That will be provided as usual—85 per cent. of eligible expenditure over the threshold for each authority will be paid for. Officials are writing to authorities setting out the details of the scheme, and a copy of that letter will be placed in the Library of the House.

We are also in close touch with Gwynedd health authority to gauge the scale of problems associated with the flooding of the hospital. Once the picture is clear, the Welsh Office will provide whatever assistance is required, above the usual threshold, from the pool of finance that is held for such incidents.

I would like also to thank my right hon. Friend the Minister of State for his diligence in visiting residents affected in Llandudno and for keeping me informed following my visit.

Mr. Ron Davies (Caerphilly): I thank the Secretary of State for his statement. I should like, on behalf of the Opposition, to express sympathy to the victims of the flood and to join the Secretary of State in paying tribute to the magnificent efforts of the emergency services, the National Rivers Authority and the voluntary services.

The Secretary of State has outlined the extent of the damage. I am particularly concerned that the hands of the local authorities involved should be freed so that they may respond to the crisis and offer immediate assistance to the scores of families who will be unable for a number of months to return to their homes. Millions of pounds' worth of damage has been done. The cost to local authorities of repairs—especially repairs to houses and roads—will be considerable. I understand at this early stage that about 500 council properties have been damaged and that an initial estimate is that Aberconwy borough council is faced with a repair bill of at least £2 million. Gwynedd county council faces a repair bill estimated to be in excess of £1 million for the repair of flood damage to roads. The north Wales constabulary will have to meet a large bill for overtime, and the work of the Gwynedd and Clwyd fire brigades has added to the cost of the floods. Perhaps the Secretary of State can say what extra resources will be provided for the police and fire services.

It is estimated that about 2,500 people have been displaced as a result of the flooding. Does the Secretary of State intend to offer individual compensation for victims, especially those who are not adequately covered by personal insurance? Will he immediately contact the insurance companies to ensure that claims are dealt with quickly and without any unnecessary or bureaucratic delay?

Can the Secretary of State guarantee that the Welsh Office will provide adequate resources to cover the losses incurred by the local authorities? The last time the Bellwin formula was invoked—in December last year, in south Wales—Welsh Office aid was not forthcoming, despite the assurances of the previous Secretary of State, and the burden fell on local government, already under pressure from under-resourcing. Mid Glamorgan county council, for example, had to find £350,000, having received not a penny piece in aid from the Government.

Perhaps the Secretary of State will confirm precisely what the Bellwin formula covers. Does it include structural damage to council housing and to roads? Can the right hon. Gentleman confirm that, if the Bellwin thresholds are not reached, Government money will nevertheless be available to cover the costs in full? It is ironic that the worst-hit council—Aberconwy—is the only one in Wales to be charge-capped. It has already been required to cut its budget by £167,000, and any additional expenditure incurred by it under the Bellwin formula will mean immediate cuts elsewhere in vital public services. To restore confidence, will the Secretary of State announce today the end of charge capping?

The people of Aberconwy have the Minister of State as their local Member of Parliament. As the Secretary of State has said, his right hon. Friend has been vigorous and forthcoming on behalf of those people. Other areas of Wales, especially Dyfed, have been similarly affected. That being the case, can the Secretary of State guarantee that equivalent levels of help will be available to them and to any other areas that might suffer this misfortune in the future?

Mr. Redwood: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for agreeing with the sentiments that I expressed about the work of the voluntary services and the other bodies involved in the clean up and for his expressions of sympathy for those affected by the disaster.

I can assure the hon. Gentleman that, following legitimate claims under the Bellwin formula, assistance will be prompt. When the claims come in, I shall make it a personal concern to ensure that the money is forthcoming as rapidly as possible. Ninety per cent. of a reasonable claim will be met as quickly as may be, and the balance will be paid once the audited work has been completed. We cannot yet confirm that, because, as the hon. Gentleman has said, the amount involved will be many millions of pounds. Obviously, we await a proper assessment. If many millions of pounds of extra revenue expenditure are incurred, then the formula allows us to meet those claims. All claims under the scheme will be considered promptly, and officials will follow up, if there are uncertainties with the local authority, to ensure the scheme's smooth operation.

The scheme covers all reasonable revenue expenditure incurred in putting matters right in the immediate clean up, and temporary accommodation for people who have been affected.

Of course, the scheme will cover the overtime of the public services that the hon. Gentleman mentioned.

As for individual compensation, I believe that there is to be a mayoral appeal. I will take up the hon. Gentleman's point about the speed of insurance claims, and I will make a point of ensuring that the insurance companies know that we want the claims settled as promptly as possible. It is correct that most people are insured; in such cases the insurance companies should be forthcoming with the money—that is why people insure against this sort of eventuality.

The capping of Aberconwy council is a separate issue. I shall look at it shortly; I have not yet come to a decision. When I have, I will notify the House in the usual way.

I can assure the House that any other affected area will get similar treatment. If a local authority elsewhere in Wales incurs this sort of expenditure, it too can claim, and if it has legitimate claims they will be met under the Bellwin formula, just as surely as they will be in my right hon. Friend's constituency.

Mr. Rod Richards (Clwyd, North-West): Is my right hon. Friend aware that his visit to the flooded areas of north Wales was greatly appreciated by everyone there, particularly because it showed, at a very early stage, his commitment to the people of Wales?

Mr. Redwood: I am grateful for my hon. Friend's kind remarks. I certainly learned a lot from the visit. It made me aware of just how quickly we need to get this operation into effect.

Mr. Alex Carlile (Montgomery): May I join the Secretary of State and the hon. Member for Caerphilly (Mr. Davies) in their praise for the emergency services, who did a marvellous job, and for others? I understand that members of the health authority were on their hands and knees mopping up in Llandudno general hospital immediately after the flooding.

I also ask the Secretary of State to recognise the great stoicism and courage that local residents have shown in facing up to the emergency.

I understand from contacts with Aberconwy district that many local people are reluctant to apply for social fund loans because they believe that they will be hounded to repay them when they are unable to do so. Will the right hon. Gentleman assure the House and local residents that he will contact the Department of Social Security to ensure that there is great forbearance in pursuing the repayment of loans, especially by pensioners, many of whom have had to cut insurance from their budgets? Will he also investigate whether the fund or the Welsh Office can provide grants that would enable people to meet essential expenditure which they otherwise cannot afford?

I also join the hon. Member for Caerphilly in urging the Secretary of State to ensure that this disaster is taken into account when he considers what to do about the capping of Aberconwy council.

Mr. Redwood: The hon. and learned Gentleman is right to say that many residents in the affected area were responsible for acts of heroism and hard work in dealing with the immediate aftermath of the disaster. Like him, I wish to praise their efforts.

I am also delighted that many people in the health authority did such an excellent job, so that by the time I visited the hospital, not many hours after the flood, it was for the most part clean, thanks to their great efforts.

The hon. and learned Gentleman may also like to know that the Territorial Army has played a leading part in the clean-up operations. I believe that today a platoon of the Staffordshire regiment will also assist. That can be covered under the arrangements that I have described for the money.

I will look into the question of social fund loans. Like the hon. and learned Gentleman, I would not want attempts to enforce repayment from those who clearly cannot repay, especially if their home lives have been badly disrupted by the disaster.

Mr. Jonathan Evans (Brecon and Radnor): May I thank the Secretary of State for his statement and for his visit to north Wales? He will know, as I do, that some of the most poignant images that we have seen are those of people who have, unfortunately, not made insurance arrangements and who appear to have lost everything. In the circumstances, I ask my right hon. Friend closely to examine what can be done to assist those people. The people of north Wales have the sympathy of all my constituents.

I have been in touch with the chief executives of each of my councils today. They have not been so badly affected by the heavy rain of the past few days, but my right hon. Friend will be aware that there has been an embankment slippage on the heart of Wales line, which has brought back images of the Glanrhyd rail disaster.

As a by-product of those events, will my right hon. Friend confirm that he will speak to his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport to ensure that steps are taken under the railway privatisation arrangements to ensure that if, flooding damages the permanent way proper arrangements will be in place to meet the cost of its reinstatement?

Mr. Redwood: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for making that important point, which I shall take up with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport. It is important that such facilities are properly and regularly inspected and that any remedial works are undertaken. That is also true of tips and other sites where there could be movement in heavy rains, and I shall ensure that they are properly inspected. They are inspected regularly.

I appreciate that, although my hon. Friend's constituents were not as badly affected as the people I described—especially those in Llandudno—they also suffered from the storms and I express my sympathy with them, as does my hon. Friend. As to those who are uninsured, I believe that a mayoral fund may help, and I shall examine the terms of that fund to find out whether the Government ought to do anything more.

Mr. Barry Jones (Alyn and Deeside): Were there any other recent floods prior to the distressing series of floods in the Llandudno area? Also, before those floods, had the Welsh Water authority been asked to invest in improving the infrastructure to guard against flooding?

Mr. Redwood: As the hon. Gentleman knows, there have been previous cases, which the House debated, for example, when the formula was similarly brought into operation. As a result of that, and of good housekeeping, there is a regular review of flood prevention and anti-flood devices. The Government, the water authorities and the National Rivers Authority have been involved. The work continues, and if more schemes are forthcoming which are suitable for investment, I would be happy to be associated with them.

Mr. David Harris (St. Ives): As someone whose constituency was severely hit by flooding earlier in the week, I join in the sympathy expressed by the House to all those who suffered in Wales. However, drawing on his experience as the Minister with responsibility for local government, can my right hon. Friend give an assurance that the help that the Government are rightly giving the people of Wales through the Bellwin rules will be applied equally, not just to other councils in the Principality, but to councils in England, and that the rules apply in England and Wales? If he is unable to give the answer, could he——

Madam Speaker: Order. There are procedures by which the hon. Gentleman can put his question to the appropriate Minister. He knows full well that we are dealing with a Welsh issue and with the Secretary of State for Wales. I will not allow a question to be put to a Minister who has no responsibility. I am sure that the Minister would like to answer the first part of the question.

Mr. Redwood: I am grateful, Madam Speaker, and I understand my hon. Friend's wish to ask such a question. My hon. and right hon. Friends in the Department of the Environment would tell my hon. Friend that no request has been received from any Cornish council. They would consider one if it were made. In the case of Wales, we were in touch with councils which clearly wanted the Bellwin formula to be brought into operation. We have responded rapidly for that reason, and the need was very great.

Mr. Nick Ainger (Pembroke): I too join in the congratulations to the emergency services during the past two or three days. Their work has been excellent and, when we talk about compulsory competitive tendering, it is important to remember the work that they have done in very difficult circumstances.

Can the Secretary of State confirm that in Dyfed's case, for instance, the Bellwin formula will not be activated and therefore the county council will not get a penny piece of grant aid unless it spends more than £550,000 in the next two months? It would be wrong if, as a result of spending less than is allowed under the Bellwin formula, other services has to be cut to pay for repairs to bridges and roads in the county. The Bellwin formula needs to be reformed so that it refers not just to 85 per cent. grant aid above the threshold but to 85 per cent. of all expenditure incurred.

Mr. Redwood: I do not agree with the hon. Gentleman. Perhaps the formula works for districts in his area and not for the county. We shall have to see how much damage was done and how much expenditure is necessary. It is normal for councils to have some contingency provision in their budgets, and this is exactly the type of awful contingency for which such provisions are made. Of course, contingency funds are larger for large counties than for small districts. The Bellwin scheme deals with those large sums relative to the local authority's budget for which the authority could not have been expected to make provision itself. If that is the case in the hon. Gentleman's area at council or district level, Bellwin money will be available in exactly the way that I hope he would want.

Mr. Toby Jessel (Twickenham): Apart from insurance, to which my right hon. Friend has referred, has he had time to consider the anxieties of people in Wales whose houses might suffer long-term damage from waterlogging? In view of my hon. Friend's extensive environmental experience, would he consider issuing advice to householders on how best to protect wood, plaster and electrical wiring in their houses in the long term?

Mr. Redwood: I shall discuss that matter with my officials to see whether there is anything that we can do by way of extra guidance. The health authority has already issued guidance on immediate health issues; and my hon. Friend makes another important point about the long-term stability of the housing stock.

Mr. Elfyn Llwyd (Meirionnydd Nant Conwy): No doubt on his journey from Llangollen to Llandudno the Minister did not travel by rail. I remind him that not one train is running there today and that some damage has been occasioned to the railway line. Will he raise that matter immediately with the Secretary of State for Transport, so that the line is not further run down? I also pay tribute to the relief workers of Gwynedd county council and Conwy borough council and people in the emergency services.

I have two important questions for the Minister. First, similar flooding has occurred in parts of Llandudno in the past five years. Why? Secondly, what lessons have the Government learnt from the similar incidents of Towyn-Abergele? The real tragedy of that situation was that many people, especially the elderly, were uninsured. To leave matters to a mayoral fund is piffling and is not the answer. The Government must act now. They cannot wait for pensioners to chip into a mayoral fund. That is beyond belief. I respectfully suggest to the Minister that now is the time to take the bull by the horns.

Mr. Redwood: I am assured by my right hon. Friend the Minister of State that the main north Wales railway line is functioning. Of course my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport will be interested in the branch lines to which the hon. Gentleman refers. The hon. Gentleman will be interested to know that I went to and from Cardiff today by rail; I use rail wherever possible for my journeys.

The hon. Gentleman spoke about similar flooding in the past, but I do not think that the circumstances were entirely the same. It is difficult to design a drainage system that will cope with more than 5 in of rain in three hours. That results in a staggering amount of water, and it led to the great problems that we have seen. We will look at what happened to see whether anything can be done to prevent a future recurrence of the problem. The sheer weight and scale of the water was massive, making it difficult for any system to cope, even including quite new pumping systems.

Dr. Kim Howells (Pontypridd): The hearts of my constituents go out to people in other parts of Wales who have suffered flooding: my constituents know about it only too well as it happened to them last winter. Like me, they will also hope that the householders who have been mentioned in the Chamber will be treated better than the householders of Pontypridd, many of whom were uninsured and had to make do with stoicism, about which the Secretary of State spoke earlier, in putting their houses right. If it had not been for the sterling work undertaken by Mid Glamorgan county council, Taff Ely borough council and the National Rivers Authority, those people's homes would still be flooded and in a mess.

Mr. Redwood: I understand the hon. Gentleman's point. I am glad that he thinks that the arrangements today are more satisfactory than was the case for Pontypridd. It is our intention to do everything that we reasonably can to ensure a smooth clean-up and get people back to their homes as quickly as possible.

Mr. Alan Williams (Swansea, West): Is not it a fact that the Bellwin formula has nothing to do with providing help to people who need the aid but is only a fig leaf to hide the inadequacy of what the Government intend to offer people in need? How much has been paid in Wales under the Bellwin formula over the past five years?

Mr. Redwood: I do not have that figure to hand. I shall write to the right hon. Gentleman with it. The Bellwin formula is not a fig leaf. It is important assistance and it takes care of the bulk of the extra costs that local authorities incur as a result of a disaster of that nature. Where we have direct responsibility, as in the case of the hospital, that too will be put right at public expense through central taxpayer's reserves from the health authority. We must do everything in our power to put those things right. The right hon. Gentleman's charge is simply incorrect.

Mr. Paul Murphy (Torfaen): Does the Secretary of State agree that we must be sceptical about the views of experts who said at the weekend that floods occur once every century? The last time that we had to deal with this problem was not a century ago but six months ago. We asked his predecessor then for a thorough, proper and independent survey of the river banks and coastlines of Wales, to be conducted by the Welsh Office, local authorities and the National Rivers Authority. Does the Minister agree that that is the only long-term measure for the prevention of flooding and that that is the answer to the problems that we have seen over the past few days?

Mr. Redwood: I shall look thoroughly at what happened to see whether something can be done to make a recurrence of that awful event less likely. However, I shall repeat what I said earlier: the amount of rainfall was unprecedented. It was extreme. It was difficult for the drains to handle the water—even had they been considerably larger, it would still have been difficult for them to handle it—because of its sheer force and intensity.

Points of Order

3.57 pm

Mr. Paul Tyler (North Cornwall): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. The House will know that parts of Cornwall and Devon have suffered similar devastation from flooding in recent days, including the weekend. I understand that the local authorities concerned are making an application to the Department of the Environment this afternoon as there has been not only devastation to property and roads but tragic loss of life.

I wonder whether you, Madam Speaker, have had an application from Ministers at the Department of the Environment to make an equal and comparable statement to the one made this afternoon by the Secretary of State for Wales? As yet, we have had no statement and no reassurance. People in the west country feel that there are double standards in this matter. If there has been an application, will there be a statement tomorrow?

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Tony Baldry): Further to that point of order, Madam Speaker, I hope that I can be helpful.

I am aware that heavy rain and strong winds have caused severe flooding in many parts of England, including Cornwall. I am sure that the whole House wishes to express its condolences to the families of those who have died as a consequence of the flooding. However, as of yet, no requests for financial assistance have been received by——

Madam Speaker: Order. Is the Minister making a statement? I thought that he was responding to a point of order. The hon. Gentleman is placing me in some difficulty. I cannot allow a statement. If the hon. Gentleman is responding to a point of order, will he do so briefly?

Mr. Baldry: Further to that point of order, Madam Speaker. If local authorities in Cornwall make applications under the Bellwin rules, they will be considered promptly and carefully. As yet, no application has been made.

Mr. Matthew Taylor (Truro): On a point of order, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: Order. I think that the House is fully aware that the original question put to me concerned whether I had been told by a Minister that the Government were seeking to make a further statement on the flooding that, sadly, has affected many parts of the country. The answer to the point of order is that I have not been told by a Minister that he wishes to make a statement. The Minister has done his best to be helpful in this matter. I cannot allow questions to the Minister.

Mr. Taylor: On a point of order, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: Is it a different point of order?

Mr. Taylor: Yes.

Madam Speaker: In that case, I will hear it.

Mr. Taylor: Thank you, Madam Speaker.

I think that the Minister has just attempted to make a statement. Would it not be appropriate for him to make a full statement to the House, and to answer questions?

Madam Speaker: I have already dealt with that point: I have said that the Minister was not making a statment, but trying to be helpful in response to a point of order. It has been made clear to Ministers that hon. Members want a statement to be made; we must leave it at that.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. Are you aware that the Sunday lunches of many of your parliamentary colleagues were greatly enhanced by your cheerful and elegant choice of records on "Desert Island Discs"?

May I ask why we were allowed only five minutes, rather than 10, for questions to the Lord President of the Council, for the first time in living memory? I had expected to be able to raise the cases of Simon Dunn—the prisoner who has been taken at Umm Qasr—and Kai Sondermann. In the context of the terrible things that have been happening to Iraqi babies—which I outlined on Friday, at columns 576-82—should not a Government statement be made about the cases of those unfortunate prisoners, the whole question of sanctions and the need for discussions about sanctions to take place with Iraq before anything is done about the prisoners?

Madam Speaker: The hon. Gentleman is very cunning. Many of us are very sad that his question was not reached today, but he must not try to make that a point of order for me. The length of time allowed for Ministers to answer questions is a matter for the usual channels, not for me.

I thank the hon. Gentleman for his earlier remarks. I hope he noted that I chose to take the Mace with me to the desert island: that might have given the House a few more days' recess until I was found.

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. This is a separate point of order, of which I gave you notice, about a matter affecting hon. Members' right to intervene in immigration cases—a most important right, which you will undoubtedly have exercised on numerous occasions in your constituency.

On Friday night, I was informed that a constituent, Mrs. Abida Parveen, had been arrested, and was to be deported to Pakistan on Saturday. I contacted Bradford police at 10.30 pm; however, the custody officer refused to disclose details of the arrangements for her deportation, the name or telephone number of the immigration officer concerned, the contact telephone number for her solicitor or the duty solicitor, and even information about the arrangements that were being made.

It is clear that the existing arrangements for hon. Members to make representations in emergency immigration cases—especially those concerning threatened deportation—have broken down. Will you consider—I emphasise the word "consider"—convening a Speaker's conference of interested parties in the House with the Home Office, the immigration service and the police, to ensure that new arrangements can be devised to give hon. Members a proper opportunity to intervene promptly and effectively, with the full co-operation of all the agencies concerned?

Madam Speaker: The hon. Gentleman is a long-standing Member of the House. He is raising with me a matter of Government policy. As a long-standing Member of Parliament, he knows that he could raise the matter directly with the Minister concerned by various methods and procedures, and on various occasions, and receive the full reply that I know he seeks.

Mr. Madden: Further to that point of order, Madam Speaker. As you have rightly said, the existing arrangements are the Home Secretary's responsibility. It is now self-evident to many hon. Members that those arrangements have broken down. As the House constitutes the thin line between constituents' being deported—in many cases, unfairly and unlawfully—and their being given their full right to make representations, along with hon. Members, I am now appealing to you, Madam Speaker. I am asking whether you, as guardian of the rights of hon. Members and those of the House, will convene a conference which, hopefully, will be able to reach a conclusion and devise proper arrangements for hon. Members to make the representations that I seek to secure.

Madam Speaker: The hon. Gentleman has every right and opportunity to make representations through the usual procedures of the House. I cannot specify to him across the Floor of the House the procedures under which he could do so. If he wishes to come and see me, I shall be as helpful as possible. It is a matter for the hon. Gentleman. This is an individual case, and we must all represent our constituents to the best of our ability and in the way that the House allows us. I can take it no further at this stage.

Mr. David Harris (St. Ives): I am sorry to raise the question of flooding again, but could I——

Madam Speaker: Order.

Mr. Harris: It is a point of order.

Madam Speaker: That is better.

Mr. Harris: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. Can you help me with a difficulty facing the House? As you will remember, at Question Time I attempted to ask the Secretary of State for Wales whether what he was announcing for Wales was the equivalent of the system for England. You rightly said that he was not responsible for the Bellwin rules as applied to England. If I put the same question to an Environment Minister, he would no doubt say that he was not responsible for the rules in Wales.

What I and my parliamentary colleagues from Cornwall in particular are concerned to do, in the light of the flooding that we have just suffered, is to establish that the ground rules of what has been announced today by the Secretary of State for Wales also apply to England. Can you advise me, Madam Speaker, on how I can get an answer to that question?

Madam Speaker: The hon. Gentleman has been here a long time. He knows that he can table a written or oral question. If he has any problem with procedure, he should apply to the usual channels, or come to see me and I shall be pleased to advise him.

STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS, &c.

Madam Speaker: With permission, I shall put together the motions relating to statutory instruments.

Motion made, and Question put forthwith pursuant to Standing Order No. 101(3) (Standing Committees on Statutory Instruments, &c.).

OVERSEAS GOVERNMENTS (DEBTS)

That the draft Debts of Overseas Governments (Determination of Relevant Percentage) (Amendment) Regulations 1993 be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT (FEES)

That the draft Department of Transport (Fees) (Amendment) Order 1993 be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.—[Mr. Wood.]

Orders of the Day

Housing and Urban Development Bill

(changed to LEASEHOLD REFORM, HOUSING AND URBAN DEVELOPMENT BILL)

Lords amendments considered.

Ordered,

That the Lords amendments to the Housing and Urban Development Bill be considered in the following order, namely: Nos. 1 to 22, 219 to 226, 23 to 38, 227, 39 and 40, 228 to 231, 41 to 48, 232 to 244, 49 and 50, 245 to 257, 51 to 77, 258, 78 to 83, 259 to 264, 84 to 90, 265, 91 to 163, 266, 164 to 215, 267 to 278, 216 to 218 and 279 to 283.—[Sir George Young.]

THE RIGHT TO COLLECTIVE ENFRANCHISEMENT

Lords amendment: No. 1, in page 3, line 17, leave out ("and") and insert ("or").

4.11 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Tony Baldry): I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Madam Speaker: With this we shall consider the following Lords amendments: Nos. 5, 8, 9, 13, 20, 32, 36, 45, 46, 51, 53, 56 to 58, 60, 68, 75, 77, 78, 84, 94, 105, 106, 108 to 110, 116, 125, 129 to 131, 133, 134, 136, 140 to 142, 144, 148 to 152, 154 to 156, 160 to 162, 216, 219, 221, 223, 229, 231, 236 to 239, 243, 255, 256, 258, 260, 261, 263, 264, 271, 273 and 277.

Mr. Baldry: This is a large group of amendments. They are almost entirely drafting and technical amendments, which are required to clarify some provisions, correct cross-references and amend minor defects. They were made in response to comments received and after further consideration of the Bill elsewhere. They ensure that the Bill's provisions work more effectively. I do not intend to take the time of the House in discussing any of them individually. However, I shall mention amendment No. 216, which changes the name of the Bill to "Leasehold Reform, Housing and Urban Development Bill".

The original short title of the Bill was drafted to be as short as possible so that it could be easily referred to in other Acts and subordinate legislation and by anyone seeking to use its provisions. However, it was argued in another place that the title was not helpful as it did not refer to the leasehold provisions that take up the whole of part I and are of great interest to many people. The new title reflects the structure of the Bill and makes it clear that it covers important reforms to the leasehold system.

Mr. John Battle (Leeds, West): We are faintly surprised that the Government decided to change the title of the Bill. The Bill's provisions for housing have been residualised and it will not create a single new home, so perhaps it is not surprising that the Government have decided to change the emphasis to leasehold enfranchisement.

I do not wish to open a debate on the issue, but I must say that the Bill creates expectations for the 750,000 leaseholders but, as I am sure will be revealed in our debate and as it has been revealed in another place and in Committee, it will short-change many leaseholders who think that they will be enfranchised but who will discover that they will not receive franchise entitlement.

The low rent test still appears in all the amendments, despite all the attempts in the House and in the other place to change it. That will disqualify many of those 750,000 people from leasehold enfranchisement. The Bill claims to give rights to leaseholders—even its title has now been changed to stress leasehold enfranchisement—but, in practice, many people will be disappointed. In practice, and on the face of the Bill, the rights that were promised in the consultation paper will be dashed on the rocks of expediency by the Government and people will not receive their entitlements.

The Labour party believes that restoring those rights is one way in which the Government can fulfil their original pledge. Only a few hours ago, the Prime Minister said that he would honour all the Conservative party's manifesto commitments, yet many of the rights promised in the original title of the Bill have been removed. In other words, the Bill will not do what the Government claimed. It will short-change many leaseholders, and a change of title will not cover up that.

Question put and agreed to.

PREMISES EXCLUDED FROM RIGHT

Lords amendment: No. 2, in page 5, line 18, leave out from ("are") to ("and") in line 19 and insert

(i) occupied, or intended to be occupied, for residential purposes, nor

(ii) comprised in any common parts of the premises;")

Madam Speaker: With this, we will take Lords amendment No. 3.

The Minister for Housing, Inner Cities and Construction (Sir George Young): I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

The amendments are intended to clarify the definition of non-residential parts of premises so that the eligibility of buildings can be more easily determined.

Question put and agreed to.

Lords amendments Nos. 3 to 5 agreed to.

Clause 5

QUALIFYING TENANTS

Lords amendment: No. 6, in, page 6, line 7, at end insert—

("(2A) Subsection (1) does not apply where the immediate landlord under the lease is a registered housing association and all the flats in the premises are—

(a) particularly suitable, having regard to their location, size, design, heating systems and other features, for occupation by persons of pensionable age, and

(b) are occupied by persons of pensionable age on physically disabled persons, and

(c) have special facilities which include the services of either a resident warden or a non-resident warden and a means for calling them.")

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House doth disagree with the Lords in the said amendment.—[Mr. Baldry.]

Mr. Battle: I am surprised that the Government tabled the motion. Lords amendment No. 6 omits sheltered housing and accommodation that is specially adapted for disabled and elderly people. I should have thought that it is a common sense and reasonable amendment that the Government would accept. In all other cases, the Government take away the rights of leaseholders left, right and centre by tightening the framework of the Bill, but in this case—I press the Government to give their estimate of the number of flats that are affected—when common sense would suggest that there should be an exemption to ensure that sheltered housing and specially adapted dwellings remain, they have decided to ensure that there is a right to enfranchisement. They would do far better to address the real needs of people in flats and houses who will be denied enfranchisement by the strict low-rent test and other measures, including some that they accepted in the other place.

Interestingly, when the amendment was moved in the other place, there were no Tellers, because the Chief Whip and the Deputy Chief Whip were not in the Chamber when a vote was sprung on the Government. In that sense, the Government lost it without even opposing it, yet now they come back to the House to try to repair the results of their incompetence in the other place.

It is surprising that housing association schemes are now included. The amendment would exclude leasehold schemes for elderly people from leasehold enfrachisement where the freeholder is a registered housing association. Under the Bill as drafted, leaseholders of housing association sheltered housing schemes can exercise enfranchisement where they own 100 per cent. of the leasehold interests.

The amendment seeks to exclude sheltered housing from the enfranchisement provisions. It would affect only a tiny number of schemes where the association had not received housing association grant. For housing association grant-funded schemes, the association is required to retain 20 per cent. of the equity. Under clause 6, enfranchisement would not then apply. Instead, under chapter II, the individual leaseholder would have an automatic right to renew the lease, but many housing associations have undertaken sheltered housing schemes without using housing association grants.

The amendment would affect such schemes. The proposal was not made lightly by the National Federation of Housing Associations, on behalf of all housing associations. It argues that, if the Government now decide to vote against the Lords amendment, the Bill would discriminate against elderly and disabled people, for whom special provision has been made.

Faced with the needs of an aging population, housing associations that have undertaken leasehold schemes to provide sheltered housing for elderly people are most concerned that, if leasehold enfranchisement applies to such housing it could, in time, lead to the loss of the warden service and other special provisions simply because they cost money. Ultimately, those properties could be sold to non-elderly buyers, which in turn would reduce the overall supply of sheltered accommodation at precisely the time when the need for it is increasing. According to Government figures, by the year 2001 there will be 1 million people in Britain over 85. The need for sheltered accommodation is increasing and the Government's petty approach, which will diminish stock, is damaging.

Why are the Government making such a proposal? I do not think that they have an argument. The amendment was carefully drafted to ensure that only those schemes that genuinely provide sheltered housing are included. What is more, the wording of paragraph 10 of schedule 5 to the Housing Act 1985—the Government's own housing legislation—excludes sheltered housing from the right-to-buy provision precisely because it would diminish the amount of housing stock in Britain at a time when we need a supply of sheltered housing to rent. As the amendment mirrors almost exactly the wording of paragraph 10 of schedule 5 to the 1985 Act, it seems illogical, irrational and petty that the Government should now turn against it.

It may be suggested that restrictive covenants could do the job as well as the amendment, but they could be changed by agreement between the new freeholder and leaseholders once the freehold has passed to another body. The retention of sheltered housing for its original purpose cannot therefore be guaranteed by those restrictive covenants. That could be achieved only by excluding such housing from the Bill's provisions.

I challenge the Minister—before he pushes the motion through on the nod—to tell the House how many properties will be affected and how many people will be enfranchised by the provision. He should compare and contrast that with the number of people who will be unfairly excluded from leasehold enfranchisement by the restrictive clauses that the Government have built into the Bill, and also by the further restrictive clauses that the Government have accepted from the other place.

If the clause is accepted, and housing associations' sheltered housing schemes are excluded from enfranchisement, elderly leaseholders would automatically receive the right under chapter II of the Bill to renew their lease in line with leaseholders in housing association grant-funded schemes. It could be argued—I should be interested to hear the Minister's opinion—that that right, rather than outright enfranchisement, would be more beneficial to the elderly people concerned. It would guarantee that the amount of sheltered and specially adapted accommodation to rent could be expanded.

Mr. Baldry: I do not know whether the hon. Gentleman has had the opportunity to discuss the amendment with organisations such as Age Concern since it was debated in the other place.

Since the amendment was accepted in the Lords, we have received representations from organisations such as Age Concern and the Association of Retired Persons, which have expressed their dismay at the exemption from enfranchisement of such developments. The amendment is clearly discriminatory, and that is their concern. The amendment deliberately discriminates against the elderly. There is no fundamental reason why developments for the elderly and disabled that are owned by housing associations should be excluded from the scope of enfranchisement.

The hon. Gentleman has expressed a concern—also put forward by the National Federation of Housing Associations—that, once the freehold has been bought, flats may be sold to people who are neither old nor disabled. That is a misunderstanding. Flats would not necessarily move out of the sheltered housing sector. Enfranchisement does not affect the terms of leases, so any restrictive covenants which might, for instance, specify that the flats were to be let only to the elderly, will remain in force after the freehold has been bought. Such covenants in the leases of non-participants cannot be changed without the agreement of both parties to the lease. Those would include housing associations.

[Mr. Baldry]

The Lords amendment clearly discriminates against the elderly. It has met with vehement opposition from organisations such as Age Concern, and I urge the House to disagree with it.

Question put, That this House doth disagree with the Lords in the said amendment:—

Question accordingly agreed to.

After Clause 5

Lords amendment: No. 7, insert the following new clause—

Qualifying tenants satisfying residence condition—

(".—(1) For the purposes of this Chapter a qualifying tenant of a flat satisfies the residence condition at any time when the condition specified in subsection (2) is satisfied with respect to him.

(2) That condition is that the tenant has occupied the flat as his only or principal home—

(a) for the last twelve months, or

(b) for periods amounting to three years in the last ten years, whether or not he has used it also for other purposes.

(3) For the purposes of subsection (2)—

(a) any reference to the tenant's flat includes a reference to part of it; and

(b) it is immaterial whether at any particular time the tenant's occupation was in right of the lease by virtue of which he is a qualifying tenant or in right of some other lease or otherwise;

but any occupation by a company or other artificial person, or (where the tenant is a corporation sole) by the corporator, shall not be regarded as occupation for the purposes of that subsection.

(4) In the case of a lease held by joint tenants—

(a) the condition specified in subsection (2) need only be satisfied with respect to one of the joint tenants; and

(b) subsection (3) shall apply accordingly (the reference to the lease by virtue of which the tenant is a qualifying tenant being read for this purpose as a reference to the lease by virtue of which the joint tenants are a qualifying tenant).")

Sir George Young: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Madam Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss also Lords amendments Nos. 16, 18, 19, 22, 54, 59, 61, 63, 64, 66, 70, 222 and 225.

Sir George Young: I shall speak briefly to the amendments and then speak again if there are any issues that the House wishes to raise.

When the Bill left the House for another place, it contained no test to residence on qualifying tenants that had to be satisfied before either of the new rights—collective enfranchisement or individual lease renewal—could be exercised, but there was a strong feeling that there should be a residence qualification. Two groups of amendments constitute the Government's response. Amendments Nos. 54, 59, 61, 63, 64, 66 and 70 introduce a residence test that qualifying tenants will have to satisfy before they can obtain a new lease under the provisions of chapter 2. We have followed the principle of the test provided for in the 1967 Act that is applied to individual tenants of houses.

The remaining amendments in the group introduce a residence test for collective enfranchisement. Basically, the new test requires half of the participating tenants to be residents. The new test is intended to prevent a majority of non-resident long leaseholders from purchasing their landlord's interests. Our declared policy is that flat owners should be able to gain ownership and control of their blocks. The test does not seriously interfere with that objective but clearly signals that flat owners cannot take over if only a minority of the participants live or have lived for significant periods in their flats. That amendment will be appreciated by hon. Members on both sides of the House.

In another place, Lord Williams, representing the Labour party, said that he had sympathy with the idea of a resident test that supported the principle that companies and absentee landlords should not be allowed to take control of what he called "real people". Lord Strathclyde confirmed that these amendments will not disfranchise many blocks but will exorcise the spectre of control by an absent minority.

Mr. Battle: I congratulate the right hon. Gentleman on his recent appointment, and wish him well. It is fair to say that he is the longest serving Minister in his post. I hope that his new appointment will take him into the inner sanctum of Government and perhaps a little closer to the Treasury, so that he can apply some real pressure for housing resources in the future.

[Mr. Battle]

We now move to the group of amendments, headed by amendment No. 7, that start to tighten the rights of leaseholders with regard to enfranchisement. When leaseholders examine the Bill, they will discover that the reforms are not as substantial or as far-reaching as they expected.

Sir Jerry Wiggin (Weston-super-Mare): Very good.

Mr. Battle: That shows that there is still a difference between those Conservative Members who agree with the Government's manifesto commitment to give 750,000 leaseholders real enfranchisement and those Conservative Back Benchers who are fighting a rearguard action in another place and in this House to take away that right. Leaseholders will know that they have been short-changed; their expectations of leasehold reform have been raised—it is there on the face of the Bill—but in practice, the hedging and disqualifications will mean that those 750,000 leaseholders will not get enfranchisement after the Bill receives Royal Assent.

The Bill is hedged with disqualifications, and the low rent test is the primary one. A Labour Government will abolish that test. Throughout the passage of the Bill, we have said that a Labour Government are committed to abolishing that test, and we will stick with that commitment because the test is discriminatory and ensures that people who should have the right to leasehold and enfranchisement will not have that right.

Clause 7 is not as strong as the original clause, which said that there should be a three-year test of residence before people could get enfranchisement. That was pushed hard on the Government by those defending the great estates—we sometimes refer to them as the Duke of Westminster and his merry men, who are holding on to their entrenched interests. Thankfully, the Government did not agree with that argument.

We are still left with a one-year residence test. Effectively, the Government are gradually narrowing the range of eligibility. As a result of the new clauses and amendments to the Bill, the Government are limiting eligibility for enfranchisement. They will now offer such enfranchisement to but a tiny fraction of the leaseholders who expected to receive it once the Bill was enacted.

In effect, all long-term leaseholders of houses have no chance or hope of enfranchisement. The Government have offered a banner right, but they have qualified it away. They have whittled down the number of those who will be eligible. The Government have created expectations, but, in common with the citizens charter, in reality we are left with a damp squib on a dull day. Many who expected the rights that the Government promised them in the manifesto will now discover that they are not eligible to receive them.

Lord Strathclyde claimed that the Government wanted

"to keep exemption from leasehold enfranchisement to an absolute minimum"—[Official Report, House of Lords, 9 March 1993; Vol. 543, c. 1037.]

In other words, the Government maintain that it is their intention to give enfranchisement to as many long leaseholders as possible. That will not happen.

It is important to consider the substance of Lords amendment No. 7. To insert a residence qualification into the current proposals mean that, because of the collective nature of enfranchisement, particularly of flats, any residence test will deprive those who pass it, as well as those who do not, of the chance of becoming full owners of their homes. We accept that, unlike other tests previously proposed and rejected, the new residence test will not wreck the Bill, but it could have certain repercussions.

The research of the Consumers Association, which we discussed in Committee, spelled out that a high proportion of flat owners tend to own their properties for a relatively short time. That fact, taken with the two-thirds majority requirement for enfranchisement, which has now been stiffened by the proviso relating to not less than 50 per cent. of all flats, means that any residence test is bound to have a significant and unfair effect, because it will exclude flat owners in particular from any chance of enfranchisement.

When the residence test was promoted in the other place, emphasis was placed on the hypothetical examples of the enfranchisement of properties owned by companies and foreign residents. Let us put things in perspective. I believe that the vast majority of flats are owned by ordinary British citizens, who have always lived here. Although recent economic difficulties may have forced some of them to become non-resident owners—we all know that repossessions have taken their toll and that negative equity problems have pushed people into difficulties—the residential qualification, albeit narrow, will reduce the number of those who are entitled to enfranchisement under the Bill.

The Government set out with a great intention. The Prime Minister suggested on the eve of the general election that about 750,000 leaseholders would receive the right to leasehold enfranchisement once the Government were re-elected. As in many other areas of policy, the Government have pared that offer and hedged it with disqualifications. They have built up expectations only to dash them on the rocks of Government expendiency. Those who expect to be enfranchised will, sadly, find out that they are denied that right. Sadly, they will only discover that once the Bill is enacted.

Mr. Nigel Waterson (Eastbourne): I echo what the hon. Member for Leeds, West (Mr. Battle) said about the recent honour bestowed on my right hon. Friend the Minister. I am sure that many other hon. Members are pleased to register their pleasure at that. May I also declare, for the last time, what I am told is not, strictly, an interest: I hold the leasehold of a flat in my constituency.

The Bill is an excellent piece of legislation, and it is characteristically churlish of Opposition Members to criticise it, particularly when they could muster only a measly 148 votes in the previous Division. That reveals their level of genuine interest in this important, bold and imaginative Bill, which will redeem an important and widely welcomed manifesto pledge.

I congratulate my right hon. Friend on the fact that the central provisions of the Bill have emerged largely unscathed from another place. It is an excellent Bill, and it has been my desire throughout its passage to ensure that the provisions offered by it are available to as many people as possible.

I appreciate the concern that underlies the new clause tabled in amendment No. 7 about speculators who may seek to advantage themselves under the Bill, instead of the genuine leaseholders whom the Bill is designed to help. I am concerned about some of the effects of the new clause, especially when one considers the other hurdles to be negotiated under the Bill, particularly the two-thirds test.

The terms of the new clause are somewhat less onerous than a similar clause proposed by my hon. Friend the Member for Weston-super-Mare (Sir J. Wiggin), which was defeated in the House. It follows the same principle, however, and I remember saying on that occasion in February that my hon. Friend's proposed new clause could emasculate the Bill.

I have a number of concerns that I should like to raise, particularly in the context of my constituency, and in similar constituencies along the south coast. As I said in a previous debate, I am concerned about the effects of the new clause on holiday homes. Eastbourne is a popular place in which to buy such properties, and they are often purchased by perfectly ordinary people who are in no sense property speculators.

It is also important to consider the effect of the new clause on flats that are rented out for a short period or owned by people who are temporarily working abroad. Of great importance for somewhere like Eastbourne, where 30 per cent. of the population are of retirement age, is the position of retirement homes. Many people put their savings into such property in advance and anticipation of their retirement and, for a time, it is not regarded as the principal place of residence.

It is also important to consider the necessary and natural movement of people within a block of flats. That may be a more important factor in the London area, where the population is subject to greater shifts, but any block of flats is subject to a turnover of residents. In some cases, that would make for a fundamental mathematical problem in reaching the qualifications under the Bill, particularly when they are to be overlain by a new residence qualification. It is also important to consider the knock-on effect of such a proposal. That qualification, apart from making it impossible for particular individuals to qualify for enfranchisement, makes it more difficult, if not impossible, for others in a particular block of flats to qualify. Such individuals might well qualify in every other respect under the Bill.

I do not wish to hinder the progress of this important Bill; the sooner it is on the statute book the better. I wonder whether any research has been carried out, however, on the numbers likely to be directly affected by the new residence qualification. When the operation of the Bill is reviewed, as I am sure that it will be in due course, perhaps my right hon. Friend will undertake that, whenever that may be, that review will consider the effect of the new clause specificially, as well as other aspects that have been mentioned, such as the low rent test.

Mr. Nick Raynsford (Greenwich): I, too, would like to raise doubts about the impact of this clause, and follow the comments of the hon. Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Waterson), who rightly expressed concern that the impact might be to make it difficult, in certain circumstances, for leaseholders to take advantage of the provisions of the Bill.

On Report, I highlighted the phenomenon that was noticed in parts of Kensington, where one particular landlord, Smith Charity, had been involved in the practice of letting an increasing proportion of its properties to companies as a deliberate block.

I put it to the Minister that there is an obvious risk that landlords who seek to frustrate the intentions of the Bill —there is no question but that many large estates and others are deliberately seeking to prevent the Bill from having the effect that most hon. Members wish to see, which is for leaseholders to have the opportunity of enfranchisement—would naturally, as a result of this amendment, have an incentive to consider letting a significant proportion of the properties that become vacant in blocks of flats to companies, to ensure that the 50 per cent. threshold could not be met. That is an obvious loophole, which I fear may be exploited to frustrate the intentions of the legislation.

I therefore ask the Minister—adding to the comments of the hon. Member for Eastbourne—whether he will give thought to how the working of this provision is to be monitored, and what steps he intends to take to ensure that, if he receives representations from leaseholders in certain areas that their wish to enfranchise is being frustrated by the effect of this provision, this matter will once again come up for review. While we understand the perfectly reasonable wish to ensure that the benefits accrue only to bona fide leaseholders, the effect of this provision could be to frustrate some of them. I hope that the Minister will respond to this point.

I also ask him to be more specific about the numbers. If I remember correctly, he said in his opening remarks that the clause would disfranchise only a limited number of blocks. What number does his Department expect to be ruled out as a result of this provision? Will he go a bit further and tell us—as he and his colleagues have not done in the earlier stages of the Bill's passage through the House —how many leaseholders they expect to benefit from the Bill and enfranchise their homes in the course of the next few years? The Government have been strong on expressions of good intention about this Bill but very weak indeed on any forecast.

I know that the Minister will say that it is up to the leaseholders to decide, but in any matter of policy the Government have to make an estimate of the likely effect of what they are doing. Clearly, if there were no interest at all, it would be a waste of Parliament's time for us to be discussing all these very detailed, complicated and tortuous provisions. Some of us who sat on the Committee considering the Landlord and Tenant Act 1987 may wonder whether our time was well spent then, given the very limited take-up of that piece of legislation.

So I put it to the Minister that he owes the House some indication of the level of take-up that can be expected. Obviously, it will not be the full 750,000, but can we expect half that total? Can we expect 375,000 households to be seeking to enfranchise in, say, the lifetime of this Parliament, or will it be nearer 100,000 or fewer than that?

Without some indication of the extent to which the provisions of this Bill are likely to be taken up, we have to express some scepticism about whether the good intentions which the Government have expressed with regard to these measures will work through in practice to the benefit of leaseholders. We fear that the complexity of the legislation and the obstacles that undoubtedly exist, which will be to some extent compounded by this residence test, will deter bona fide leaseholders who want to buy the freehold of their homes, and prevent them from doing so.

I hope that the Minister will give us some answers on these points.

Sir John Wheeler (Westminster, North): I am grateful for this opportunity to intervene briefly. I have no wish to take up the time of the House for too long, being one of those who are anxious to see the Bill on the statute book.

At the outset, I offer my congratulations to my right hon. Friend on his appointment to the Privy Council. I sometimes think that, for his stewardship of this Bill alone, he qualifies for that privilege and honour.

I agree very much with my hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Waterson), who put the case very well.

The hon. Member for Leeds, West (Mr. Battle) referred to the briefing material that many of us have received from the Leasehold Reform Co-ordinating Committee, which quite rightly put the case for reducing the residence qualification to the absolute minimum. Many of my constituents agree with that. Nevertheless, this Bill, as it affects leasehold reform, is controversial in both this place and the other place, and compromises inevitably have to be accepted.

I hope that this amendment will succeed, although I doubt it. I hope that the Government will feel that they can continue actively to monitor the impact of this residence qualification and, if it should prove an obstacle to the intentions of the Bill as a whole, will take the opportunity on some future occasion to rectify the matter.

Many of my constituents live in apartment blocks in the centre of London, in the city of Westminster, where there is a stable community, while others may live in apartment blocks where there is greater mobility. It is among the latter that the problem may arise, and that is an area to which I hope that we shall return on a future occasion should there be genuine difficulty.

Mr. Michael Jopling (Westmorland and Lonsdale): I begin by reminding the House of two points that I made when the Bill was before it on Report stage and Third Reading.

First, I remind the House that I am an owner of rented property, although I am advised that none of it falls within the provisions of this Bill.

Secondly, I repeat what I said on Third Reading: that, in the 28 years that I have been in this House, I can recall no piece of legislation that makes me more ashamed of what my party proposes than this wretched, miserable Bill. It is a totally lamentable Bill. To tear up agreements freely entered into by people, without duress, and to have the element of confiscation that this Bill has, is entirely against the philosophy of the party that I have represented in the House for all those years.

I am enormously unhappy about this, and I could not disagree more with my hon. Friends the Members for Eastbourne (Mr. Waterson) and for Westminster, North (Sir J. Wheeler).

However, I have to accept that amendment No. 7 is a modest improvement to the Bill. It does not make the Bill acceptable, in my view, but it is a modest improvement, and I hope very much that the House will accept it.

Sir Jerry Wiggin: I intervene very briefly to say how much I agree with the words of my right hon. Friend the Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Mr. Jopling). This is a reprehensible piece of legislation. One of its worst features is the invitation to speculation that no residence qualification would have brought. Therefore, I look upon it as a distinct improvement to the Bill that there now has to be a personal residence qualification. Those who take a different view from the Government are told that the Government made a manifesto commitment, but that commitment applied to occupied flats and was designed to help individuals. It was not intended to encourage speculation. Therefore, I believe that the provision is an essential safeguard, and I am extremely happy to see it before the House.

Mr. Dudley Fishburn (Kensington): I shall distance myself a little from my rural hon. Friends, who find the legislation reprehensible. I have been in the House for five years, and no other piece of legislation has caused me greater pleasure. I have greeted no other legislation more willingly. It is entirely in keeping with a Conservative party which believes in wider home ownership and, above all, in practical forms of law. Our philosophy is not to believe that, in the 21st century, we should have 18th-century forms of tenure.

The Bill comes before the House with 270 Lords amendments. This afternoon and in the next months or indeed years, we cannot be fully aware of what those amendments will mean for the legislation. Therefore, I add my voice to those who hope that the Department of the Environment will officially monitor the Bill's progress over the coming years and conduct a proper review in two or three years' time. In that way, should the Bill prove to be unsatisfactory in giving the widest form of leasehold enfranchisement, the Government of the time will be able to widen it.

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cirencester and Tewkesbury): I want to say how much I support the remarks of my right hon. Friend the Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Mr. Jopling) and my hon. Friend the Member for Weston-super-Mare (Sir J. Wiggin). The Bill is a reprehensible piece of legislation which amounts to confiscation. If I freely enter into an agreement with someone, why should someone else have the right to say that that agreement was bad—irrespective of whether I entered into it or my parents, grandparents or great-grandparents did so?

I pay tribute to my right hon. Friend the Minister for the honour bestowed on him in the recent honours list. It is thoroughly well deserved as he has a great knowledge of housing. However, I have made representations to him on the specific subject of the residency tests. As a chartered surveyor and property owner, I believe that it would be wrong if someone could enter into property ownership on the basis of speculation—whether they be a foreign-owned company or a foreign individual—so that they bought leasehold property with a view to making a profit out of the landlord.

Mr. Peter L. Pike (Burnley): I thank the hon. Gentleman for giving way—I want to be sure exactly what he is saying. The Government have always claimed that theirs is the party of leasehold enfranchisement. If that is so, it runs contrary to what the hon. Gentleman is saying. He is saying that any contract entered into now or in the past should be enforced. He is saying that all previous leasehold enfranchisement legislation should not have been passed by the House. If I understand him correctly, his approach is at great variance with that of the Government Front-Bench team.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: All previous legislation has been freely debated in the House—much of it was passed by the Labour party. Had I been a Member of Parliament at that time I would have argued against it as hard as I could. Acts such as the Leasehold Reform Act 1967 are abhorrent.

I welcome the amendment. I do not think that it makes a bad Bill good, but it brings an element of fairness in abolishing some of the property speculation which would have been totally abhorrent.

Ms Glenda Jackson (Hampstead and Highgate): Surely what is lamentable—a word which has been used over frequently in the past few minutes by some Conservative Members—is the idea that contracts on leasehold between tenant and leaseholder are based on an equal standard. It is impossible to obtain a freehold on flats, certainly in London. A freeholder holds all the cards in his or her hand, and has played those cards in a way that has had a deleterious effect on tenants.

Hon. Members have given examples of why someone should be able to be a tenant even if not currently resident in a leasehold flat. However, mention has not been made of the fact that, in the desperate recession which the country has been enduring in the past few years, families who have outgrown the size of their flats have had to move out of their homes to find a smaller place that they can afford and rent out their flats. The measure could make such families ineligible for enfranchisement.

I find it extraordinary that Conservative Members should put the housing needs of visiting business men, academics or diplomats above the needs of residents and nationals of this country, particularly in our capital city. The opportunities to obtain decent, affordable housing in this already overpressed capital are constantly decreasing. The Government have reneged on their manifesto commitments on leasehold enfranchisement. The House should vote against the measure, which does not work in the best interests of democracy and the commitment of political parties. It betrays the Government's manifesto. Most importantly, it betrays the thousands of people who are looking to the Bill to enable them to say that their home is their own.

Sir George Young: I thank the hon. Member for Leeds, West (Mr. Battle) and my right hon. and hon. Friends for their kind words on the recognition that I have recently received. In these meritocratic days, it is nice to have an appendage to my name that has been earned, not inherited.

The hon. Member for Leeds, West started by chiding the Government for accepting an amendment that would disfranchise leaseholders. He has just marched his hon. Friends—though not many of them—through the Lobby to do just that. He insisted on dividing the House on an amendment which, had it been carried, would have disfranchised a large number of leaseholders and taken away the rights that they hoped the legislation would afford them.

The hon. Gentleman also said that the vast majority of flats were owned by ordinary people who live in them. He is right. That partly answers the reservations expressed by my hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Waterson). I should be surprised if the residence tests had a major impact in his constituency or other constituencies on the south coast.

There is provision for enabling leaseholders who are temporarily in residence abroad to participate in enfranchisement. The leaseholders of retirement homes would not be able to be participating tenants until they had moved into and occupied the retirement homes. However, it would need only 50 per cent. of the remaining participating tenants in the block to be residential. The hurdle is a little higher, which is why the provision was welcomed by some of my hon. Friends.

We have been urged to keep the matter under review. We are setting up an advisory organisation to help leaseholders achieve their entitlements under the legislation. I have no doubt that that organisation and others will let the Government know of the legislation's progress. I would hesitate to commit myself or my successors to more legislation on the subject. It is difficult to think of any more difficult legislation to pilot through the House than legislation on leasehold reform. My reasons for saying that have become manifestly clear in the past minutes.

We have made no estimates of the numbers who might benefit from the Bill. The Government's role is to give people entitlements and rights. It is entirely a matter for them how they exercise those rights. Therefore, we have set no targets for enfranchisements.

Mr. Battle: We appreciate the Minister's difficulty to a large extent. He has promised us a review, but it would be better to get the legislation right from the outset. In the other place, the Minister said:

"I strongly believe that a residence condition for qualification for collective enfranchisement in flats would not be fair . . . it would substantially reduce the number of blocks in which collective enfranchisement could take place . . . In fact I am convinced that a residence test for participation in collective enfranchisement would render unworkable this part of the Bill . . . We would end up with a worthless, discredited piece of legislation and our declared policy would not be delivered."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 9 March 1993, Vol. 543, c. 954-55]

Is that not Government policy? Is not the Minister saying that the Bill will not deliver the Government's intentions?

Sir George Young: I hope to come in a moment to the particular residency test that we are introducing, which, as the hon. Gentleman will recognise, is substantially different from some of the earlier tests that were put before this House and another place. My own view is that the new residency test will not substantially disfranchise a large number of people. As has been said, flat owners move frequently, but only half of the participating tenants have to satisfy the test. Further, it is a 12-month rather than a three-year test, for precisely that reason.

In reply to the hon. Member for Hampstead and Highgate (Ms Jackson) I shall simply repeat what Lord Williams of Elvel said in another place on behalf of the Labour party:

"I say to the noble Lord, Lord Boardman, that our reaction to the amendment is that we agree with anything which is against absentee landlords and artificial persons but as regards residents, we have had our doubts about 'the last twelve months'."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 11 May 1993; Vol. 545, c. 1259.]

So, in another place, there was some support for the insertion of a residency test before enfranchisement becomes possible.

I should like to turn now to the heart of the reservations raised by my right hon. Friend the Member for Westminster, North (Sir J. Wheeler) and my hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne. My right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary, when he was Secretary of State for the Environment, said that we did accept that there is some logic in the argument that only long leaseholders who actually live in their flats should be able to take control of the building and do something about the inevitable decline in the value of their asset, but we foresaw difficulty with the practicalities.

[Sir George Young]

Our view was that a residence test for collective enfranchisement which disqualified either buildings or individual tenants would mean that in too many blocks the right of tenants to buy out their landlords would not be exercisable, so the overall policy could not be achieved. We did not apply that argument to individual lease renewal, about which there has been no debate this afternoon.

Our original objection to a residence test was that the requisite majority of tenants to trigger collective enfranchisement would, in practice, be hard to attain. That is because the turnover of lease ownership means that at any one time a significant proportion of long leaseholders in a block would not have lived in it long enough to become qualifying tenants. Further, individual blocks could move into and out of eligibility frequently, making it harder to find an opportunity to claim.

In another place, my noble Friend Lord Boardman found a way round this difficulty. His amendment, which was accepted in another place and is before the House today, applies a test to participating tenants only. It requires that not fewer than half of those who sign the initial notice meet the residence condition. Thus, the difficulty over the disqualification from enfranchisement of whole blocks of flats, because not enough of the leaseholders have lived in their flats for long enough to allow the number of qualifying tenants to pass the two-thirds threshold, is neatly bypassed.

The residence conditions differ somewhat from those that we have introduced for lease renewal, because of the different circumstances. There are alternative tests. First, there is occupation of the flat, or part of it, as an only or principal home for the preceding 12 months. Secondly, occupation for periods amounting to three years out of the last 10 will suffice. Tenants may choose what for them is the easier. The second limb of the test means that people who have recently let out their flats—for example, because they have gone abroad for a period—will not be denied the opportunity to join in collective enfranchisement. Occupation does not have to have been under the qualifying lease. Thus, for example, someone who has lived in a flat owned by his or her parents and has recently inherited the long lease will be able to participate.

These amendments represent a sensible compromise between two conflicting points of view, both of which have been expressed in this debate. They will not disfranchise many blocks, but, as I said earlier, they will exercise the spectre of control by an absent minority. Politics is the art of the possible. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Westminster, North said, compromise is sometimes necessary. In my view, these amendments represent an acceptable compromise.

LEASES AT A LOW RENT

Lords amendment: No. 10, in page 8, leave out lines 20 to 25 and insert—

(i) the lease was entered into either on or after 1st April 1963 but before 1st April 1990, or on or after 1st April 1990 in pursuance of a contract made before that date, and

(ii) the flat had a rateable value at the date of the commencement of the lease or else at any time before 1st April 1990,")

Sir George Young: I beg to move that this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Madam Deputy Speaker (Dame Janet Fookes): With this, it will be convenient to take Lords amendment No. 88.

Sir George Young: These amendments will ensure that where a property never acquires a rateable value it shall be treated as if it were a lease entered into after April 1990. The test that applies to these leases is that the ground rent must not exceed £1,000 in Greater London or £250 elsewhere.

Amendment No. 10 relates to flats, and amendment No. 88 deals with houses. They will improve the test by ensuring that it can be applied to all properties, and I commend them to the House.

5.15 pm

Mr. Battle: The language in which the Minister presents his case is interesting. He says that the amendment will improve the test. In other words, it will firm up the test and make it more difficult for people to get through. Thus, the Government are once again ensuring that fewer people than was suggested will be enfranchised. It is worth recalling that the original consultation document published by the Government contained no suggestion of any low rent test. Such a test has crept in via the Bill, and the Government are now accepting it, as it were, as law. The Minister's comment that he is improving or strengthening the test suggests to me that very many more people will be disfranchised.

Sir George Young: Before the hon. Gentleman gets too carried away, let me make the point that the amendments were put forward on behalf of leaseholders. Without them, certain properties would simply be ineligible for enfranchisement because they have no rateable value. The amendments will therefore benefit leaseholders.

RIGHT OF REVERSIONER TO REQUIRE EVIDENCE OF TENANT'S RIGHT TO PARTICIPATE

Lords amendment: No. 33, in page 23, line 39, leave out subsection (3) and insert—

("(3) Where—

(a) the nominee purchaser fails to comply with a requirement under subsection (1) in the case of any person within the period mentioned in subsection (2), and

(b) The initial notice would not have been given in accordance with section 11(2)(b) if—

(i) that person, and

(ii) any other person in the case of whom a like failure by the nominee purchaser has occurred.

had been neither included among the persons who gave the notice nor included among the qualifying tenants of the flats referred to in that provision, the initial notice shall be deemed to have been withdrawn at the end of that period.")

Mr. Baldry: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

The amendment is technical. It deals with the issue of deemed withdrawal of the initial notice where the nominee purchaser cannot deduce title to the property of any participating tenant. Without the amendment, failure to deduce the title of the lease of any participating tenant would cause the deemed withdrawal of the initial notice, which might prove rather harsh.

The amendment was proposed by the Law Society and the Leasehold Reform Co-ordinating Committee. It seems to make sense. It makes the procedures on enfranchisement fairer.

PRICE PAYABLE BY TENANT ON ENFRANCHISEMENT BY VIRTUE OF SECTION 59 OR 60

Lords amendment proposed: No. 89, in page 65, line 17, leave out from ("shall") to end of line 18 and insert

("be determined in accordance with subsection (1A) above; but in any such case—

(a) if in determining the price so payable there falls to be taken into account any marriage value arising by virtue of the coalescence of the freehold and leasehold interests, the share of the marriage value to which the tenant is to be regarded as being entitled shall not exceed one-half of it; and

(b) section 9A below has effect for determining whether any additional amount is payable by way of compensation under that section; and in a case where the provision (or one of the provisions) by virtue of which the right to acquire the freehold arises in section 1A(1) above, subsection (1A) above shall apply with the omission of the assumption set out in paragraph (b) of that subsection.'")

Motion made and Question proposed, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.—[Mr. Baldry.]

Madam Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss Lords amendments Nos. 90 and 265.

5.30 pm

Mr. Pike: We want to break the run and have a debate on this group of amendments, which cover important issues.

The Leasehold Enfranchisement Association and the Consumers Association are concerned about the part of the Bill affected by the amendments, and we must force the Government to explain exactly why the amendments should be accepted. We do not think that amendments Nos. 89 and 265 are necessary, but the Government may be able to convince us differently about amendment No. 90.

We have discussed the extension of rights of leasehold house owners and flat owners. The Bill updates previous legislation, especially the Leasehold Reform Act 1967. The hon. Member for Cirencester and Tewkesbury (Mr. Clifton-Brown) made his position clear, but I am sure that the Government would not like to oppose leasehold enfranchisement. When the hon. Gentleman made his maiden speech, I said that I hope that he would be an improvement on his predecessor, who held strong views on some issues. I hope that the view that he has expressed in this debate is not typical, because we strongly disagree with it and the Government have a different view on the way to proceed with leasehold enfranchisement.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: I hope that the hon. Gentleman is not opposed to hon. Members having strong views. One can hold strong views and still support one's Government. I oppose the leasehold enfranchisement in part I of the Bill, but I strongly support parts II and III.

Mr. Pike: I accept what the hon. Gentleman says. However, the Conservative party's election manifesto contained a clear commitment to extend leasehold enfranchisement. The hon. Gentleman disagrees with that, and I accept that he is entitled to do so. However, I hope that he made his electors aware of the fact that he did not agree with his party on that issue.

Amendment No. 89 seems to put more restrictions on house owners than the Bill intends. Perhaps the hon. Member for Cirencester and Tewkesbury thinks that that is an improvement, but we have considerable reservations. Under the Bill as drafted, benefits to house owners are limited and do not give them any right to lease extensions, which people enfranchised under the 1967 Act have, and which flat owners will have under the new legislation.

Since the Bill left the House, Ministers have made a series of concessions to its opponents, and they tend to penalise an already disadvantaged group of leaseholders. The leaseholders who are affected will have to pay for enfranchisement under the more costly of the two formulae in the 1967 Act. The Bill has been amended by the other place to make the formula even more disadvantageous for leasehold house owners.

First, there will be a 50 per cent. minimum share of marriage value. That does not apply in other parts of the Bill. Secondly, severance costs must be paid, and that does not apply to other people covered by the Bill. Thirdly, the assumption that the tenant has any right to remain in the building at the end of the lease is removed, thus further increasing the price that is payable.

The amendments would give leasehold house owners the worst of all worlds. They certainly gain fewer rights at higher cost than other groups. I share their view that they have been singled out as sacrificial victims to appease the landlord lobby in the other place. That is why it is right to debate these important issues.

The points that I have been making were mainly those of the Consumers Association and I shall now deal with what the Leasehold Enfranchisement Association says about amendments Nos. 89 and 262:

"Amendment Number 89 . . . if allowed to stand—would effectively deny enfranchisement rights to virtually all long-term house-leaseholders. We feel . . . that the minority of house-leaseholders becoming eligible under this legislation have been used as a sacrifice for other parts of the Bill."

The Government have tried to hold firm against strong opposition. We all know what happened to the Duke of Westminster as a result of the legislation. The Government were under strong pressure and felt that they had to make a concession to get people to go along with the main drift of the Bill on enfranchisement of flats and not destroy it beyond recognition.

[Mr. Pike]

As my hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, West (Mr. Battle) said, we debated at great length the low rent test and other measures that are unnecessarily restrictive and do not give the freedom to buy that people should enjoy. Some people think that the Bill goes too far, and in the other place there were moves to restrict it even further. It is our view and that of others, particularly those affected, that, to ensure that this part of the Bill was not completely destroyed, the Government made the concession on house owners. That was the wrong decision to take. I hope that the Minister will take seriously the concern that is expressed about Lords amendment No. 89.

The first part of the amendment deals with the marriage value and the second with the removal from the valuation calculations of the assumption that the tenant has a right to occupancy at the end of the lease. Those are both important factors, and their removal will make the Bill worse than the one that left the House of Commons a few months ago.

The special valuation base defined in the Leasehold Reform Act, as amended in 1974, has been operating for 20 years as the established formula for assessment of the cost of enfranchisement for houses, and there is now a large body of case law. From the first, the Government have repeatedly stated that houses brought into eligibility for enfranchisement by the reform would be valued on the same basis as those previously made eligible. The Minister has assured us of that at several stages in Committee and on Report.

The 1974 formula is already heavily loaded against the leaseholder because of the unequal professional representation in early cases. The first case, the landmark Norfolk case, where the tenant represented himself against the landlord represented by Nigel Hague QC, now a judge and the author of the standard work on the subject, and the Grosvenor Estates' long-time solicitors Boodle Hatfield, resulted in a precedent award of 275 per cent. in the profit to the landlord. That was the old issue of profit and value and the old difficulty of assessing what the value should be as a result of the apportionment and the concept of marriage value, which we have debated so much in our consideration of the Bill.

The concept of marriage value has arisen out of the Leasehold Reform Act, but no set provision was made for it in the 1974 formula, and its apportionment has been a matter of negotiation, although 50 per cent. to each party has been the normal division. The new amendment will mean that the landlord must receive at least half the marriage value. That underlines the bottom point below which one cannot go. In that respect, there is a reduction in the rights of, and in the justice that should be done to, the person applying to buy the freehold of the property.

There is then the removal of the assumption of right for security of tenure—another important issue. The 1974 formula contains the assumption that the occupying leaseholder has a right to tenancy at the end of his lease. In some cases that will happen, but in others it will not, but a legal assumption of that sort follows frequently used legal practice. It is an extremely important principle in the way in which the value of the property is assumed and arrived at. Lords amendment No. 89 will remove the assumption of security of tenure at the end of the lease. Houses will be valued in an arbitrary way, according to whether, by chance, that right is there. We believe that to be an unfair change.

The Leasehold Enfranchisement Association considers that market value as a basis for the assessing of cost of enfranchisement can be acceptable only when modified by recognition of the moral right of the occupying home owner. I hope that the Government are prepared to recognise that right, which should not be ignored. It is established by an important principle that has existed for a long time and is understood, but will be removed by the amendment.

Never before in the history of leasehold enfranchisement have assessments of costs been worked out on the basis that the resident home owner has no right, moral or otherwise, to security of tenure at the end of his lease, and the resulting figures could prove impossible for most leaseholders, particularly long-term leaseholders whose lease terms are now short as a result of the years that they have been in the property.

Most larger houses were not given Rent Act protection in 1954, because they were not considered to be in short supply, but that was because many were still in various degrees of dilapidation or dereliction after the war, and conditions were still such that people had to have courage to take them on and restore them. The situation is different now, a number of years on, and that is an extremely important point.

As to the lease extension rights for house leaseholders, a 50-year extension of lease was an alternative option for qualifying leaseholders under previous legislation, but again, that right will be removed by the Bill. That was done quite openly from the beginning, as is shown by the Government's early proposals. It was hoped that an amendment would be tabled that might restore the right, and we certainly debated many of the issues. However, when taken with Lords amendment No. 89, not only will there be no improvement in the position of house-leaseholders, but their situation will be worsened.

I do not believe that that is what the Government intended to do, but as we, the Consumers Association and the Leasehold Enfranchisement Association view it, that is the reality. If the Government do not change their mind, they will have to be prepared to be told that they got it wrong. The move would be discrimination against a minority group of house leaseholders who were not previously eligible for enfranchisement, who were discriminated against in 1967 and again in 1974 by being denied rights given to other similar leaseholders.

I have always said, in good faith, that the Government's intention was to get rid of leasehold as a form of tenure. They have said both that, and that it must be done on a basis of equity and fairness rather than through seizure, which is what some Tory Back Benchers have claimed. We accept that it must be done on a fair basis. I hope that the Minister will accept our view that, no doubt inadvertently, something done in the other House is taking us backwards. We do not want that. The Government should not be asking us to agree to Lords amendments Nos. 89 and 265.

I should like to press the Minister a bit further on injurious affection and the changes to that which will result from Lords amendment No. 90. As the amendments were moved formally, we have not heard exactly why amendment No. 90 is considered necessary. The Leasehold

Enfranchisement Association is not fully convinced, although it might find the amendment acceptable if the Government stated clearly that they did not intend injurious affection to apply to urban houses.

We may, of course, be wrong in assuming that those speaking on behalf of rural interests are too inclined to talk engagingly of dower houses and long leaseholds. This, however, is almost entirely an urban problem; dower houses are not an issue. It is understood that the Government do not intend injurious affection to have any practical application to urban houses, but the agents of a major London landlord are already reported to have spoken of "crippling loadings" in respect of the first household to attempt enfranchisement.

People outside are worried about what may be done to prevent enfranchisement and extensions; they are concerned about the interpretation of certain provisions. The Minister is in the legal profession, and will know—as we all do—that skilful lawyers spend a good deal of time trying to find loopholes in legislation. I am no supporter of the Government, but I will give them the benefit of the doubt: even they may not want the legislation to be interpreted as it will be interpreted by some devious, scheming lawyers who see an opportunity to make money by protecting dukes who do not want leaseholders to have the chance of enfranchisement or extensions.

Unless the Minister can convince us that our fears are unjustified, we intend to press amendment No. 89 to a Division; if it falls, amendment No. 265 will automatically fall with it. As for amendment No. 90, I wish to hear what the Minister has to say, and, if necessary, to seek the House's permission to speak later. We are not sure what the Government intend; if we receive the assurances that we and the people seek about its interpretation, we may be prepared to let it pass. However, we are nearing the final debate on enfranchisement and extensions.

The Government are finding it difficult to convince some of their own Back Benchers of the equity of their proposals, and many Conservative Members support the Opposition's views. The Minister must do some convincing if we are not to press amendment No. 89 to a Division, because we believe that it would worsen the position of house owners.

Mr. Fishburn: The many leaseholders who live in London, and who live in houses rather than flats, feel cruelly let down by this aspect of the legislation. They do not feel let down by what was done on Second Reading, in Committee or on Third Reading; they feel let down by amendments Nos. 89 and 90, which were added in another place, without warning, despite the months—indeed, years—of debate on leasehold reform.

That debate began in a number of inner-London constituencies, under the aegis of my predecessor, Brandon Rhys Williams. The aim was precisely to enfrachise leaseholders who owned houses rather than flats. In the intervening years—quite properly—legislation has been introduced to enfranchise flat owners; that will change the face of London dramatically for the better over the next 10 years or so. It will give the right to own their flats to people who are now trapped in a second-rate form of home-ownership, with dwindling leasehold rights.

But lo and behold! Because of these amendments, those who originally crusaded for leasehold enfranchisement will be left out in the cold. The Leasehold Reform Act 1967 allowed house owners—people who owned individual houses on leasehold—to enfranchise themselves, under a formula set out in the Act. As the Bill was going through the House, at the last minute a certain number of householders were artificially excluded in a deal between the Labour Government, as they then were, and the big London landlords, as they then were and still are. Anyone whose house had a rateable value of more than £1,500 a year was artificially excluded from the legislation.

Until these amendments were agreed in another place, it was the Government's intention, and the hope of tens of thousands of Londoners who live in leasehold houses, that enfranchisement would be possible on the terms that the 1967 Act would have allowed had it not been for that artificial exclusion. Many of those Londoners are my constituents.

London as a whole was right to look forward to such a possibility: as we have seen in the past, leaseholders who enfranchise themselves and become freeholders rapidly improve their houses, bringing about new investment and improving neighbourhood amenities and architectural features. Certainly, all the houses in my constituency of Kensington whose owners have enfranchised themselves in the past 10 or 15 years have added enormously to the quality of the area, by virtue of the fact that those who live in them also own them. Now, thousands will not be able to enfranchise themselves because the rateable value of their homes is more than £1,500. That will lead to continuing urban squalor—and, I fear, growing urban squalor in my part of the world.

Amendment No. 89 effectively disfranchises those thousands of people, for two reasons. First, there is now a provision on the face of the Bill that no leaseholder in a London house should be able to expect more than half the marriage value of the property if he wishes to enfranchise. That effectively means that the cost of enfranchisement will be vastly more than it would have been under the 1967 Act. We may be talking of not a fraction, but a quantum leap of two, three or four times the actual cost.

Such a provision has never been on the face of the Bill before. We know that it was put there to buy off a well-mounted public relations campaign in another place, not because it was the Government's original intention.

My fear, to which I should like the Minister to respond, is that the lawyers who will fix at tribunals the price of houses to be enfranchised will take the amendment merely as a starting point. Instead of the marriage value not exceeding 50 per cent., leaseholders who seek to enfranchise will have to pay more than 70, 80 or 85 per cent. of the marriage value when they buy the freehold from the residual freeholder, who has already received much of the property's worth when he sold the long lease in the first place.

The second reason also stems from amendment No. 89. When the tribunal seeks to ascertain the worth of a house that a leaseholder wishes to enfranchise, it will assume that the house will be empty at the end of the lease, with no statutory tenancy and no moral right of residence. That provision, tacked on to amendment No. 89, overturns the rule of thumb, indeed the rule of law, that we have come to expect in housing in the previous generation. It does so not only as a last-minute thought but with extraordinary high-handedness.

Taken together, these two reasons mean that thousands of Londoners with leasehold properties will not be able to take advantage of the Bill's provisions to buy their freeholds. That is a great shame, which will be keenly felt by many of my constituents. Anything that the Minister could say now to dispel the fear that tribunals will use the amendment to increase the cost to those seeking enfranchisement will be greatly welcomed.

Amendment No. 90 contains the legal jargon of injurious affection. That concept was agreed in this House rather than in another place, but it was intended to apply to country estates and, in that context, I regard it as a welcome and sensible move and exactly the type of amendment that legislation should receive as it passes through this House. It was a sharpening and an improvement, but, in the brief six weeks since the commitment was given, the lawyers have been at work. They say that they will use amendment No. 90 to ensure that the enfranchisement of houses on contiguous estates throughout London, and Kensington, will be stymied. They will claim injurious affection and state that something which was a sensible concession to country estates should apply in the heart of our capital city. Anything that the Minister can say to rebut not me but those lawyers will be greatly appreciated.

If amendments Nos. 89 and 90 are passed and if we receive none of the assurances that I seek, thousands of my constituents will feel greatly let down after a long campaign, and leaseholders of houses in central London will not be able to enfranchise.

Mr. Raynsford: The hon. Member for Kensington (Mr. Fishburn) is right to express alarm and concern about the implications of the amendments. As my hon. Friend the Member for Burnley (Mr. Pike) rightly said, they will damage the prospects of substantial numbers of leaseholders of houses who were among the few who did not benefit from the Leasehold Reform Act 1967 and who looked forward to enfranchisement on similar terms to those that applied to leaseholders under that Act.

As has been said, there was no hint in earlier debates in the House or in Committee that a proposal such as that embodied in these amendments would be incorporated in the Bill. Indeed, to my knowledge, the Government have given no justification for the introduction of these concepts, extending to the provisions of the 1967 Act the concepts of the marriage value and compensation, or injurious affection, which were devised by the Government for the rather different conditions applying to flats and which were the basis of this legislation. There is no common sense, logic or justification in applying the two concepts of marriage value and compensation, or injurious affection, to houses. The consequences of doing so will be dramatic and devastating to many leaseholders.

Let us consider the practical implications of amendment No. 90, which deals with compensation. It states that the freeholder may claim compensation for "such amount as is reasonable"—

there is no limit; it is a wholly open-ended phrase—

"to compensate him for that loss or damage."

Such loss or damage means

"any diminution in value of any interest"—

again, an open-ended phrase—

"of the landlord in other property"—

not only in the one property but any other property—

"resulting from the acquisition of his interest in the house and premises".

The amendment goes very wide and will allow any landlord trying to frustrate the wishes of a leaseholder seeking to enfranchise to use the services of a skilful lawyer to put a major obstacle in the way of the leaseholder, as the hon. Member for Kensington said.

However, that is not the end of it. The amendment also states that loss or damage shall mean

"any other loss or damage which results therefrom to the extent that it is referable to his ownership of any interest in other property."

They are extraordinarily wide concepts, which will allow leaseholders to be confronted by lawyers demanding substantial sums in compensation, relating to various claims which may or may not be justified.

I accept that there may be consequences for landlords who are used to managing a block of flats if some properties within that block are enfranchised. There could be knock-on consequences for the management of the block, but houses are self-contained dwellings, which is an entirely different matter. They should not be subject to the curious concept of compensation.

The amendment is very broad, and the broadest of all the elements, and that which I believe will be the most damaging, at least in London, is the provision relating to the loss of development value. The Bill incorporates not only the curious concept of payment for such amount as the landlord believes is owing to him as compensation because of enfranchisement but the explicit provision that loss shall include the loss of development value. It is defined as value

"attributable to the possibility of demolishing, reconstructing, or carrying out substantial works of construction"

One can envisage a landlord, faced with a leaseholder seeking enfranchisement, saying that, if he could develop a particular property, he could replace it with a substantially more valuable one on the same site. The amendment contains no requirement that the landlord should have obtained planning consent for such development. It is sufficient for the landlord to claim merely that he might have had an opportunity to develop a property and thereby greatly enhance its value. The hypothetical loss of development value could then be charged to the leaseholder seeking enfranchisement, thus making it impossible for the leaseholder to exercise the right of enfranchisement.

Those serious implications go the the heart of the process of enfranchisement. Ministers must be only too well aware that the amendments would make it impossible for certain leaseholders in houses to exercise their rights. Leaseholders would be confronted not only with the obstancles that we already know exist in the Bill but with a powerful financial deterrent that their landlord can exercise against them.

It seems extraordinary, given Ministers' protestations about their wish to extend enfrachisement, that, under the amendments, they are deliberately seeking to place serious obstacles in the path of those seeking enfranchisement.

I do not know what justification Ministers will advance. We may be told that it is neat and tidy to apply the same concepts to houses as those that apply to flats. That is the only respectable argument that I can think of, because I have heard no other argument in favour of those provisions.

In Committee, we argued time and again for consistency between the eligibility criteria for people seeking enfranchisement under the Bill and the eligibility criteria of the Landlord and Tenant Act 1987. Time and again, Ministers told us that the circumstances were different and that the 1987 Act did not apply in the same circumstances as the proposals in the Bill and, therefore, it was not appropriate to have absolute consistency in the rules. By their own arguments in Committee, they have destroyed any possible case for introducing the two amendments, which would have such a damaging impact on leaseholders in houses.

The case against amendments Nos. 89 and 265 is overwhelming and I should be surprised if Ministers could advance any convincing arguments in their favour. I hope that they will have the decency to recognise that a serious mistake has been made in the other place and that the amendments should be negatived to ensure that leaseholders in houses are not prevented from taking the opportunities for enfranchisement that Parliament is ostensibly seeking to grant.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: I am sorry to detain the House for a minute or two longer on amendments Nos. 89, 90 and 265. I had not intended to speak, but my hon. Friend the Member for Kensington (Mr. Fishburn) and the hon. Member for Greenwich (Mr. Raynsford) made some points that should not go unanswered.

Amendments Nos. 89 and 265 deal with marriage value —when the lessor and lessee's interests are put together and the value of the whole is greater than that of the two parts. Both hon. Members should recognise what is happening in the market. At the moment, if a lessee went to his landlord, the lessor, wishing to buy his interest out, the landlord, if he were so minded, would agree, and I, as a chartered surveyor, would have no difficulty in valuing the unexpired portion of the lease. They would then negotiate the marriage value and what portion of the property should go to the lessee and what portion should go to the lessor.

In the present market, almost universally, 75 per cent. or more of the marriage value goes to the lessor. As we are introducing legislation to allow the lessee, in certain prescribed circumstances, to oblige the landlord, the lessor, to allow himself to be bought out, it seems quite reasonable that should there be a minimum of 50 per cent. —after all, that is some way below what happens in the market.

Amendment No. 90 deals with injurious affection. The hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Pike) did not have a clue what the words meant, let alone what he was speaking to, so let me try to explain. It is a universal principle of all compensation law that where somebody's property is acquired compulsorily, there should be full compensation for the injurious affection—the diminution in the landlord's remaining property. The hon. Member for Greenwich read out the provisions of the Leasehold Reform Act 1967, which do not differ from other statutory provisions on compensation. It is wholly consistent with all other property law.

Mr. Raynsford: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that there is no such concept in the 1967 Act, which has worked perfectly well and successfully for 25 years or more? An entirely alien concept is now being introduced.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: The hon. Gentleman has played into my hands. I told the hon. Member for Burnley that, had I been here in 1967, I would have argued as hard as I could to ensure that that legislation was defeated. It was a totally unfair Act.

In those circumstances, consistent with all other property legislation where the landlord's property has been diminished, the Bill should make proper provision for injurious affection. That applies particularly to rural estates and where an estate village, in unique and rare cases, has been in the ownership of the same family since Domesday. This is part of our cultural heritage.

Mr. Jack Straw (Blackburn): The hon. Gentleman says that this is part of our heritage. That may or may not be so, but is not his real concern that it is part of his wealth?

Mr. Clifton-Brown: If the hon. Gentleman is casting a personal aspersion on me, he should withdraw it. If he is casting an aspersion on landowners in general, perhaps he will make himself clear.

Mr. Straw: I was referring to both—the hon. Gentleman's landholding, the landholding of other owners and the way in which they have sought unjustifiably to influence the outcome of the Bill.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: If the hon. Member for Bolton——

Mr. Straw: Blackburn.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: If the hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw) is casting personal aspersions against me, I should say that I have declared an interest as a chartered surveyor and a landowner. I do not believe, however, that any of my property holdings come within the scope of the Bill. If he is casting personal aspersions against me, he should withdraw them, but if he is casting aspersions against property owners in general, I should tell him that many hundreds of thousands of property owners are lessors, some of whom have only two properties.

I know that almost all the investments of one hon. Member are in one leasehold property, which will now be enfranchised. [Laughter.] The hon. Member for Blackburn may laugh, but I do not understand why the Labour party wants to make legislation that inhibits privity of contract. I cannot understand why it does not want anybody who makes a free agreement to do whatever he or she wants.

Mr. Straw: Is the hon. Gentleman seriously advancing the proposition that contracts should be exclusively the domain of those who are parties to them and that the community should have no interest in their outcome, even if it affects the community?

Mr. Clifton-Brown: Of course, there will be circumstances where the community has an interest, but this is not one of them.

I have already been lured into making remarks well outside the scope of the amendments. That is not entirely and exclusively my fault. I have been led down a path of temptation that I could not resist.

It is wholly right, and consistent with other property legislation, that where a property owner's interest is acquired, as it were, compulsorily, he should be compensated for the full diminution in the value of his property.

[Mr. Clifton-Brown]

Does the hon. Member for Greenwich think that it would be right for a landlord with potential investment value to have his property acquired compulsorily and get nothing from the potential investment? If that is what he is saying, it is totally unfair.

Mr. John Fraser (Norwood): My constituency contains a large number of leasehold properties, including some parts of the Dulwich college estate. I have fought all my parliamentary life for better rights for leaseholders, and I was proud to be associated with the Leasehold Reform Act 1967. Of course, that Act was opposed by the then Conservative Opposition, and was described by John Boyd-Carpenter as "Rachmanism in reverse." The spirit of Boyd-Carpenter lives on on the Government Benches.

The hon. Member for Westminster, North (Sir J. Wheeler) argues that we shall be messing with privity of contract. But one of the reasons why Parliament exists is to disturb, in the interests of justice and fairness, arrangements between one party and another which, very often, have resulted from unequal bargaining power. It is perfectly proper for Parliament to intervene to give security of tenure—that is interfering with privity of contract.

No business man or woman on the Government Benches protests against the interference with privity of contract when the security of business people is involved. They protest only when residential tenants—usually those at the bottom of the scale—are involved. There is every reason why hon. Members should try to interfere with privity of contract. That is the intention of those on the Opposition Front Bench.

I now turn to marriage value. When the 1967 Act was introduced, it was not thought that marriage value would enter into it; the price paid by the tenant would be the price on the open market. Let us transfer the principle of marriage value to the example of a severely ill person going to a chemist to have a prescription dispensed. The transferred principle would mean that the chemist would charge the sick person a greater amount of money because he was in greater need of the prescription than someone else in the marketplace. The same principle would apply to a private doctor charging a higher fee to someone who was seriously ill and needed to be seen than to other patients. It would mean charging more for a meal to someone who was starving than to other people. That is marriage value.

The reason for leasehold reform legislation was to deal with the exploitation of tenants, usually people whose home—their most important possession—was dependent on the absence of their rights under leasehold law. That is why there was interference on these matters, and why the 1967 Act assumed that there was no such thing as marriage value.

Marriage value is demanding with menaces—I am told I must not use the word "blackmail" any longer, as it is politically incorrect—from people who are in the greatest need. That is why marriage values should not apply either to houses or to flats. I can see that there is a problem with regard to flats when a few people extend the leases and there is not general enfranchisement. There is a trade-off in those circumstances.

The amendments make things much worse by placing the matter compulsorily on the agenda for negotiation by saying that the tenant may not have more than half the value. That seems to be influencing the negotiations in a way that was not intended either by those who have campaigned for the legislation or by the Government when they introduced the Bill in the first place.

I wish to talk briefly about injurious affection, which is a principle acknowledged in compensation law. I believe that landlords are now behaving in a way that was not thought to be normal behaviour for landlords some years ago. I have been surprised at the behaviour of Dulwich college—a charity—over the past few years. The college used to behave in a benign and neighbourly way. There was a sort of give and take, and the college seemed to take a charitable view of the needs of leaseholders. In the past few years, the attitude has changed in the same way as it has with institutional landlords.

In some cases, those landlords demand the very last penny that they can get out of their tenants, whether they are business or residential. There is row after row of empty shops and premises in and around my constituency because of the high rents now being demanded by Dulwich college. If I take what I can see around my constituency as an indicator of how the college would use injurious affection, I can only conclude that it will be a very injurious affection, not for the college but for those who seek to exercise the rights given by Parliament.

I am deeply disturbed by and unhappy with the amendments. They were not intended in the first place by the Government and they entrench—particularly with regard to marriage value—the principle of being able to demand more from those who are in need than from those trading in the normal marketplace. I hope that, even at such a late hour, the Government will change their minds.

Mr. Baldry: I hope that I can reassure the House. When moving the motion, I did not appreciate that the amendment had provoked such passion outside the House. If that had been made clear to me, I would have explained the amendments in greater detail, because a number of comments that we have heard have been somewhat wide of the mark. The hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Pike) has said that the Opposition intend to press for a Division, and I suspect that very little of what I am to say will deter them from that intention.

I shall try to explain what the matter is about. First, the amendments specify that a landlord should receive at least half of any marriage value. I accept the assertion by the hon. Member for Norwood (Mr. Fraser) that marriage values were not in the 1967 Act. The legislation on houses was different, because high-value houses were excluded from the 1967 Act and are included in this legislation for the first time. That is why, in part, we have marriage values, and they were debated at length in Standing Committee. The Government take the view that it is fair that the marriage value should be shared. If other hon. Members do not consider it fair, of course they will vote accordingly. We believe that it is fair, and it will normally be applied equally between parties. This floor is a useful safeguard where there may not be a willing seller.

Mr. Raynsford: The Minister conceded that the concept of marriage value was not regarded as appropriate in the 1967 Act. The distinction that he drew was between the provisions in the 1967 Act and the current extension to high-value properties. Will he tell the House what the logic is for having marriage value applying to high-value houses but not to low-value houses?

Mr. Baldry: There are two changes in the proposals —first, relating to flats and, secondly, relating to high-value houses. In those circumstances, time has moved on and it would be fair and equitable for marriage value to apply to high-value houses and to flats. The background to the 1967 Act was somewhat different from the background to the current proposals. Another difference between the Bill and the 1967 Act in the current proposals is embodied in the amendment relating to compensation for the severance price. The House has heard some fairly extreme examples of what might happen.

My hon. Friend the Member for Kensington (Mr. Fishburn) should recall that the then Secretary of State for the Environment announced on Report that severance would be available for newly enfranchised houses. My hon. Friend will recall that that was because of a number of Back-Bench concerns about valuation.

The amendment arises because there are circumstances in which a real loss in the value of property remaining in a landlord's ownership may occur because of the disposal by enfranchisement. Again, we are dealing with high-value houses. The situation is unlikely to occur with low-value houses. Severance was not provided for in the 1967 Act and was unlikely to be appropriate for low-value houses. The impact of the loss on higher-value houses on a whole estate might be significant. The hon. Member for Burnley gave the good example of a dower house on a country estate, where an island of property under different ownership might be created.

The concerns that that rule somehow might apply in urban situations and that landlords might use that as preventing enfranchisement are somewhat wide of the mark. First, the landlord must satisfy a leasehold valuation tribunal that there is a real loss to some other property in his ownership. A landlord cannot simply add a penalty. He will have to show that some other third party would actually pay less for the other property, separately, than for the combined property. That seems to be only fair and equitable.

The hon. Member for Greenwich (Mr. Raynsford) cannot have it both ways. If he argues that there is no loss to the landlord, the amendment does no harm. However, if there are cases where there may be a loss to the landlord, it is only right that there should be compensation and that the landlord should have the opportunity of arguing the point before a leasehold valuation tribunal.

Amendment No. 265 disapplies the assumption that tenants will have security of tenure at the end of their leases. Tenants of higher-value houses, which will now be able to be enfranchised, do not normally have security of tenure. Indeed, the assumption, if that were allowed to continue, would artificially decrease the value of the landlord's interest. Where the tenant has the right, amendment No. 265 will not affect the valuation. The amendment simply reflects the truth. The facts speak for themselves. I cannot see how one can object to a situation where the facts speak for themselves. We are fairly reflecting the truth of the situation.

Mr. Pike: As a result of amendments Nos. 89 and 265, will not the householder enjoy a worse position?

Mr. Baldry: Parts of this afternoon's debate have tended, on both sides of the House, to become a spat, or a scoreboard with tenants on one side and landlords on the other. That is not how we on the Treasury Bench view the Bill. We want legislation that is fair and equitable to all parties in all regards. I believe that amendments Nos. 89, 90 and 265 are useful to ensure that the valuation of newly enfranchisable houses is equitable and in line with that for flats. For those reasons, I commend the amendments to the House.

Mr. Battle: The Minister has revealed a further example of the Government effectively caving in to the pressure of the landlord's interests which was placed on the Government in another place. That is what it boils down to.

I remind the Minister of one letter of the many that I have received which was addressed to the Minister. It states:

"I understand that the above mentioned bill will go next Monday back to the House of Commons.

I strongly hope that the Government will reject in the House of Commons the amendments No. 89 and 90 proposed by the House of Lords in particular;

a) injurious affection (loss which might be incurred to a landlord other property by enfranchisement of a particular house)

b) removal of the assumption of right to security of tenure

c) apportion of marriage value

All these amendments have been clearly proposed in the House of Lords for the exclusive benefit of the Landlords with the effect of making the enfranchisement process for houses extremely expensive.

Already the 1974 formula which should apply, as in the Government manifesto, gives the landlord a very high compensation, adding these further 3 new factors would be punitive for the tenant and against the entire scope of the legislation.

I was born in my present home and have lived there all my life and therefore very much hope that you will not adopt these three final amendments."

I believe that that person speaks for many people who expect to get leasehold enfranchisement, but who now realise that, with the Government's acceptance of amendments Nos. 89 and 90, that will not happen.

When Conservative Members push the Government even further by appealing to what we might describe as their version of the inviolability of the private contract, I submit to them, as many of my hon. Friends pointed out during the debate, that long lease contracts were never fair contracts because of the unreasonable assumption that the property "sold" or provided by the leaseholder would be handed back again for nothing, in perfect condition, at the end of the lease.

The lease periods concerned, sometimes 999 years, are also too long to be undertaken without a reasonable possibility of statutory change during that period. It is also possible for landlords to exact unfair contracts because of the local housing monopolies that they control. In other words, there was never any true freedom of choice for people entering such contracts if they wanted to live in a particular place. There is an inequality of bargaining power. In the leasehold area, private individuals seeking to buy a home via what is known as arm's-length negotiations are up against a scale of resources, both financial and professional, which makes any suggestion that it is an equal contract absolutely laughable.

Long-lease contracts were never fair. Unnatural property price inflation has escalated that imbalance. I suggest that landlords might have put their own house in order. However, they have not chosen to do that, and that is precisely why there is a demand for this legislation.

[Mr. Battle]

I refer the hon. Member for Cirencester and Tewkesbury (Mr. Clifton-Brown) to an article in The Times on 10 March 1993. In an editorial headed

"Leasehold reform should not be opposed by Conservatives",

the article stated:

"For Tories who believe in the sanctity of private contracts, therefore, the measure"— the leasehold reform in the Bill—

"is a crypto-socialist attack on Locke's most sacred principles and an affront to the rule of law.

Appealing to these arguments may be to the defenders of the free market, the lordly rebels are being intransigent in their principled resistance. In practice, no society can afford to treat private contracts of private property as absolutely inviolable. In markets in which ownership is highly concentrated, governments rightly interfere with the untrammelled enjoyment of private property in the name of competition. Land ownership in central London has been a case of monopoly power, especially during the mid-Victorian period when Britain's system of long leasehold tenure became the norm.

For better or worse, the principle of forcing freeholders to sell their property to long leaseholders was established, by the 1967 Leasehold Reform Act. That law excluded flats, but only for reasons of administrative complexity. the new bill merely removes that anomaly. Parliament must ensure that the compensatory mechanism which accompanies it is just and carefully regulated."

With respect to the amendments, the Government are asking house lessees to pay the price and they are stepping back. In other words, the Government accept the need to tackle the anomaly in relation to flats, but they will do that at the expense of people with long leases on their houses. That is an unacceptable watering down of the Bill. In effect, the increasing cost of enfranchisement in relation to houses would be such that it could no longer be said that effective enfranchisement rights were being offered.

The three additional valuation factors to which we have referred in the debate—injurious affection, the removal of the assumption of the right to security of tenure and the apportionment of marriage values—which have been loaded on to what house leaseholders will be made to pay on enfranchisement, seem to be grossly discriminatory. Householders, who were effectively excluded from the provisions of the Leasehold Reform Act 1967, are now being discriminated against in the Bill.

It seems that the Bill has been retitled the "Leasehold Reform" Bill, but the effect of that has been to cover up the removal of enfranchisement rights. In practice, we have a weaker, shabby Bill that will not deliver to leaseholders the rights to which they think that they will be entitled. The way forward for the Government is not to accept the Lords amendments. In the long run, the way forward would be to accept our proposals on commonhold. I look forward to those proposals coming before the House. They are the real way forward, but I am worried that that might not be on the agenda.

In the other place, Lord Strathclyde, speaking for the Government, said:

"my noble and learned friend the Lord Chancellor may or may not introduce that system in the future because it is fiendishly complicated and may require more thought."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 15 March 1993, Vol. 543, c. 1264.]

The Government have had plenty of time to bring forward a commonhold Bill. That would have cut through much of the morass into which the Government have dug themselves with the present proposals.

Question put, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment:-

New clause

PROPERTY TRANSFERRED FOR PUBLIC BENEFIT ETC.

Lords amendment proposed: No. 92, after clause 62 insert the following new clause—

("After section 32 of the Leasehold Reform Act 1967 there shall be inserted—

32A.—(1) A notice of a person's desire to have the freehold of a house and premises under this Part shall be of no effect if at the relevant time the whole or any part of the the house and premises is qualifying property and either—

(a) the tenancy was created after the commencement of Chapter III of Part I of the Housing and Urban Development Act 1993; or

(b) (where the tenancy was created before that commencement) the tenant would not be entitled to have the freehold if either or both of sections 1A and 1B above were not in force.

(2) For the purposes of this section the whole or any part of the house and premises is qualifying property if—

(a) it has been designated under section 31(1)(b), (c) or (d) of the Inheritance Tax Act 1984 (designation and undertakings relating to conditionally exempt transfers), whether with or without any other property, and no chargeable event has subsequently occurred with respect to it; or

(b) an application to the Board for it to be so designated is pending; or

(c) it is the property of a body not established or conducted for profit and a direction has been given in relation to it under section 26 of that Act (gifts for public benefit), whether with or without any other property; or

(d) an application to the Board for a direction to be so given in relation to it is pending.

(3) For the purposes of subsection (2) above an application is pending as from the time when it is made to the Board until such time as it is either granted or refused by the Board or withdrawn by the applicant; and for this purpose an application shall not be regarded as made unless and until the applicant has submitted to the Board all such information in support of the application as is required by the Board.

(4) A notice of a person's desire to have the freehold of a house and premises under this Part shall cease to have effect if—

(a) before completion of the conveyance in pursuance of the tenant's notice, the whole or any part of the house and premises becomes qualifying property; and

(b) the condition set out in subsection (1)(a) or (as the case may be) subsection (1)(b) above is satisfied.

(5) Where a tenant's notice ceases to have effect by virtue of subsection (4) above—

(a) section 9(4) above shall not apply to require the tenant to make any payment to the landlord in respect of costs incurred by reason of the notice; and

(b) the person who applied or is applying for designation or a direction shall be liable to the tenant for all reasonable costs incurred by the tenant in connection with his claim to acquire the freehold of the house and premises.

(6) Where it is claimed that subsection (1) or (4) above applies in relation to a tenant's notice, the person making the claim shall, at the time of making it, furnish the tenant with evidence in support of it; and if he fails to do so he shall be liable for any costs which are reasonably incurred by the tenant in consequence of the failure.

(7) In subsection (2) above as it has effect for the purposes of subsection (1) above—

(a) paragraphs (a) and (b) apply to designation under section 34(1)(a), (b) or (c) of the Finance Act 1975 or section 77(1)(b), (c) or (d) of the Finance Act 1976 as they apply to designation under section 31(1)(b), (c) or (d) of the Inheritance Tax Act 1984; and

(b) paragraphs (c) and (d) apply to a direction under paragraph 13 of Schedule 6 to the Finance Act 1975 as they apply to a direction under section 26 of that Act of 1984.

(8) In this section—

"the Board" means the Commissioners of Inland Revenue;

"chargeable event" means—

(a) any event which in accordance with any provision of Chapter II of Part II of the Inheritance Tax Act 1984 (exempt transfers) is a chargeable event, including any such provision as applied by section 78(3) of that Act (conditionally exempt occasions); or

(b) any event which would have been a chargeable event in the circumstances mentioned in section 79(3) of that Act (exemption from ten-yearly charge).")

RIGHT TO INFORMATION

Lords amendment: No. 170, after clause 110 insert the following new clause—

(". After subsection (2) of section 104 of the 1985 Act (provision of information about tenancies) there shall be inserted the following subsection—

"(3) A local authority which is the landlord under a secure tenancy shall supply the tenant, at least once in every relevant year, with a copy of such information relating to the provisions mentioned in subsection (1)(b) and (c) as was last published by it; and in this subsection 'relevant year' means any period of twelve months beginning with an anniversary of the date of such publication."")

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.—[Sir George Young.]

7 pm

Mr. Battle: The amendment deals with the right to information. It concerns, in particular, the public sector and the Government's intentions in providing such information.

The proposed new subsection refers to section 104 of the Housing Act 1985, which deals with the provision of information about a tenancy. Does that mean that that information will simply be limited to the right to buy, or will it include information about the Government's proposed rents-to-mortgage scheme, which also forms part of the Bill? The relevant section of the 1985 Act provides that when a tenancy is created, a local authority should give tenants information about changes to the tenancy. I hope that the information provided under the proposed subsection is not just confined to that about right to buy, but includes information about the Government's rents-to-mortgage scheme.

The Government have tried recently to boost the flagging right-to-buy programme by publishing another booklet that, set out that programme in fine detail. I understand that, this year, the Government have already spent £1·4 million on publicity. The latest publicity stunt will not help council leaseholders who exercised the right to buy but were not properly informed at the time of how they would have to manage and pay the lease. I remind the Minister that some 70,000 council leaseholders in London alone face massive repair bills. They are unable to sell their flats and now feel that they were not properly informed by the Government when they pushed the right-to-buy programme.

Ministers' energies would be better spent tackling the huge need for homes to rent rather than simply trying to create a demand where one virtually does not exist.

It might be helpful if, under the terms of right to information, Ministers gave an undertaking to the House that the relevant costs of providing such information would be fully met and that the provisions would be reviewed if, in the future, authorities could prove that meeting them was more onerous than the Government expected.

Many believe that the rents-to-mortgage scheme is not relevant to current circumstances. In Committee, the Minister often quoted me as saying that the scheme was irrelevant. I cannot claim ownership of that description; it should be claimed by Mr. Steve Wilcox, who wrote in Roof magazine in the September-October 1992 edition that the scheme

"will appeal to a limited number of tenants who cannot afford right to buy but are not in receipt of housing benefit."

In other words, the proposals for rents to mortgages, announced in July and based on pilot schemes in Scotland, new town Basildon and Milton Keynes, have not achieved anything near what the Government suggested. There is no real market for the scheme because rents are already at levels where many tenants could, if they so wished, buy under the right-to-buy scheme, with mortgage repayments no higher than their current rents. The scheme is still being sold by the Government, however, as a means of avoiding "future rent increases".

All that the rents-to-mortgage scheme will do is highlight the financial squeeze on local authorities by claiming projected large increases as if they were an inevitable consequence of continued council ownership. It will not spell out the lack of resources to invest in the necessary repair and improvement of local authority stock.

Inside Housing magazine of 30 October 1992 described the scheme in an article entitled, "Rents to mortgage too obscure", which stateds:

"Difficulty in understanding rent to mortgage has been one of the main reasons for tenants not taking up the scheme, the Scottish Office has conceded."

That was conceded in the Scottish Office publication, "The Rent to Mortgage Scheme in Scotland". The article continued:

"An official report into local authority and Scottish Homes rent to mortgage pilots claims success for the scheme . . . in attracting purchasers who otherwise would not have been able to purchase their homes.

But the report says the main reasons why tenants did not continue with a rent to mortgage purchase after expressing interest included fear of unemployment and difficulty understanding the scheme."

I can understand why people's fear of unemployment makes them unwilling to be pushed any further to purchase property.

Perhaps provocatively—although this is an expression that has been echoed by most people with experience and knowledge in the housing field—I have to say that in 69 per cent. of the housing stock in Britain, owner-occupation is proving untenable. Twenty-one per cent. of the stock is still with local authorities. The private rented sector still stagnates, despite the Government's efforts to revivify it, at 7 per cent. Housing associations, of which the Government demand so much, represent a mere 3 per cent. of the housing stock.

I put it to the Minister that housing associations, with only 3 per cent. of the stock, can go hardly any way towards meeting the needs of people for housing to rent. The Institute of Housing suggests that there need to be 100,000 new dwellings a year provided in Britain. The Government are providing 53,000 dwellings at best—that is just over half, and the figure is projected to go down next year, and down again the following year.

When it comes to providing information, why are the Government obsessed by a single track? Why do they not recognise people's need to rent? The Minister claims to speak of rights. Why could he not recognise the right to rent, and include that in the information to which this clause and the amendment refer?

I suggest, as we did in the Standing Committee on the Bill, that, instead of a rents-to-mortgage scheme, what is most needed in the present context is a scheme that takes people from mortgages to rents. That way perhaps we would not be in the ludicrous position whereby people faced with repossession lose their home and may go into a hostel or other housing accommodation. Then along comes a housing association with a housing market package, buys the property and suggests to the local authority that it can put a homeless person into it.

The difficulty is that people might not get back into the home which belonged to them and which they built up. Why not leave the family in their home and convert their mortgage into rent? That could be done with a bit of arithmetic, and would make far more sense than the Government's proposals for turning rent into mortgages.

There are great difficulties in understanding the rents-to-mortgage scheme. I will not take the House through them now, but the arithmetic and the exclusion of people on housing benefit—to mention but two points—mean that the scheme is not only little understood but creates real dangers. Private lenders have first charge on the property and, if those low-income owners fall behind on what will then be described as their rent—that is, their mortgage—they will find that the property can be repossessed. That ought to be spelt out plainly in the information to tenants.

I suggest to the Minister that, in the booklets or information passed back to tenants, he should spell out that shared ownership, which the rents-to-mortgage scheme is effectively now to replace, offered tenants a better and a more secure deal.

[Mr. Battle]

The Institute of Housing, in its response to the Department of the Environment consultation paper on the rents-to-mortgage scheme said that it was the wrong scheme at the wrong time, that it was ill conceived and inappropriate, and that the eventual take-up would be minimal. We concur with that view and urge the Government, when it gives information to tenants, not to keep pressing its single-tenure obsession. We need flexible tenure in Britain so that people can move within their lifetimes from renting to owning and back to renting, perhaps part-sharing or part-owning. They should not be locked into a form of tenure. Over the past 14 years, by pushing owner-occupation, the Government have developed, not a two-way flow and a flexible tenure, but a one-way street to owner-occupation, which is proving to be a cul-de-sac of repossession for far too many people.

I suggest that, as we set out in our document only last Friday, flexible tenure is what is needed in Britain, not a lock-in to owner-occupation. If the Government were to give tenants fair information on their real rights, they would include the right to rent, set out all the options, and, as it were, open up flexibility of tenures in Britain. They should not continue—as I believe that the Minister does not really want to, because he does occasionally make comments to the effect that we need to develop the rented sector as well—on the present course, in which the system is clogged up and homes are empty while people are homeless.

Sir George Young: I will begin by answering a question that the hon. Gentleman posed at the outset of his speech.

Yes, the amendment will require local authority landlords to reissue annually the information, not just about the right to buy, but about other statutory rights. Local authority tenants already have the right to rent; they are secure tenants, and when they take out a lease from their local authority their rights are set out quite clearly.

The hon. Gentleman touched on two groups of people, the first being leaseholders in high-rise flats, who sometimes find it difficult to sell because the incoming purchaser finds it difficult to get a mortgage.

My hon. Friend and I are continuing to have discussions with the Council of Mortgage Lenders to see whether we can find a way through this problem, which, although not widespread, is a real problem for the people concerned.

Mr. Battle: I am grateful for the Minister's response on that point. It is the response which he gave us some five months ago. I appreciate that he is meeting the Council of Mortgage Lenders, but can he assure me that he is also meeting local authorities, many of whom feel that, at the end of the day, it will be up to them, particularly in tower blocks, to take back the properties and turn people's mortgages into rent, in order to solve that problem?

Sir George Young: The answer is yes, because the local authorities are the freeholders of these blocks of flats and have an interest in any difficulties that may face the leaseholders living in them. Those discussions are continuing.

The bulk of the hon. Gentleman's remarks were about the rent-to-mortgage scheme. Once again, we saw the hon. Gentleman sitting very firmly on the fence. He does not want to condemn the rent-to-mortgage scheme in case it turns out to be a wild success, like the right-to-buy scheme, but he finds it impossible to endorse it. I find that slightly strange, because only last week the Labour party put out a document entitled "Labour's charter for flexible tenure", and one of the things it says is:

"We want to see the end to the old division between rented and owner-occupied housing. There should be circumstances where people can change tenure without having to change their home."

That is exactly what the rent-to-mortgage scheme ensures. I cannot understand why someone who is in favour of flexibility of tenure finds it impossible to endorse the rent-to-mortgage scheme.

The hon. Gentleman knows that we have made no forecasts of the take-up of this scheme. We are in the business of extending choice and opportunity to local authority tenants. It is then up to them to decide whether they want to take the opportunity that we have made available to them under the rent-to-mortgage scheme.

I take it from what the hon. Gentleman says that he has no particular objection to amendment No. 170, which simply requires local authorities to set out annually to tenants their statutory rights, so I hope that the House can now approve the amendment.

PROVISION OF HOUSING WELFARE SERVICES

Lords amendment: No. 174, in page 115, line 44, at end insert—

("(4) The powers conferred by this section shall not be regarded as restricting those conferred by section 137 of the Local Government Act 1972 (powers to incur expenditure for purposes not authorised by any other enactment) and accordingly the reference to any other enactment in subsection (1)(a) of that section shall not include a reference to this section.")

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.—[Sir George Young.]

Ms Ann Coffey (Stockport): The Minister will remember the discussion in Committee about the effect of immediate transfer of the cost of warden services from the housing revenue account to the general fund, and the effect that that might have on the provision of those services.

I want to explore further some of the difficulties of the original clause by reference to the situation in my constituency.

Stockport provides a warden care call service to its tenants which is currently being converted to a speech-based telephone system. That scheme is provided to 1,783 council tenants, of whom 1,341 live in group schemes—special accommodation for the elderly. Wardens monitor and respond to calls and visits. All tenants are visited weekly and 15 per cent. of tenants are visited daily. This year there is a demand for a further 12 schemes for a total of 218 elderly people. The number of elderly people is increasing, and they often live alone—the care call offers them safety and peace of mind. Demand for the care call service is likely to increase.

At present, the cost of warden services is mainly provided through the housing revenue account. There are differentials in rent multipliers because the accommodation with access to the care call warden system is special accommodation, but the differentials do not fully reflect the cost of the provision. It seems that, from 1 April 1994, the Government intend to transfer from the housing revenue account to the general fund the cost of essential care services managed by the housing wardens. The definition of essential care is assistance with personal care, feeding, dressing and getting up. In Stockport that is unlikely to be a significant cost of the housing wardens service.

What is not clear at present is what, when or whether the Department of the Environment may issue regulations that would effectively lead local authorities to meet the cost of warden and care alarm services, which are not defined as essential care, through a service charge with the rent. The question is whether such a service charge would be eligible for housing benefit.

In general, the charge will qualify for housing benefit only if it is an essential requirement of the accommodation. If some degree of choice for tenants is involved, that service charge may not be eligible for housing benefit. If it is not, it will mean that the cost of the warden service will transfer to the general fund because certain tenants, including the elderly and frail, will not be able to afford the service charge. Clearly the authority will have to provide that service. If it cannot do so through the housing revenue account and tenants have no access to housing benefit, the cost will have to be provided through the general fund.

The issue caused me much concern because, as the Minister must realise, social services departments are under extreme pressure to cut their budgets in the forthcoming year. I would be concerned if, either directly or indirectly, the cost of those services was transferred to the general fund. That might well result in the dimunition of the provision of the present service to elderly people at a time when there is a growing elderly population, we are seeking to keep more people in the community and a crucial part of community care is the accommodation that those people are offered.

I appreciate that there is a long-standing argument about what constitutes housing welfare and what degree of responsibility a housing authority has to provide welfare to its tenants. The housing authority is not responsible merely for the maintenance of bricks and mortar—it must take into account the welfare needs of its tenants. Rightly or wrongly, over the years the welfare housing needs of elderly people have been met in countless authorities through care call warden services provided from the housing revenue account. Any sudden shift in responsibility for that provision would have disastrous consequences for the provision of care call and warden services to the elderly.

When he considers the amendment—resulting provisions will be provided through regulations—I hope that the Minister will carefully consider the position of elderly tenants and social services departments. I hope that he will introduce regulations to transfer the cost over a period so that it is affordable for both the housing and the social services departments. He must also ensure that elderly people continue to receive the same level of provision as they have in the past. That provision is crucial for them and in great demand by them.

Sir George Young: I can give the hon. Member for Stockport (Ms. Coffey) the assurance that she sought: there is no question of there being a sudden shift in responsibility for those services. We are talking about a vulnerable group of people and important services. There will be no turbulence in the continued delivery of those services.

Following the Ealing judgment, there was some doubt about whether local authorities had the powers, through the housing account, to pay for services. Clause 113 validates the status quo and gives local housing authorities the power to provide welfare services for their tenants. The amendment is merely a tidying amendment to ensure that the authorities can go on providing certain services for the private sector.

The Government have been consulting and have received more than 200 representations. We are currently considering the outcome of that exercise. As the hon. Lady implied, the subject is complicated. It is not merely a question of deciding what constitutes a housing service and what constitutes a welfare service; it also involves the knock-on effect on housing benefit.

The Government are not minded to take dramatic action, for the reasons outlined by the hon. Lady. A number of options are available to us. One option would be to wait until local Government responsibilities are reorganised and we move to unitary authorities. We could take that opportunity to clarify the division of responsibilities between housing services and social services.

There should be no disruption to services to tenants. That principle will inspire us as we resolve the matter. I hope that the hon. Lady will accept my assurance.

Question put and agreed to.—[Special entry.]

MANAGEMENT AGREEMENTS

Lords amendment: No. 175, in page 116, line 39, leave out from beginning to ("there") in line 40 and insert

("At the end of subsection (3) of section 27 of the 1985 Act (management agreements), there shall be inserted the words "and shall contain such provisions as may be prescribed by regulations made by the Secretary of State".

(1A) For subsection (5) of that section")

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.—[Sir George Young.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Morris): With this it will be convenient to discuss Lords amendments Nos. 182 and 183.

Mr. Straw: These amendments and amendment No. 181 involve compulsory competitive tendering for housing management. Therefore, it may be for the convenience of the House if I address my remarks to both groups of amendments. I hope that the Minister agrees. I congratulate him on his elevation to Her Majesty's Privy Council.

One of the major contentions between the Opposition and the Government when the issue was discussed earlier was the fact that the Government proposed to enforce compulsory competitive tendering for housing management and to remove the tenants' right of veto which they possessed under section 27 of the Housing Act 1985. Under that Act, they had the power to veto a change in the management of their housing. The matter was considered at great length in Committee, in the House and in their Lordships' House.

With one exception—which is dealt with by Lords amendment No. 181—the Government stuck to their original position. They went through the rigmarole of explaining why a tenant's right of veto was no longer necessary and why, if it was necessary, the tenant's veto would be dealt with through other means. The Government did not offer much clarity over whether they wanted the veto or not.

The Government first claimed—as Lord Strathclyde did in another place—that the veto was unnecessary because there was no proposal to change the landlord's or the tenant's basic rights under compulsory competitive tendering for housing, whereas there would be proposals to do so in the parallel cases involving housing action trusts or large-scale voluntary transfers.

Our view, which I believe was widely shared in the other place, was that, in practice, a competitive tendering process that led to the management of housing responsibilities being transferred to a private company involved at least as substantial a transfer as a large-scale voluntary transfer—which usually results in transferring responsibility for housing management to the same people as before. In a sense, it is in practice a larger transfer than that which is occasioned under a housing action trust, where tenants now have the right to go back to the local authority at the end of the period.

Having dealt with that point, Ministers in another place argued that the veto was unnecessary, as tenants were being given better rights to consultation and involvement. I am always very suspicious of such arguments. I am always suspicious when a categorical right is removed, when one hears weasel words from Ministers—even words as elegant as those that dropped from the lips of the now right hon. Gentleman. Ministers may admit that a specific right is indeed being taken away but say that anyone going through the small print will see that tenants may be consulted. The truth is that tenants will no longer have the clear veto right that they enjoy under the current law. We believe that that right should be continued.

We believe that the determination to remove tenants' veto rights in respect of housing management—rights that are enjoyed in respect of compulsory competitive tendering and large-scale voluntary transfers—springs from the fact that the Government attach much more importance to the privatisation of public services than to the protection of tenants' rights.

In these debates we have tried to flush out the rights to which Ministers give priority. Do the Government regard as more important the right of tenants to a say in the running of their estate or the right of private firms bidding for the management of local authority housing stock? If there is a conflict, does profit come far above the rights of tenants? I am not suggesting that this is necessarily the Minister's own view. Indeed, it is likely that, if he were in control of Government policy, he would have scarcely nothing to do with privatisation and the rest of the now-rotting Thatcherite agenda, to which he is tied. In fact, we saw his attitude when the lady was still in office. As a Minister, however, he has to support pernicious nonsense of this type.

7.30 pm

Lords amendment No. 181 deals with management agreements and compulsory competitive tendering. The Government's concession is that the new clause imports into the Bill the provisions of section 27A of the Housing Act 1985, which previously had been removed altogether. At first glance, this is certainly progress and represents Ministers' recognition of the force of our argument. However, we still have very considerable anxiety about the operation of this provision, and I hope that he will be able to put our minds at rest.

Our first anxiety concerns the breadth of the power being given to the Secretary of State under what will be section 27A(2) of the 1985 Act, which might be described as a Henry VIII provision. Subsection (2) provides:

> "The Secretary of State may by regulations provide that . . . the provisions of section 27A shall have effect with such modifications as appear to the Secretary of State to be necessary or expedient."

The Secretary of State is being given power to use subordinate legislation as a means of modifying a provision of an Act. Both Houses of Parliament have always been extremely reluctant to give a Secretary of State power to amend primary legislation by edict unless the circumstances are very clear.

Some hon. Members will remember the debates on the provision that started out as clause 222—but ended up as something different—of the Education Reform Bill of 1988. In that case, the Secretary of State was given power to amend employment legislation very widely by regulation and without further notice to the House. In what respect is it intended that section 27A of the 1985 Act shall be modified? It is important that hon. Members know what is being talked about when they are invited to accede to Lords amendment No. 181.

The second issue concerns the extent of management agreements and the application of section 27A to compulsory competitive tendering. My understanding of the proposed section 27AA is that the tenant's right of veto will operate in respect of management agreements. It seems to me that, where there is a voluntary arrangement for the management of a local authority's housing stock, it will be subject to a tenant's veto. Perhaps the Minister will be able to clarify something about which I am not clear. If there is a compulsory arrangement, will section 27A apply? In this context, I hope that the Minister will be able to define "management agreement" and say whether such an agreement includes the notion of a service agreement.

The right hon. Gentleman will know that there has been some argument about this matter. My understanding is that Rutland and Brent have sought to evade the more stringent procedural requirements by defining as service agreements those that amount to management agreements. That practice is unacceptable to us, and I hope that it is unacceptable to the Minister. If, under Lords amendment No. 181, tenants are being given a right that some local authorities are able, with malign intent, to evade by means of such redefinition of agreements for the purposes of the veto, that will defeat the object and frustrate Government policy by the back door.

I may want, with the permission of the Chair and the leave of the House, to return to this issue after the Minister's reply.

Sir George Young: The hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw) has raised a number of issues—the tenant's veto, compulsory competitive tendering for housing management, and some technical matters relating to Lords amendment No. 181. He drew on an article in the 21 May issue of Inside Housing.

Mr. Straw: No.

Sir George Young: That was certainly the source, although the hon. Gentleman did not refer specifically to it.

The tenants' veto was a matter that we spent some time discussing in Committee. I do not thing that this issue has exactly set the country alight since January. Tenants now have a deeper understanding of what the Government plan to do. The veto question concerns the removal by the Bill of the requirement on the Secretary of State to withhold his approval of a housing management delegation if it appears to him that a majority of tenants in the area to which the agreement relates do not want to proceed with it. We must keep in mind the new environment in which housing management agreements are now being sought. Full consultation with tenants will be standard; tenants are increasingly involved, often seeking to manage their own homes. Local authorities are also actively looking for new ways to deliver services and looking to the private sector to help them with that.

All these developments are good for housing management and, above all, for tenants, many of whom enjoy the benefits of improved and more cost-effective services. In addition, there will be housing management compulsory competitive tendering, which is, in effect, being introduced under the Local Government Act 1988. When a local authority intends to keep its housing management in-house, it will have to follow a competitive process.

I was asked what would happen if there were a conflict between tenants' right to manage and CCT. The answer is that if tenants want to take over responsibility for management, that takes precedence. The local authority then does not have to pursue CCT. Tenants can take over responsibility for managing their estate—there is provision for a break clause in any existing agreement—so to that extent, they take precedence over CCT.

The effect of CCT——

Mr. Straw: I am grateful for that undertaking. Under the Bill, tenants have no right of veto over candidates in the competitive process—is that right?

Sir George Young: The hon. Gentleman is right, but there will be much more tenant involvement and consultation than at present. For instance, tenants will be consulted on specifications and they will be involved in monitoring the contract. We are trying to build a constructive, on-going, meaningful relationship between tenants and local authorities, rather than using the blunt instrument of a veto.

Tenants will have rights to consultation on the terms of management agreements, including those resulting from CCT. Local authorities will have to consult tenants on the standards of service proposed—for example, on the specification for the delegation. The authority has to consider the tenants' representations before it can make any decisions on the terms—that is, before it can invite tenders. Tenants will be involved in monitoring a contractor's performance, and the Secretary of State can also say in more detail how that consultation should be run.

The Government's case is that this represents an extensive package of rights, which give tenants a good opportunity to influence the management of their homes in a positive and beneficial way. That is more meaningful than giving them a rather blunt choice between yes or no at the end of a process.

Mr. Battle: What the Minister has said seems to give tenants some say after the event. Will they have the right to reject the choice of a managing agent who they are not convinced will properly manage their estate? Will they be involved at that primary stage?

Sir George Young: No; tenants will not be able to impose a veto on the successful candidate after the process has been gone through, but they will have rights to consultation on the terms of an agreement, including those resulting from CCT—and they will be involved in monitoring the contract.

I hope that anyone thinking of putting in a bid for a contract will contact the tenants' representatives and organisations to gain some insight into what they want and to build a constructive relationship with the tenants on an estate. The introduction of a ballot would be clumsy and ineffectual, and would provide no positive value for the quality of housing management. We want authorities to involve tenants in all stages of the process of selecting contractors, as far as practicable.

The Bill provides for tenants to be consulted on drawing up the contract specification and the identity of the contractor, and to be involved in monitoring his performance. It will be open to authorities to involve tenants in helping to choose the successful contractor, subject to the usual requirements of commercial confidentiality, and we shall encourage them to do so. That is as far as I can go to meet the hon. Gentleman's point.

CCT for housing management is about improving the quality of life for people on our council estates. As housing management is exposed increasingly to the disciplines and business practices of the private sector, the fresh wind of competition will blow through estates up and down the land, raising standards and improving value for money.

Of course, it is true that local authority housing management has improved in recent years, but there are still too many estates where management breakdown is evident, with empty properties boarded up for long periods or taken over by squatters, and with common areas displaying numerous signs of neglect—lifts not working, rubbish chutes blocked, vandalism, litter and graffiti.

This grim picture is all too familiar. Tenants are not getting the deal they deserve. We are determined to ensure that the standards in the worst authorities and on the worst estates are raised to those of the best. It can be done. Some local authority services have been subject to CCT for more than 10 years. The improvement in the standard of service delivery has been plain for all to see; so have the savings in costs—6 per cent. across the board. It would be wholly wrong to deny the benefits of competition to housing management——

7.45 pm

Mr. Raynsford: Will the Minister give way?

Sir George Young: Yes, when I get to the end of this moving passage.

The experience of the Conservative-controlled London borough of Wandsworth underlines the point. It has already put its housing management out to competition, and its tenants and council tax payers have reaped the benefits. If one of the best-run and most tightly managed authorities in the country can achieve significant savings, I invite hon. Members to think what others can do.

Mr. Raynsford: I am grateful to the Minister for giving way after that moving passage. He has shown his commitment to Wandsworth; but will he tell us what representations he and the Department have received from tenants all over the country who have said that they want to retain the ultimate right of veto because, without it, they cannot say no to an unsatisfactory contractor? Why will he not accept that tenants should have that right; why will he not give it to them, to ensure that they have real power instead of this charade of consultation?

Sir George Young: The hon. Gentleman asked Ministers the same question several times in Committee and on Report. He knows the answer perfectly well: we do not think that it would be right for tenants to be able to veto the improvement in standards that we want. There is often a rather cosy relationship between the activists in tenants' associations and the local authority trade unions, and we would not want that to stand in the way of higher standards on estates.

Mr. Battle: Why is there a ballot for tenant management organisations at the initial stage when the Minister is not willing to grant one before a management agency is chosen?

Sir George Young: There is a ballot for TMOs because they have put up their hands to take over the management of estates in the name of all the tenants there. It is therefore legitimate to establish whether they have a mandate, to determine whether the tenants' organisation is truly representative. I have just explained that that does not provide a parallel with giving tenants the veto with which to block the process of housing management CCT.

Lords amendment No. 181 inserts a new clause dealing with consultation on management agreements under CCT. Without it, clause 117 would still apply to delegation under CCT, but there are enough differences between the procedures that an authority would follow when delegating voluntarily and those that it would follow under CCT to merit specific mention of the CCT case. That is what the new clause does. Because of the differences in procedure, some modifications to the consultation arrangements will be necessary.

Clause 117, for example, refers to consultation when an authority proposes to enter into an agreement. However, under CCT, when an authority wants to do the work itself, it will propose to enter into an agreement only and when it has lost a tendering exercise. That would be far too late for consultation on the terms of the agreement, so the new clause will allow the Secretary of State to take the procedure back in time to when the authority is going to invite tenders under the CCT legislation.

The Government's intention is that, where there is CCT, tenants should not lack any of the rights enjoyed by tenants where there is a voluntary delegation. The amendments would enable that to happen. I hope that they are not controversial.

Mr. Straw: Will there be consultation with local authority associations and tenants' representatives about the draft regulations that will bring the legislation into effect?

Sir George Young: Yes. We hope to lay the regulations by April and shall consult on many of the aspects of housing management before we take a decision. We shall consult representatives of tenants and local authorities.

Although the hon. Gentleman did not mention the publication he referred to an article that appeared in a recent edition of Inside Housing about the Bill's tenant consultation provisions. The Government propose that certain aspects of housing management should be defined activities for CCT purposes. Those defined activities will have to be put out to tender if an authority intends to carry out the work itself. Any resulting agreement will be a management agreement and the normal consultation procedures will apply.

CCT will not enable authorities to enter into management agreements without consultation. We do not accept that there is a potential loophole. Where management functions are delegated, a management agreement will arise. Therefore, I do not share the hon. Gentleman's fears that it will be possible to get around the provisions of the legislation.

Mr. Straw: The Minister is something of a Jekyll and Hyde character, and when he speaks to a script he sounds like a combination of Dr. Hastings Banda and Mr. Alan Clark. He treated us to the most extraordinary statement when he said that tenants could not be trusted. It reminds me of the way in which the great Dr. Banda—for the benefit of those who read my remarks rather than listen to them, I should say that I use the word "great" ironically—has managed to resist any semblance of democracy in Malawi for the past 30 years on the ground that, if the peasants had the right to vote, they might exercise it against him and his interests. We had a flavour of that from the Minister.

There was a wonderful elision between the assertion that tenants associations may not be representative, which is true in some cases, and the implicit assertion—with which we were all invited to agree—that, because some tenants associations may not be representative, a secret ballot of all tenants was likely to result in an unrepresentative verdict of what the tenants wanted. That is an extraordinary assertion for a democrat.

That was the Hastings Banda part of the Minister's speech, and before that we heard the Alan Clark part. The Minister has only one attribute in common with Alan Clark. I make it clear that it has nothing whatever to do with the Minister's private life. I almost said the late Mr. Alan Clark, but that hope has not yet materialised for Conservative Members. The Minister and Mr. Clark share the entertaining ability to mock their own speeches when they do not believe a word of them.

The Minister made some cerebral remarks about the right of veto and CCT. He changed to auto-pilot when reading from a passage which he obviously found unconvincing and revolting. He described it as a moving passage, but he was unmoved. The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office is seeking to ensure that compulsory competitive tendering is applied in Malawi if Dr. Hastings Banda is still there after today's vote. That would be consistent with the support that the Foreign and Commonwealth Office has been extending to the puppet regime in Malawi for so long.

The Minister said that CCT was intended to improve the quality of life for tenants and provide a "fresh wind of competition" for them. Tenants can themselves decide whether they want an improvement in their quality of life. If they vote for it, that is fine, because they are the only judges of that. They should have CCT imposed on them if that is their wish, and if about 90 per cent. of them vote for all kinds of other horrors, so be it. The democratic principle is that the majority should decide, and the tenants have a right to decide on their quality of life: decisions should not be imposed by Ministers.

The Minister sped through what he called the moving passage, which contained a reference to empty properties. In the light of the report that I published about four or five weeks ago on empty Government properties, I hope that we shall not have any more dissembling from the Minister on that issue. Some 15 per cent. of the properties for which the Minister and his colleagues are responsible are empty. The Government have 25,000 empty properties and Opposition Members, such as my hon. Friend the Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Mr. Jamieson) are doing their damnedest to get some of those empty properties out of the Ministry of Defence and other Ministries, but are running into one blockage after another.

Local authorities, and especially Labour local authorities, have on the whole an excellent record on the management of empty properties. No authority has more than 4 per cent. of its total stock empty for management reasons. That means that the properties are empty and available to let or empty and available to let after minor repairs.

Earlier this year, the Minister spoke on the Walden programme and tried to pretend that Manchester had 5,000 empty properties. I hope that he will apologise to Manchester for the way in which he traduced its record, because it does not have 5,000 empty properties available to let as he sought to imply. Some 5,000 properties on its books do not have tenants, but about 1,500 of those are in the Hulme district and were put up, not least on the suggestion of speculative industrial builders—all of them contributors to Tory funds—in the 1960s. Those properties are uninhabitable. One would not put a pig in them, and if the Minister had bothered to go on a tour of Manchester, he would know that they are being demolished.

Another 1,500 properties in Manchester are in desperate need of major repairs, but they cannot be carried out, thanks to the Government's parsimony—the Governments's refusal to allow authorities to use capital receipts accrued before the end of November 1992. Those properties are empty, not because of inefficiency by Manchester city council but directly because of Government policy. When allowances are made for that, far from having an unacceptable record, Manchester has about 2 per cent. of empty properties, which is about average. That percentage is well below the percentage in Redbridge, which still has a large stock of housing. That is not an authority like Tonbridge and Malling; it is Conservative-controlled.

The record of Labour housing authorities generally is the best in the land. It is far better than that of the private sector or the owner-occupied sector, a little better than that of housing associations and infinitely better than that of central Government.

Mr. George Howarth (Knowsley, North): My hon. Friend spoke about the so-called woeful reputation of Manchester. Knowsley is constantly trotted out as being among the top 10 worst authorities for vacant properties. The properties that are empty there are mostly being decanted, and they are mostly blocks of flats that are to be handed over to housing associations. The Under-Secretary of State is aware of that, because he visited the area and was told about it. Despite that, the Government still trot out statistics purporting to show that Knowsley is performing badly.

Mr. Straw: My hon. Friend is right. The point that Ministers have made—that mandatory and compulsory competitive tendering should be supported even when the tenants do not want it—is based on the grounds that, somehow, the tenants need to be saved from the record of their local authorities. To support their case, Ministers have said that there are thousands upon thousands of empty properties, which housing authorities—typically, Labour authorities—are failing properly to manage and are leaving empty. The figures tell a different story.

It is something of a compliment to Labour authorities that, to try to damn their records, Ministers have had to fiddle the figures and drag into them not only the properties that are empty and ought to be let, but all those that are empty and uninhabitable, empty and in need of major repair or empty and awaiting transfer to a housing association, housing action trust or large-scale voluntary transfer.

If the Minister responds to this short debate, I hope that he will apologise for the way in which he has traduced the reputation of housing authorities, and that he will instruct Conservative central office—if he has any influence with that strange body—not to put out any more misleading information about the record of Labour housing authorities. I think that Ministers are learning that such statements from Conservative central office have a habit of boomeranging and returning to Conservative authorities. That has been the case on fraud and corruption and on value for money. The right hon. Member for Sutton Coldfield (Sir N. Fowler) was rash enough before the county elections to talk about them being fought on value for money. He got his answer on 6 May. That will also be the case here.

Sir George Young: The hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw) is wrong in what he says about management voids. The figures that I published were for management voids. That left out the properties that are derelict for other reasons. I gave those figures at Question Time a fortnight ago. They represent management voids and were exactly the figures for which the hon. Gentleman asked. I have no intention of apologising to Manchester city council. It gave me the figures that I used. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will consider apologising to Suffolk Coastal and Tunbridge Wells, each of which has transferred nearly the whole of its housing stock but has a handful of voids —two, I think, in one case.

[Sir George Young]

By fiddling the figures, the hon. Gentleman has pretended that Suffolk Coastal was a worse housing authority than Lambeth or Hackney. He confused no one with that mischievous allegation. It is clear from listening to him that he is not concerned with improving standards for tenants. He is much more interested in protecting trade union monopolies. I hope that the House will agree to all the amendments.

Question put and agreed to.

Lords amendments Nos. 176 to 180 agreed to.

New clause

MANAGEMENT AGREEMENTS AND COMPULSORY COMPETITIVE TENDERING

Lords amendment: No. 181, after clause 117 insert the following new clause—

(". After section 27A of the 1985 Act there shall be inserted the following section—

"Management agreements and compulsory competitive tendering

27AA.—(1) This section shall apply if the Secretary of State makes an order under section 2(3) of the Local Government Act 1988 ('the 1988 Act') providing for the exercise of any management functions to be a defined activity for the purposes of Part I of that Act (compulsory competitive tendering).

(2) The Secretary of State may by regulations provide that in any case where—

(a) a local housing authority propose to make an invitation to carry out any functional work in accordance with the rules set out in subsection (4) of section 7 of the 1988 Act (functional work: conditions), and

(b) the proposal is such that any decision by the authority that the work should be carried out by the person or one of the persons proposed to be invited would necessarily involve their entering into a management agreement with that person, the provisions of section 27A shall have effect with such modifications as appear to the Secretary of State to be necessary or expedient.

(3) Nothing in section 6 of the 1988 Act (functional work: restrictions) shall apply in relation to any functional work which, in pursuance of a management agreement, is carried out by the manager as agent of the local housing authority.

(4) In this section 'functional work' has the same meaning as in Part I of the 1988 Act.

(5) Regulations under this section shall be made by statutory instrument which shall be subject to annulment in pursuance of a resolution of either House of Parliament."")

Motion made, and Question put, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment:—

New clause

CALCULATION OF HOUSING REVENUE ACCOUNT SUBSIDY

Lords amendment: No. 189, after clause 125 insert the following new clause—

(". In subsection (1) of section 80 of the Local Government and Housing Act 1989 (determination of formulae for calculating Housing Revenue Account subsidy), the words 'and for any year the first such determination shall be made before the 25th December immediately preceding that year' shall cease to have effect.")

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.—[Sir George Young.]

Madam Deputy Speaker: With this, we may take Lords amendments Nos. 217, 278 and 283.

Mr. Pike: Can the Minister explain why the change involving the date of 25 December has been made? Is it connected with the change in Budget arrangements, under which tax and benefit provisions will both be announced in November, or is it because the Government have rarely achieved the 25 December target and are therefore regularising the position?

As I am sure the Minister will recognise, given all the implications for local authorities, it is essential that we dispense with a system that is increasingly causing all local authorities considerable difficulties, regardless of which party is in control. Many key decisions affect their budgets when they are compelled to comply with legislation according to a rigid timetable. Many of the key factors affected by Government decisions are announced increasingly late, which makes it increasingly difficult for councils to meet their statutory requirements.

Sir George Young: As the hon. Gentleman implied, the amendments are indeed about the arrangements for the unified Budget. The background to the amendments was the announcement in last year's Budget speech that the Government have decided to change the annual Budget timetable so that tax and spending proposals can in future be presented to Parliament at the same time in the form of a unified Budget. The Government are planning on the basis that the date of the unified Budget this year will be no later than the last week of November.

We are required by legislation to consult representatives of local government on the proposed subsidy determinations before they are issued in final form, but we generally have to await the Chancellor's unified Budget announcement of Government spending plans before doing so. In such circumstances, there will be insufficient time after the unified Budget announcement to allow authorities a reasonable period in which to comment on the draft determinations and for my right hon. Friend to consider those comments and then issue the determinations in their final form before the 25 December deadline. Hence the need for the amendment.

In response to the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Pike), I can say that every effort will be made to issue the subsidy determinations as soon as possible after Christmas. The Department has stated its intention to do so by 10 January. That has been made possible by the helpful suggestion of local government representatives, which the Government have accepted, to shorten the consultation period on the draft determinations so that it can end before Christmas.

Representation of the People Bill

Order for Second Reading read.

8.26 pm

The Minister of State for the Armed Forces (Mr. Jeremy Hanley): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

I shall explain the background briefly. Members of the Ulster Defence Regiment—the UDR—were regarded as part of the reserve and auxiliary forces and registered as civilian electors. Following the merger of the UDR and the Royal Irish Rangers to form the Royal Irish Regiment, the home service component of the regiment became part of the Regular Army. As members of the regular forces, the Representation of the People Act 1983 confers on those who now enlist as full-time home service personnel a service qualification; hence, they may register only as service voters. It is illegal for them to register as civilian voters.

As for part-time members of the home service battalions, it is possible to argue that their liability for call-out renders them part of a reserve and auxiliary force and therefore exempt from the provisions for service voting. All personnel serving our existing UDR engagements may continue to register as civilian voters.

Our concern is that, under the electoral system in Northern Ireland, canvassers who are not security cleared distribute and collect registration forms from households. Home service personnel who had enlisted since the merger would have to tell the canvassers that they were no longer eligible for registration on the standard civilian voter registration form and that, coupled with the eventual appearance of their names on the completed register, could lead to their identification as home service personnel.

I in no way wish to cast doubt on the integrity of canvassers, who do a very difficult job very well, but it is possible to conceive of a risk, and it is only prudent to take measures to remove it. After study, we concluded that it would best be done by amending the Representation of the People Act 1983.

A secondary consideration is that the service voter arrangements are meant to assist service personnel serving overseas and home service personnel serve only in Northern Ireland, except during some limited periods of training. The Bill provides for amendment to the definition of who constitutes a member of the armed forces in section 59(1) of the 1983 Act. Because of the exclusion of home service personnel from the definition, they will be able to continue to register as civilian voters. The reference to a member of the Regular Army means that officers and soldiers are included and the amendment extends to full and part-time home service personnel, thus removing any doubt about the position in law of part-timers.

In order that the changes may be put into effect before the annual registration round, which begins in August, we seek commencement on Royal Assent. I therefore commend this short Bill to the House.

8.29 pm

Mr. Eric Martlew (Carlisle): I congratulate the Minister on his new appointment. I understand that he was under fire on Friday and I look forward to doing battle with him, probably on Thursday, about Britain's defence policy—but not tonight.

It is not late at night, so we can spend a long time debating the Bill. Nevertheless, the issue is not contentious, and I therefore do not intend to delay the House. The Bill is one of those commonsense measures that should be dealt with administratively. I understand that the Government investigated that possibility but found that it was not possible. The necessary adjustments must, therefore, be put before the House. I understand that there is some urgency and that the Bill must be given Royal Assent by August, otherwise we will not be able to complete the necessary adjustments to the electoral register in Northern Ireland. The fact that the Bill must be rushed through shows that perhaps there was an oversight on the part of the Government.

I said earlier that the Bill is a common-sense measure, but it reflects the level of terrorism and violence on the Northern Irish scene in the past 25 years. It surely cannot be acceptable that soldiers serving their country must hide their occupation to avoid assassination, but that is the sad reality. In the 22-year history of the Ulster Defence Regiment, 244 soldiers or former soldiers were murdered by terrorists. Most of them were murdered off duty, and some of them in front of their families. Let us not forget that the Bill is necessary because of the failure of politicians on both sides of the House and on both sides of the Irish sea to deal with the problem of terrorism.

The Labour party supports the Bill and hopes that it passes all its stages tonight, but we look forward to the time when we can ask for its repeal and when there is peace in Ulster.

Sir James Kilfedder (North Down): I welcome the Minister to the Dispatch Box in his new capacity of Minister of State for the Armed Forces. It is a matter of regret that he has left the Northern Ireland Office, where he served the people of Northern Ireland well. We wish to congratulate him and hope that he will have further success in his new capacity.

The Royal Irish Regiment, the successor to the Ulster Defence Regiment, and its members face death daily and nightly and everything must be done to protect them from further hazard, which is why the Bill is welcome and should progress speedily.

As the hon. Member for Carlisle (Mr. Martlew) said, the Ulster Defence Regiment has suffered great losses. Many of its members have been slaughtered by the IRA. That is what the people of Northern Ireland face. We must give every protection to those who serve the people of Northern Ireland. Members of the Royal Irish Regiment show great courage in carrying out their job, which is why I give the Bill my full support.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read a Second time.

Bill committed to a Committee of the whole House.—[Mr. Wood.]

Bill immediately considered in Committee; reported, without amendment.

Order for Third Reading read.

8.35 pm

Mr. Hanley: I beg to move, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

I thank the hon. Member for Carlisle (Mr. Martlew) for his kind remarks and for his co-operation. I thank my hon. Friend the Member for North Down (Sir J. Kilfedder) for his kind remarks and, on behalf of those who are served by the Bill, I thank the House for its co-operation.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read the Third time, and passed.

EUROPEAN COMMUNITY DOCUMENTS

Motion made, and Question put forthwith pursuant to Standing Order No. 102(9) (European Standing Committees).

Fats (Marketing Standards)

That this House takes note of European Community Documents Nos. 10344/91 and 5019/93, relating to marketing standards for fats; and supports the Government's intention to seek amendments to the amended proposal in line with the conclusions on subsidiarity and proportionality already agreed by the Community.—[Mr. Wood.]

Motion made, and Question put forthwith pursuant to Standing Order No. 102(9) (European Standing Committees).

Hydrocarbons (Exploration and Extraction)

That this House takes note of European Community Document No. 4180/93, relating to licensing of exploration and extraction of hydrocarbons; and welcomes the Government's attempts to secure transparent, fully competitive and non-discriminatory access to hydrocarbon resources throughout the European Community through the adoption of the amended draft Directive.—[Mr. Wood.]

Question agreed to.

Human Rights (Tibet)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Wood.]

8.37 pm

Mr. David Alton (Liverpool, Mossley Hill): It is an unusually early hour for the House to adjourn, but I am pleased to have the opportunity of raising the issue of human rights abuse in Tibet. I am grateful to the Minister for being present and I know that one of his colleagues hopes to attend the debate and to speak.

I know that the Minister shares the concern of myself and others about the appalling catalogue of torture, imprisonment and killings that have marked China's control of Tibet.

The plight of Tibet has been highlighted in the past few months by the Dalai Lama's visit to Britain and to this place, when many Members of Parliament had the opportunity to meet him, and by the brutal Chinese reaction to the demonstrations that coincided with the European Community mission's visit to Tibet.

I am sure that the Minister will join me in welcoming the lead that the Dalai Lama has given his people. I welcome the Government's recent stance that the main avenue for a peaceful resolution of the problems in Tibet are talks without preconditions between the Dalai Lama and the Chinese authorities.

I hope that the Minister will join me condemning the attempt over the weekend to exclude the Dalai Lama from the world conference on human rights in Vienna. Could the Minister confirm that the call for exclusion came from the Chinese Government? It is an important point that the Dalai Lama was not permitted to take part in that conference, and it would be useful if the Minister could confirm who called for the Dalai Lama's exclusion.

In the light of pressure from some of the world's most tyrannical and brutal regimes to destroy the universality of human rights, could the Minister give the House an unequivocal commitment that the Government will continue to regard all human rights from the universal declaration of human rights as applying to all? Clearly, with the many abuses of human rights throughout the world, it is sometimes easy to be overcome by the sheer scale of problems, whether they are in Somalia, the Sudan or Bosnia. The fact that Tibet is a faraway place to which we have limited access, and that the world's media cannot highlight events there in the same way as they do atrocities that take place elsewhere, is not a reason for us to treat it as out of sight and out of mind.

The Dalai Lama in particular is to be congratulated on his unswerving advocacy of non-violent opposition to Chinese violence, for which he has been honoured by being awarded the Nobel peace prize. My immediate concern is that, following recent events in Lhasa, that strategy is at risk.

The Minister will be aware of the arbitrary arrests, detention without trial and tear-gassing of demonstrators that occurred before and during the visits of 16 to 23 May. He will also be aware of the wholly inadequate response given to the European Community delegation by the Chinese authorities. I want to emphasise in particular, the case of two prisoners whose welfare may well affect the future of Tibet. One is Gendon Rinchen and the other is Lobsang Yonten. They are both being held at an unspecified location, accused of stealing a large amount of state secrets.

Both men were involved in monitoring human rights violations, and may have been engaged in compiling a list of prisoners of conscience to present to the European Community delegation. The most sinister aspect of their case is that they are being held in secret. In the past, those held in that way have been subject to the most brutal torture, and these two men are now clearly in extreme danger. Therefore, it is particularly appropriate that their case should be raised tonight—not least because the European Community delegation had expected to receive information from those two men about human rights abuses.

I would also refer the Minister to the case of a 26-year-old woman, Sonam Dalar, who was tortured over six months at a detention centre in Lhasa in 1990-91. She escaped in 1991 and was able to reveal what the Chinese do to those merely suspected of political dissent. Sonam Dalar was kept naked and incommunicado in a bare underground cell. She was regularly tortured with electric batons, and was beaten and electrocuted until she lost consciousness. After six months, she was vomiting and urinating blood daily. I could mention many other similar cases were the time available. Suffice it to say, however, that among the list of detainees maltreated in Chinese prisons in Tibet for political dissent are a boy of 14 and a girl of 12.

Gendon Rinchen and Lobsang Yonten are well known in Tibet. Their cases are being widely watched and followed closely. I share the concern of groups such as the Tibet Support Group that, if the world cannot apply enough pressure on the Chinese to ensure at least the basic minimum of civilised detention, such as visits from families and details of locations at which prisoners are being held, Tibetans will reconsider their non-violent strategy on the basis that international pressure can have no effect on Communist China's attitudes to Tibet. I ask the Minister to confirm tonight that he will approach the Chinese authorities, both with a view to gaining access for British officials to visit both men and with a view to highlighting those cases.

I should also like to draw the Minister's attention to nine arrests that took place on 4 and 6 June. The latest reported protest incident in Lhasa took place on Sunday 6 June, when three monks wearing civilian clothes were arrested shortly before 2 pm in the south-east corner of Barkor, the pilgrimage route that surrounds Lhasa's main temple. The monks, whose names are not known, were shouting slogans and carrying a white banner, and—according to foreign tourists in the city who were contacted by the Tibetan independence movement—were apparently calling for independence.

A similar incident took place at about midday on Friday 4 June, when six men were arrrested a few minutes after they appeared in the Barkor square carrying Tibetan flags. One report said that the men—described by one foreign witness as about 18 years old—were in three separate groups around the square for the few minutes during which the incident lasted. The tourists, contacted by telephone in Lhasa, claimed that the men had been beaten with sticks during the 4 June arrests. According to one tourist, between 15 and 20 police in riot gear were on duty in the square during the day, which marked an important Buddhist festival. A large number of plain-clothes police were also evident on 4 June, together with security officials who, according to the report, were using "sophisticated equipment".

Individual cases such as those that I have cited tonight emphasise the wider degradation of Tibet at the hands of the Chinese—the mass population transfers of Han Chinese into Tibet and the destruction of Tibetan culture, the environmental rape of Tibet to supply Chinese factories with raw materials and the abuse of aid to Tibet, such as that provided by the World Food Programme, whose aid is administered by Chinese officials to produce food for the Chinese by methods inappropriate to Tibetan culture. That litany describes what has been happening to that small faraway country.

Let me also draw the Minister's attention to the mass abuse of Tibetan women who, along with Chinese women, are being forcibly sterilised and aborted, under laws that clearly breach the right to found a family freely. Accounts of infanticide, mass enforced late abortion and compulsory sterilisation are horrific enough. I was even more surprised to discover that, since its inception, the Chinese population control programme has been financially fuelled by the International Planned Parenthood Federation and by the United Nations Family Planning Association, and that, over the last 10 years for which figures are available, Britain contributed £104 million to that cause by funding those two organisations.

In other words, the British taxpayer contributes £7 million to £9 million a year to programmes administered by UNFPA and IPPF which have been used by Chinese population programmes forcibly to fit IUDs and to sterilise and abort women who do not comply with population targets.

In Tibet in particular, that has been used deliberately to distort the population balance. When he was here recently, the Dalai Lama highlighted that very case elsewhere in the Palace. Indeed, in the declaration that was issued by European parliamentarians who gathered here in Westminster, that was one of the things that were highlighted as running totally contrary to any system of human rights—a fact that we were urged to impress upon the Chinese Government. That is a matter about which we can do something.

I am aware of the persistent denials of forced abortion and sterilisation from the Chinese Government—denials that have been regularly supported by the IPPF and UNFPA. Those denials have about as much validity as the assertion that torture is illegal in China and Tibet and is therefore merely an aberration when it occurs.

It is a scandal that British taxpayers' money is being used by the UNFPA to manufacture IUDs which will be forcibly inserted by law into Chinese and Tibetan women. It is also a scandal that the IPPF, funded by the British Government, passes money to the Chinese family planning association, which works hand in glove with that oppressive Government.

It is absurd to talk about the family planning association in China as though it resembled a British voluntary organisation. Surely we know enough about the Chinese Government following the massacres in Tiananmen square and the recent brutal killing of a Catholic bishop—in which I know the Minister has taken a personal interest—and about the way in which ordinary people in China, especially those who try to express their religious beliefs and to worship as they would wish, have been repressed, to know that it is not possible for a voluntary organisation along the lines of those that exist in the United Kingdom to flourish in China. To be pumping money into those organisations knowing that they are simply groups that work as an adjunct of Government is extraordinarily naive, to put it at its best.

I have raised these matters with Dr. Halfdan Mahler of the IPPF, without receiving the courtesy of a reply. I have sponsored an early-day motion supported by many hon. Members on both sides of the House who are equally appalled by the abuse of human rights. I have raised it in person with the Minister for Overseas Aid. I welcome her determination to oppose and end any oppressive population control. She has been extremely helpful and interested in this matter, and I was very satisfied with the reply that both she and her officials gave me when I went to see her about the matter some months ago.

The Minister will understand that this is an issue to which I intend to continue to return. The more evidence that becomes available, the more I think that the British Government should follow the example of the previous American Administration under George Bush, who withdrew funding from those very programmes because they were convinced of the authenticity of the claims that were being made about the abuses.

Do the British Government intend to continue to fund supporters of that barbaric policy? What evidence, if any, does the Minister have of a Chinese change of heart on population control? Does he have any information about any Chinese official who has been charged, tried or imprisoned for abusing the human rights of women in that way?

It is in the nature of foreign affairs that commentators continually question the motivation of foreign policy. Is policy founded on principle or pragmatism? Do trade concerns and export policy, rather than suffering and need, dictate our overseas aid policy? Does the situation in Hong Kong dictate our response to Tibet?

There is also a recent allegation, which I am sure the Minister will take this opportunity to refute, that because the Conservative party has received donations from prominent Chinese communists, that in some way affects the Government's policy towards China. I know that the Minister is totally honourable and I would be grateful if he would place on record the fact that that kind of funding has nothing whatsoever to do with the way in which British Government policy is made.

Tibet is an issue on which the Government can and should display their moral resolve. The Prime Minister is on record as proclaiming that overseas aid is tied to human rights performance. We provide aid to China and Tibet by numerous national and international avenues. Has the Foreign Office pointed out to Chinese officials that aid can be withdrawn if there are not tangible improvements in their human rights record?

Representations have been made to the Chinese on human rights in Tibet since that country was invaded. What success can the Minister claim for his current policy? What benchmarks and targets does he set himself when considering China's abuse of human rights? I suggest that greater determination in pursuing that cause would yield results. For example, I applauded the visit of the delegation led by Lord Howe to China last year to discuss human rights.

I was delighted with the wide consultation that preceded the visit with non-governmental organisations working to improve human rights in that country. We were told that the delegation would hopefully be followed by a similar visit to Tibet. More than eight months after the visit, the delegation's report has still not been published, there has been no report back to NGOs, and all talk of a visit to Tibet has ceased. Can the Minister give assurances tonight that those matters will be speedily resolved?

Mere representations to the Government who perpetrated the Tiananmen square massacre are not enough. The Chinese must be shown that we mean business and that their aid will be threatened if there are not substantial improvements in the way they treat the people under their control in China and Tibet.

I hope that this Government will have the moral courage to make that commitment on behalf of the terrorised, the tortured and the imprisoned in one of the last communist tyrannies in the world. I am extremely grateful for the opportunity to raise this matter in this Adjournment debate.

8.52 pm

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. Alastair Goodlad): The hon. Member for Liverpool, Mossley Hill (Mr. Alton) is well known and widely respected in this House and outside for his interest in Tibet and in human rights issues generally. I am indebted to him for bringing these important matters to the attention of the House.

May I begin by assuring the hon. Gentleman once again that human rights, particularly in Tibet, are of deep concern to the Government and are a central element in our dialogue with the Chinese authorities. The hon. Gentleman has rightly drawn attention to the concern felt by the British public and by the House about the situation in Tibet and especially about the recent events there. He raised the cases of Gendon Rinchen and Lobsang Yonten, and I undertake to follow up what he said and look into the background extremely carefully.

Many hon. Members will have met His Holiness the Dalai Lama during his visit to this country last month, or at least will have heard him speak in the meetings held in the Grand Committee Room on 4 May. As all hon. Members know, my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary had a private meeting with the Dalai Lama on 12 May, during which a number of issues, including human rights issues in Tibet and elsewhere in China, and the matters raised by the hon. Gentleman tonight, were discussed.

My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary assured the Dalai Lama that we would continue to pursue our dialogue on human rights with the Chinese authorities at every opportunity, and he emphasised that we would continue to urge the Chinese authorities to enter a genuine dialogue, without preconditions, with the Tibetans, including with the Dalai Lama, and so we will.

The hon. Gentleman alluded to the recent visit to Tibet by a group of European Community ambassadors in Peking and senior diplomats based there. That important mission took place on the initiative of the EC embassies. It was arranged with assistance from the Foreign Affairs Office in Lhasa, in consultation with the EC presidency.

An extensive week's programme was organised, including meetings with Vice-Governor Thondrup, in the absence of the Governor who was recovering from illness in Chengdu, and representatives of the Commissions for Foreign Economic Relations and Trade, Planning, Development, Health, Education and Nationalities and Religious Affairs. In addition, a meeting was arranged with the Supreme People's Court and the Public Security and Justice Departments.

The Drapchi prison in Lhasa, and the town of Shigatse, were also visited. During the meeting on 17 May with the Vice-Governor, a list of political prisoners, prepared thanks to assistance from Amnesty International and other NGOs, was handed over and information about them was requested. Members of the group asked a number of penetrating questions, and quite rightly so.

During his meeting with my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary on 12 May, the Dalai Lama also raised the question of population transfer of Han Chinese into Tibet. It is difficult, if not impossible, to confirm the accuracy of reports on the numbers of Han Chinese moving into Tibet. Different sources provide different figures and often refer to different geographical areas. In our view, it is important to distinguish between the Tibet autonomous region and what some Tibetans claim as Greater Tibet, embracing large parts of neighbouring Chinese provinces.

We are concerned by all reports of threats to the Tibetans' ethnic and cultural identity, and we will continue to urge the Chinese authorities to respect and protect traditional Tibetan values, culture and way of life. We have also drawn the attention of our European Community partners to those issues, so they can pursue them at the European level as well as bilaterally.

The hon. Gentleman referred to the recent reports of rioting in Lhasa and of the police action against demonstrators there. I understand that some tension remains. We are watching developments closely. In consultation with our European Community partners, we will continue to urge the Chinese authorities to conform to international standards of behaviour.

I began by reassuring the hon. Gentleman that human rights in Tibet and elsewhere in China are a central element in our bilateral and wider European Community relations with the Chinese authorities. The hon. Gentleman mentioned a number of abuses of human rights. There are many other examples, in addition to those which he mentioned.

The hon. Gentleman is particularly concerned about enforced abortion and the funding programme provided by the international agencies which are assisting the Chinese authorities in that population control programme. We are also aware of, and deeply concerned about, reports of enforced abortion in China. The British Government are opposed to any population activities in which there is any element of coercion of individuals to practice family planning or to accept any particular type of contraception, and so too—the hon. Gentleman acknowledged this—are the International Planned Parenthood Federation and the United Nations Fund for Population Activities.

Indeed, at the UNFPA governing council in New York on 2 June, Dr. Nafis Sadik, the UNFPA executive director, once more categorically stated that the UNFPA condemns coercion of population programmes. She emphasised:

"Coercion has no part in population and family planning, it is morally wrong and ultimately it will not be effective. This has always been UNFPA's position and it will never change."

At the governing council, the Chinese Government reiterated that they have been consistently opposed to coercive practice in whatever form while implementing their family planning policy. The British Government, the IPPF and the UNFPA do not advocate or condone induced abortion as a method of family planning. The IPPF and the UNFPA do not provide support for abortions or abortion-related activities in Tibet or elsewhere in China.

The IPPF and the UNFPA are the leading international agencies in population activities, and are important channels for the United Kingdom's population assistance. They are committed to supporting programmes which enable men and women to choose whether to have children and provide them with information and services to enable them to do so.

We believe that our most effective strategy in seeking to minimise abuses of reproductive rights in China and bring about a change in that country's population policy is to work through those two agencies. Their involvement in China has ensured that country's exposure to international values and practices which would not otherwise have occurred and is helping to promote a more humane population policy. The technical assistance they provide is essential if China is further to improve the health and welfare of its women and children.

Mr. Alton: The Minister will recall that I pointed out that the previous American Administration withdrew funding from the UNFPA and the IPPF because they had sufficient evidence of forced abortions, forced sterilisation and the forced fitting of inter-uterine devices.

Has he taken any steps to try to obtain the reports which the American Administration acted upon before arriving at that decision under the presidency of George Bush? If such information were to come to the right hon. Gentleman—I have heard first-hand accounts of women who had been able to leave Tibet and China and have been forcibly aborted—would he then abandon funding of those programmes?

Mr. Goodlad: I will inquire, because I do not know offhand whether the reports to which the hon. Gentleman refers were taken into account by the Overseas Development Administration when it renewed the subscription of those organisations. I will find out whether that is the case and communicate with the hon. Gentleman. I will also make sure that the evidence that he has brought to the attention of the House and his bilateral discussions with Lady Chalker are taken into account in the future formulation of policy. I am obliged to the hon. Gentleman for bringing those matters to the attention of the House.

We believe that the involvement of the agencies in China has ensured that country's exposure to international values and practices that would not otherwise have been brought to bear on what happens there, and that they are helping to promote a more humane population policy. The technical assistance that they provide is essential if China is further to improve the health and welfare of its women and children.

As the world's most populous nation, China must obviously be a priority country, both for the IPPF and the UNFPA. Both agencies are making a significant contribution to changing attitudes in China.

The ODA is in regular contact with the IPPF and the UNFPA about their activities in China, and of course it will continue to impress upon them the need for careful monitoring of China' population programme and the promotion of greater freedom of reproductive choice.

As I said, I will ensure that everything that the hon. Gentleman has brought to the attention of the House tonight is taken into account in future decisions. I can give an assurance that none of the extraneous factors that he mentioned has affected the way in which the policy of Her Majesty's Government has been geared to do that—he was gracious enough to anticipate that that is what I would say.

Mr. Alton: I ask the Minister to respond to my question about the Vienna conference, which is currently under way. At present, 180 Governments are discussing the question of the universality of human rights. Is that principle being resisted by the Chinese Government? Is it true that attempts were made to exclude the Dalai Lama from the conference? Is it the case that officials of Her Majesty's Government resisted those attempts?

Mr. Goodlad: I shall come to that point in a moment.

The hon. Gentleman raised the question of Lord Howe's mission to China. We are awaiting the details of his formal report on his visit to China with interest. I understand that it is nearly finalised. Copies will be made available in the Library of the House and more generally to the public in due course.

The hon. Gentleman referred to the second world conference on human rights that is taking place in Vienna from 14 to 25 June. The United Kingdom, together with our European Community partners, has played an active role in the preparatory process and will be active at the conference. As the House may know, the world conference will be addressing overall thematic rather than country-specific issues.

The House will be aware of events over the weekend, when steps were taken to restrict participation at the conference. We and our European Community partners profoundly regret that steps were taken to prevent the Dalai Lama from attending the opening ceremony, while welcoming the invitation to him from the chairman of the governmental conference to attend the remainder of the conference. We understand that he will be participating in the NGO conference being held in parallel, which will be discussing thematic rather than country-specific issues.

We hope that both conferences will examine methods of improving the implementation of human rights instruments and seek ways to improve United Nations mechanisms in the protection and promotion of human rights. As the House will understand, the overall aim is that all participating countries will benefit from an exchange of views on their respective practices and provisions in this area.

The specific rights and freedoms codified in the universal declaration of human rights and the two international covenants transcend national, religious, cultural and ideological frontiers. We believe that those specific rights and freedoms are equally applicable to all persons in all circumstances. Whatever some people may think, human rights are no longer, and will never again be, exempt from external pressure on grounds of state sovereignty. The United Nations Security Council endorses that by recognising that gross violations may endanger international peace and security. United Nations peacekeeping efforts now incorporate human rights verification.

Human rights issues in Tibet are frequently associated with aspirations for independence. As I told the hon. Gentleman and the House, we regularly speak to the Chinese about the need for better protection of human rights in Tibet and more autonomy there. But the fact is that Tibet has never been an internationally recognised independent country. We have consistently encouraged the Chinese to enter into a dialogue with Tibetans, including the Dalai Lama, without preconditions. We will continue to do so, because we believe that that is the most promising, indeed the only promising, way forward.

The Chinese can be and are in no doubt about the strength of feeling of Her Majesty's Government, of this House and, more widely, this country about their behaviour in Tibet. There have been changes in the Chinese economy in recent years. We welcome that, and China's so-called open door policy. It is our hope, and that of our Community partners, that, as standards of economic prosperity rise, so will standards of democratic accountability.

The House recognises, because it has heard it before, that the Chinese view is that human rights are not universal, but vary with each society's specific historical conditions. China is one of those developing countries that is trying to introduce that definition of human rights into the final statement of the world conference in Vienna. The Chinese place emphasis on rights to shelter, clothing and nutrition, in contrast to the wider view of human rights which the House and the hon. Member for Mossley Hill have quite rightly put forward.

We and our Community partners are holding firm, and I hope, doing our bit to help human rights in China by, for example, training Chinese lawyers, accountants and administrators—some of the essential human resources that, in practical terms, will make good government and the reality of an extension of human rights practicable and possible.

We hope that the Chinese authorities will agree to talk to the Dalai Lama without preconditions. For his part, he emphasised during his recent visit to this country his readiness to enter such negotiations, and hinted at a compromise based upon the one country, two systems, formula.

We will continue to urge those concerned to enter into real dialogue and to encourage the Chinese to allow ethnic Tibetans a greater and proper say in running their own affairs. We will continue to urge the Chinese authorities to adhere to international standards of behaviour, to abide by their obligations under the United Nation's charter and to respect the values enshrined in the universal declaration of human rights.

I reiterate my gratitude and that of the House to the hon. Gentleman for raising the specific matters that have been put before the House. I also reiterate my undertaking to follow up those specific points.

Mr. Alton: I thank the Minister for the thorough way in which he dealt with the debate, and the assurances that he has given.

We will all be concerned to know of the Chinese Government's wish to see the universality of human rights destroyed and replaced by other criteria. The fact that that idea comes from a regime that has been notorious for its brutality and tyrannical methods must surely be something that we and other Community countries must resist.

The violation of women in Tibet and China is an issue that all hon. Members will want to come back to again and again. We will continue to monitor it. It is a scandal that the IPPF and the UNFPA are funding the construction of factories in China for the manufacture of IUDs, which will be forcibly inserted into Chinese and Tibetan women.

We can only imagine the misery and the pain that is caused to women who try to remove those devices, which have been placed within them to control their fertility. We can only imagine the sheer loneliness and desperation that many women must experience after they have been forcibly sterilised or forcibly aborted. It is to the eternal shame of western Governments that the money that funds those operations comes from our taxpayers.

I commend to the Minister a book by Mary Craig which was published recently and which highlights the fate of the Tibetan people.

I only hope that it will not be long before the Minister, after he has had a chance to ponder these questions, will come to the House of Commons to announce the end of funding for such barbaric and wholly unacceptable practices.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at sixteen minutes past Nine o'clock.

Oral Answers to Questions

EDUCATION

Nursery Education

1. Mr. Burden: To ask the Secretary of State for Education when he last met the Association of Metropolitan Authorities to discuss the provision of nursery education.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education (Mr. Robin Squire): No such meeting has been held recently.

Mr. Burden: May I welcome the Minister to his new appointment? When all the evidence, even from the Government's own tests, suggests that children perform better if they have received a nursery education, is he not ashamed that Britain is still the bottom of the European league in nursery provision? Will not he admit that the Secretary of State's comments about the so-called Mum's Army are actually more about devaluing the skills of those who teach children in those vital early years and avoiding the investment that is necessary in nursery education?

Mr. Squire: Given the warmth of the first part of the hon. Member's question, I am sorry to disagree so fundamentally with him on the rest. We believe, as we have restated many times, that the very diversity of provision for under-fives remains the best option. It recognises the various needs of children and their parents and makes the best use of what are inevitably limited resources. On the hon. Member's latter point, the recent consultation paper reflects our interests in extending the opportunities for capable people with considerable previous experience of working with young children to train to be early-years teachers.

Mr. Hawkins: May I warmly welcome my hon. Friend to his new responsibilities? Is it the case that when the last Labour Government left office only some 69 per cent. of under-fives received some form of pre-school provision, and now the figure is more than 90 per cent? Is not that a powerful confirmation of the progress that the Government have made in nursery education?

Mr. Squire: I am grateful to my hon. Friend, first, for his kind personal comments and secondly for underlining why the subject is so embarrassing for the Labour party. Labour Members say one thing when in opposition, but they invariably do something else when they are in government.

Mr. Steinberg: Is the Minister aware of the anger among parents and teachers at the proposals for diluting the primary training of teachers? Is he aware that, from an early age and at that early stage, children need professional teachers and not the dilution of the teaching profession? Will he please listen to teachers and parents before he makes a further stupid mistake to add to what the Government have done to education in the past 14 years?

Mr. Squire: I am sorry that the hon. Gentleman rejects out of hand proposals that are designed to enhance rather than damage. If I may quote from the Yorkshire Post:

"I think that the professionals should give some thought during the coming weeks to dropping their prejudices and giving people the opportunity to test out the old saying: teachers are born—not made."

That comment was from a lady who is a graduate teacher and is also a playgroup leader.

Special Schools (Testing)

2. Mr. Fabricant: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what consideration he has given to the testing of pupils in special schools.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Schools (Mr. Eric Forth): Children with special educational needs should follow the national curriculum and participate in its associated assessment arrangements wherever possible, so that they have access to the same education as other pupils. The School Examinations and Assessment Council has given guidance to schools about ways in which the tests for both seven and 14-year-olds might be modified or adapted for those pupils. It is, however, possible where appropriate to disapply the national curriculum and assessment and testing for pupils with special needs.

I look forward to meeting my hon. Friend and his constituent, Mrs. Anne Hardman, head teacher of Queen's Croft school in Lichfield, to discuss these important issues.

Mr. Fabricant: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his helpful answer. However, will he concede that special schools are, by their very nature, special, and so are the children who are taught in them? Will he consider, perhaps at the meeting that we are to have later this month, placing greater emphasis on continual assessment and slightly less emphasis on exam results? But will he continue to press that exam results for all schools, including special schools, should continue to be published for the benefit of parental choice?

Mr. Forth: I certainly agree with my hon. Friend's last point and I emphasise that, whereas it is important that children in all schools, including special schools, are given the maximum opportunity to enjoy the benefits of the curriculum and regular testing, teachers have a great deal of scope to judge to what extent pupils are appropriate for particular testing. In that regard, I should mention the possibility and potential of the national record of achievement, which can be used at the discretion of schools and teachers to sum up the achievements of pupils of all kinds from all schools when they have completed their education.

Mr. Spearing: The Minister mentioned the special needs of pupils, some of whom are statemented and some of whom are in special schools, and the need for the adaptation of tests. Does he agree that any reduction in the resources now available to those pupils, whether statemented in ordinary schools or in special schools, will not be approved by Her Majesty's Government?

Mr. Forth: The hon. Gentleman makes a fair point. It is important that resources throughout education are properly directed to where they can be best and most effectively used and to those with the greatest need. The mechanisms that we now have and, more importantly, those being developed in the Education Bill in another place, go a long way to doing that. I look forward to the support of the hon. Gentleman and his colleagues in developing the thoughts and the mechanisms in the Education Bill which will be of enormous benefit, particularly to pupils with special educational needs.

Mr. Alexander: But surely it cannot be right to list the results of pupils in special schools without, at the same time, showing that they come from special schools? What incentive can there be for teachers or pupils if they know that they will be lumped in with everyone else without any recognition of pupils' learning disabilities?

Mr. Forth: My hon. Friend makes an important point to which we have given a great deal of thought. It is important to regard schools of all kinds as being well within the education system within which all pupils should be treated even-handedly and fairly. But we have gone some way, and we shall continue to go as far as we can, towards recognising the special nature of special schools and of units within mainstream schools in order to identify how their results can best be treated and reported so as to reflect fairly their special circumstances. That is our intention and we are prepared to continue to consider the matter and to continue to develop the reporting system in order to make it as fair as possible.

Mr. Win Griffiths: Given the Minister's last remarks, will not he admit that there is an insuperable problem here because many children in special schools can be categorised as moving towards level one, even at key stage 1, and that what we really need is some guidance from SEAC on how to develop levels of attainment in the period moving towards level one for which at the moment there are no guidelines? Does not the fact that parents want to know how their own children are doing, not necessarily what is happening in the whole school, underline the foolishness of league tables? This would be a good opportunity for the Minister to announce that league tables are out and more sophisticated ways of assessment are in.

Mr. Forth: There is always a tension between those who ask, as the hon. Gentleman just has, for more sophisticated methods of assessment and those who often complain that the system has become unwieldly and over-bureaucratic. That, among other things, is exactly the problem that Sir Ron Dearing, is considering in his review at the request of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State. I am conscious of the problem that the hon. Gentleman has outlined, but I believe that the arrangements for key stage 1 and the work leading up to it are broadly satisfactory. It is right that we continue to look at the arrangements to see whether they need be and can be improved, but we must be careful not to throw babies, or pupils, out with the bathwater in our eagerness to provide a more sophisticated approach to cover every category of pupil and, in this case perhaps, every individual pupil. We must keep faith with the principle of testing and ensure its integrity.

Student Unions

3. Mr. Riddick: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what steps he intends to take to reform student unions.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Further and Higher Education (Mr. Tim Boswell): We have already made it clear that we intend to introduce the voluntary principle for student unions. We are currently completing our consultations on the role of campus unions and the National Union of Students, and their use of public funds. In the light of these consultations, we are considering proposals for action which my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State expects to announce very shortly.

Mr. Riddick: I am sure that my hon. Friend is aware that the vast majority of university students find that they have to belong to a student union, which may do or say some extraordinary things in their name. Should not students have the freedom to decide for themselves whether they wish to belong to a student union? Will my hon. Friend confirm that the Government will take action to give students that freedom of choice?

Mr. Boswell: Yes, Madam Speaker.

Mr. Don Foster: Will the Minister convey to his hon. Friend the Member for Hornchurch (Mr. Squire) my congratulations on his first appearance on the Front Bench as an education Minister?

Does not the Minister agree that the growing problems of student hardship, graduate unemployment and the increased need for welfare services should be a far higher priority for him to tackle in higher education than the partly political—I cannot speak today, Madam Speaker—the party-politically motivated attacks by the Conservative party on individual student unions?

Mr. Boswell: The hon. Gentleman may not be able to speak today, but he can whinge, and that he has done. I am surprised by what he has said: he gives no credit for our recent publication of the draft further and higher education charters, which are designed to give new rights and an information revolution to students. I am surprised that he did not acknowledge the huge increase in the total amount of student support which has been achieved through the success of the student loan scheme—which has even been acknowledged by The Times. I am also surprised that he did not acknowledge the 46 per cent. increase in student numbers over the past four years.

Mr. John Marshall: Will my hon. Friend confirm that the system of student support in the United Kingdom is more generous than that of any other country in the European Community? Will he further confirm that since student loans were introduced there has been an increase rather than a decrease in the numbers applying for higher education?

Madam Speaker: Order. The question relates to student unions, not the support of students.

Mr. John Marshall: Those who apply for higher education then have a right to join a student union.

Madam Speaker: Order. I am very tolerant generally, but the hon. Gentleman was out of order.

Mr. Rooker: Will the Minister confirm that for the overwhelming majority of student unions the amount of public support for their activities is sometimes only one fifth or one sixth of their total expenditure? Will the Minister join me in welcoming the work of student unions in welfare, counselling and job finding? Will he take it from me that, having made nearly 20 visits to universities this year, I found that not one Vice-Chancellor had a bad word to say about the running of the student union in his university?

Given the obvious stress that many students are under and the many tragedies that we have read and heard about this year, should not this work be better supported? Would not the Minister do better to ignore the bile and spite from the duds on the Conservative Back Benches, and take a positive view and give a firm commitment that the Government will not publish consultation papers during either the recess of the House or that of the universities?

Mr. Boswell: The hon. Gentleman seems to have got out of bed on the wrong side today. I am surprised at the language he has used. I am equally surprised at his apparent wilful failure to recognise the importance of the principle of voluntary membership, the importance of proper accountability for public funds and, not least, the vital importance of avoiding victimisation of individuals. The hon. Gentleman, in his consultations, may not have heard about some of the things that have taken place in the past. If he has heard about them, I hope that he will not condone them. In return, I will concede one point: we recognise through our consultations the importance of proper services for students, and our proposals, when they are announced, will reflect that fact.

Mr. Harry Greenway: Will my hon. Friend confirm that a great deal of money could be saved if paid student sabbaticals for officers of student unions were ended and if the presidents of student unions did that job without pay or a sabbatical, as they always used to?

Mr. Boswell: I recall that in the days when I was a president of my college junior common room I received no remuneration for it. That should essentially be a matter for the student union and the institution. I have heard my hon. Friend's trenchant comments and I can assure him that the voluntary principle will make these matters much more accountable to the student body as a whole.

Primary Schools (Class Sizes)

4. Mr. Byers: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what was the percentage change in the number of primary schoolchildren being taught in classes of more than 40 between 1991 and 1992.

Mr. Forth: Twenty-four.

Mr. Byers: Is the Minister concerned that there has been a 24 per cent. increase in just one year in the number of primary school children being taught in classes of more than 40 and that thousands of primary school children are in that position? Will the Minister accept that, at a time of rising primary school population, we will need to employ more teachers to stop things getting even worse? Can he tell the House whether the Chief Secretary to the Treasury is likely to agree to such extra spending? Will he accept that when a teacher stands before a class of 40 10-year-olds, one is talking not about a valuable learning process but crowd control?

Mr. Forth: The hon. Gentleman is making heavy weather of this. Yes, the figure has gone from rather a few to very few, but we are talking about 225 classes out of 137,000, or 11 pupils out of more than 3·5 million. That gives the House some idea of the proportions. The reality is that most of those classes are not representative even of the schools that reported them. The interesting point is that, at the same time, those schools also have one or more small classes. It must be a matter, rightly, for schools and authorities to decide the distribution of their teaching resources within schools. That is where the decision should be made. I am satisfied that the resources are there for class sizes. The average primary class size now is 26·4 pupils compared with 25·9 as long ago as 1979. It is not a cause for the sort of concern that the hon. Gentleman has expressed.

Mr. Pawsey: The concern expressed by the hon. Member for Wallsend (Mr. Byers) about children and class sizes would carry more weight if he would join Conservative Members in condemning the irresponsible acts of trade unions in boycotting tests.

Mr. Forth: That must be the case. We are concerned consistently with achieving and maintaining the highest possible standards in education. I sometimes wonder whether Opposition Members share that concern, given the fact that even now we believe, but we are not sure, that many Opposition Members supported the teachers' boycott. I should be glad to hear that confirmed by the Opposition Front-Bench spokesman today.

Mr. Jamieson: Is the Minister aware that the implication of an answer that he gave recently to my hon. Friend the Member for Wallsend (Mr. Byers) is that there are 500,000 children in state schools in this country in classes of 41 or more? Has the Minister had time to read an article by David Woodhead, who is a national director of the Independent Schools Information Service? He says——

Madam Speaker: Order. I cannot allow the hon. Gentleman to quote directly during Question Time.

Mr. Jamieson: Has the Minister had time to read the article in this magazine—[HON. MEMBERS: "Which one?"] The magazine from the Independent Schools Information Service. Will the Minister note that the article says quite clearly that the size of classes is important for children's education? Is the Minister saying that Mr. Woodhead is wrong or right?

Mr. Forth: The original premise of the hon. Gentleman's question was wrong; and not yet.

Grant-maintained Schools

5. Dr. Goodson-Wickes: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what assessment has been made of the advice given to head teachers by local education authorities in relation to ballots on grant-maintained status for schools.

The Secretary of State for Education (Mr. John Patten): I am not aware of any general advice given to head teachers by local education authorities in relation to ballots on self-governing status.

I am aware, however, that Merton LEA has written to heads, telling them that they owe what is referred to as "a duty of loyalty" to their employer and suggesting that to be seen actively to be in conflict with the policies of their employer would put an employee at risk of breaching that obligation. That is nonsense.

I deplore action from any quarter that might be construed as intimidating heads, deputy heads or teachers or as muzzling their freedom of expression.

Dr. Goodson-Wickes: Will my right hon. Friend recognise that there is all the difference in the world between impartial advice issued by local authorities to head teachers and the flagrant political pressure, to which he referred, from Labour councils such as Merton, implying that loyalty to the authority takes precedence over choice for parents and pupils?

Mr. Patten: The decision whether to go for grant-maintained status is one for governors and parents. It is undoubtedly their choice, not one for the local education authority. I hope that the London borough of Merton will soon join London boroughs such as Wandsworth, Sutton and Hillingdon, half of whose secondary pupils are already being educated in grant-maintained schools. That is the future for Merton and boroughs like it.

Ms Short: Will the Secretary of State also deplore the actions of teachers organising opt-out ballots who intimidate and pressurise children to get their parents to vote as those teachers require? What view does he take of schools organising opt-out ballots when they have a massive over-provision of places, as in the case of George Dixon school in my constituency which is chosen by very few parents, in order to prevent Birmingham rationalising its over-provision of places?

Mr. Patten: The way in which Birmingham local education authority treated the head of the school during the ballot to which the hon. Lady referred was absolutely disgraceful. That is why in the Education Bill presently in another place we have moved swiftly to ensure that there is a level playing field so that both sides can put their arguments fairly about whether a school should become grant maintained. More than 900 schools have now voted yes to grant-maintained status, and about 350,000 pupils are already being educated in grant-maintained schools in England as a whole.

Mr. Dunn: Given that local education authorities controlled by Opposition socialist parties are declaring their hostility to the concept of grant-maintained status, is not it time that we introduced legislation to require schools to opt in to local education authority control instead of opting out?

Mr. Patten: We have done so in an amendment to the Education Bill. My hon. Friend is a stalwart supporter of grant-maintained schools and he will know that the Bill will ensure that every school in the land shall once a year consider whether to go for grant-maintained status. It is very important that every year governors give parents the opportunity to vote in favour of grant-maintained status.

Dr. Wright: Would the Minister like to congratulate the parents at the Church of England primary school attended by my children who yesterday discovered that they had succeeded overwhelmingly in rejecting grant-maintained status? Will he further admit that the exercise of balloting in such primary schools is a monstrous waste of time for head teachers, teachers and parents and that it is causing discord and division throughout the school community? Will he now get on with the education tasks in hand?

Mr. Patten: As I said, some 900 schools have voted yes to grant-maintained status. It is a right of parents to vote in favour. Since the process began, eight out of 10 schools in which ballots are held vote firmly in favour of grant-maintained status.

Further and Higher Education

6. Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what targets the Government have set for the number of students entering further and higher education by the end of the decade.

Mr. Boswell: The public expenditure plans announced by my right hon. Friend last November assumed that the proportion of young people entering higher education—which is now well over one in four—would remain broadly constant over the next three years. The plans also provided for the number of students in further education to increase by 25 per cent. over the next three years.

Mr. Jenkin: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that response. Will he confirm that he intends to ensure that any reduction in tuition fees that a particular institution may suffer will be matched by an increase in the block grant and will he assure the House that he does not intend the process of consolidation in pupil numbers to put undue strain on institutions such as the university of Essex, in my constituency, which have hitherto planned for growth?

Mr. Boswell: I thank my hon. Friend for his question. He will appreciate that we operate through the funding councils in the several countries of the United Kingdom, but I can confirm that, in making their funding dispositions, those bodies have had regard to the need for stability of the individual institutions. I also confirm that reductions in tuition fees for band 1 students have been exactly matched by an increase in the overall block grant. What is happening represents no more than a reorganisation of the system of payment to deal with the problems where students are taken on at the margin.

Mr. Bryan Davies: But does the Secretary of State accept that unless there is a change of Government—for which the country hopes and yearns—by the end of the decade, students at that time will be able to look forward to pursuing their courses in poverty in order to train for a life of poverty and unemployment under a Tory Administration, as present students do?

Mr. Boswell: All that I can say to the hon. Gentleman, who goes back quite a long way, is that he might examine the record of the Labour Government, which he will remember. The fact is that the real amount of money available to the individual student—the total resources—is exactly comparable with what was available when the Government came to power in 1979. Since then, student numbers have risen from one in eight of the population to between one in three and one in four. The hon. Gentleman may want to be an elitist, but I do not. We are offering higher education to a greater proportion of our young people than have ever taken part in it; that will be of great value to the nation and will stand young people in good stead in their future careers.

Education Reforms

7. Mr. Patrick Thompson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what plans he has to visit schools in Norwich to discuss education reforms.

Mr. Patten: My ministerial colleagues and I have visited more than 120 schools since taking office.

I and other Ministers from the Department are continuing our programme of visits to schools across England to hear the views of teachers and governors at first hand and we hope that this programme may include Norwich in due course. It is an oversight that we have not been there yet.

Mr. Thompson: When my right hon. Friend has the opportunity to visit Norwich, he will find approval for his determination to reform teacher training, a reform which has been long overdue since some of the trendy nostrums of the 1960s and beyond. His emphasis on subject knowledge, on practical skills and on discipline in the classroom must be the right way forward. Does my right hon. Friend also accept the need for particular emphasis on the training of primary school teachers, as their job is in many respects difficult, challenging and possibly undervalued?

Mr. Patten: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend and I respect his views because, as I remember, he was a classroom teacher for more than 20 years. The reforms proposed for initial primary teacher training in the consultation document issued last week concentrate on a number of important things. The first is the need for less theory and more practice; the second is to ensure that student teachers spend more time concentrating on the basic core subjects; the third is to ensure that they are given much more help in maintaining discipline in the classroom.

Mrs. Ann Taylor: When the Secretary of State is discussing the so-called reforms in Norwich or elsewhere, will he apologise for his appalling proposals to dilute the professionalism of teachers in our schools by introducing a semi-trained mums' army? That proposal is again uniting parents and teachers against the Government. Does not the Secretary of State recognise the critical importance of education in the early years and the fact that if things go wrong at that stage they may never be put right? Does not the right hon. Gentleman recognise that the highest possible level of professionalism is required for the unique responsibility of introducing our children to formal education? Is he really seeking more confrontation?

Mr. Patten: That was a laundry list of complaints. With regard to the consultation document, the hon. Lady has overlooked entirely that we wish to bring into the profession a greater diversity of people from a wider range of backgrounds, including parents, who have experience in dealing with and educating young children. Many parents who wish to help with the teaching of five to seven-year-olds have good-quality A-levels and much experience in bringing up children. It is exactly such people that we want to bring into primary teaching.

Staying-on Rates

8. Sir Michael Neubert: To ask the Secretary of State for Education if he will make a statement on staying-on rates at 16 years.

Mr. Boswell: I greatly welcome the increase in the participation rate of 16-year-olds in schools and colleges—up to 80 per cent. in the current year in England, compared with 56 per cent. in 1979-80. Our expenditure plans for further education will give a further substantial boost to participation, lifting us towards the top of the international league table in staying-on rates for 16 to 19-year-olds within the next three years.

Sir Michael Neubert: Is my hon. Friend aware that, as a result of this welcome rapid and long-overdue increase in the number of 16-year-olds in Havering staying on at school, the new sixth form college is short of full capacity? In the circumstances, would not it be good sense to allow the grant-maintained Frances Bardsley girls' school in my constituency to keep its sixth form and, at the same time, maintain diversity of parental choice, including the opportunity of single-sex education for girls up to the age of 18?

Mr. Boswell: I can confirm that all Ministers in my Department are interested in the great themes of diversity, choice and quality in the provision of education in schools and colleges just as much after the age of 16 as before the compulsory leaving age. My hon. Friend will appreciate that I cannot comment on the specific set of proposals concerning the Frances Bardsley school, but I will ensure that these are carefully considered by my right hon. Friend. Of course, any representations made by my hon. Friend, or by any other hon. Member or interested party, will be considered most closely.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: Is not the sight of the Minister preening himself while firmly burying his head in the ground intriguing? Why does he not address the facts? According to the Audit Commission, between 30 and 40 per cent. of 16-year-olds who entered further education courses this year will not succeed and fewer than two in five of our 18-year-olds are still in education. By any measure, Britain lags behind the rest of the industrialised world. What does the Minister intend to do about it?

Mr. Boswell: I might start by giving the hon. Gentleman some basic knowledge of anatomy. It would be quite difficult for even the highly skilled team on this Bench to preen themselves while burying their heads in the sand. However, I shall leave aside that minor infelicity and deal with the substance of the hon. Gentleman's remarks.

My right hon. and hon. Friends and I have said that we are by no means happy with the level of drop-out from further education or other post-16 provision or with the educational standards of those involved in that process. We are very grateful to those, including the adult literacy and basic skills unit, who have helped to expose the deficiencies. We are anxious to repair those deficiencies, just as we are tackling the staying-on rate, to which I have referred. I hope that the hon. Gentleman and his colleagues will support our proposals for the national curriculum and the testing regime, as the deficiencies should be tackled at source and not left to the stage of post-16 provision.

Mr. Devlin: Is not it the case that, hand in hand with the increased staying-on rate at age 16 goes the 35 per cent. increase in the number of students attaining a first degree in the past 10 years? Is not that a truly tremendous achievement, brought about by the Government and something which deserves praise at every turn?

Mr. Boswell: My hon. Friend is entirely right; it is a great achievement and deserves praise, although it rarely gets it from the Opposition.

Grant-maintained Schools

9. Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for Education how many staff in his Department he intends shall be mainly occupied in dealing with grant-maintained schools; and where they will be located.

Mr. Robin Squire: There are currently 145 Department staff dealing mainly with grant-maintained schools policy, of whom around 95 are based in Darlington and the remainder in London. The total is likely to increase to some 250 to 300, with most of the increase taking place in Darlington and York, before the transfer of certain responsibilities to the Funding Agency for Schools in April 1994. Thereafter, Department for Education staffing will reduce.

Mr. Beith: But is not what is being built up here—in the Department and then the funding agency—just another bureaucracy, which will be further away from the schools, which is not accountable to the local electorate and which schools have no opportunity to opt back out of? Does the Minister agree that it is not therefore so surprising that the large majority of schools show no sign of wanting to go for grant-maintained status and prefer to stick with the devil they know?

Mr. Squire: As the right hon. Gentleman has already heard from the Dispatch Box this afternoon, the number of schools applying is nearing 1,000 and we expect that figure to be reached before the end of the year. Let me make it clear to the right hon. Gentleman that grant-maintained schools are self-governing and are not run from Whitehall. More important, those schools, by their very nature, are bringing decisions closer to parents, teachers and local people. I am surprised that a party that used to claim that it was in favour of developing power is now so opposed to the concept.

Mrs. Lait: Does my hon. Friend agree that some special schools such as George Rainey school in my constituency would benefit from grant-maintained status as set out in the Education Bill that is now in the other place? Will he assure me that staff at the Department for Education and the Funding Agency for Schools will do everything in their power to help those schools to opt out in the difficult circumstances in which they find themselves?

Mr. Squire: My hon. Friend will understand if I say that all cases will be assessed on their merits. I am certain that most schools in the country would benefit from moving to grant-maintained status, as those that have already done it have found.

Mrs. Ann Taylor: How many officials in the Department will be involved in allocating budget for grant-maintained schools? Is the Minister aware that one of the consequences of schools opting into centralised control is that some grant-maintained schools still do not know their budget for the current financial year and therefore cannot plan staffing levels of curriculum development? Is not it a sign of the Government's incompetence that grant-maintained schools have to complain to the Labour party that this Government cannot set their budget properly?

Mr. Squire: The only thing that the House is awaiting from the hon. Lady is a clear statement of her party's attitude to grant-maintained schools. We heard at the last election that she planned to abolish them. It will be interesting to discover whether we have to wait another couple of years to find out whether that will still be Labour's policy at the next election.

Mr. Bellingham: Is the Minister aware that, in the past few weeks, I have visited a number of grant-maintained schools in my constituency and that all of them pointed out to me the fact that the service that they were receiving from the GMS unit at Darlington was absolutely first-class —that nothing was too much effort for it? Will my hon. Friend ignore the nonsense spoken by the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) and pass on our gratitude to his officials?

Mr. Squire: I am delighted that my hon. Friend found that his schools have had excellent experiences. All hon. Members visiting grant-maintained schools across the country will find that they have a better atmosphere and are enthusiastic. I urge hon. Members who have not yet taken advantage of opportunities to make such visits to do so.

National Vocational Qualifications

10. Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Education if he will estimate the number of students accepted for NVQ courses who have withdrawn for financial reasons; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Boswell: This information is not collected centrally. However, we have no evidence to suggest that withdrawals are a major problem. NVQs are normally taken by people already in employment and tax relief is available to help meet the cost of course fees.

Mr. Kirkwood: I am grateful to the Minister for that answer. I am also grateful for the announcement, made yesterday in a written reply, that increased money had been put into access funds for the current financial year. But that answer made it clear that only £4·6 million was being made available for further education access funds. Does the Minister believe, having regard to the downward pressure that central Government are exerting on local authority discretionary education budgets, that that fund of money will be enough to give national vocational qualifications to those qualified enough to have access to courses?

Mr. Boswell: First, may I make two brief points of qualification relating to the hon. Gentlemans' remarks. The first is that the announcement related to England. The second is that his assertion that the Government are putting downward pressure on the level of money available for discretionary awards is not the case. We continue to fund them. The incidents, effects and current practice of discretionary awards are now being considered by two independent foundations which will report shortly.

Sir Giles Shaw: Will my right hon. Friend confirm that the NVQ award system is of great importance to employers and local industry and forms a clear relationship between the education system and the craft system of old? Will he ensure that every encouragement is given to NVQ awards in the development of his education policy?

Mr. Boswell: Yes and yes.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Mr. Chisholm: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 15 June.

The Prime Minister (Mr. John Major): This morning, I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I shall be having further meetings later today.

Mr. Chisholm: What progress did the Prime Minister make at his meeting this morning in rewriting his election manifesto and rewriting the rules on invalidity benefit? In particular, will he say who else he intends to exclude from invalidity benefit, apart from the retired builder with heart disease mentioned in the leaked document? Will he also say why on earth those still receiving it should have to pay, through benefit cuts, for the Government's unsurpassed economic incompetence?

The Prime Minister: We were not rewriting our manifesto this morning. We were reviewing invalidity benefit and it would be irresponsible of us not to do so.

Mr. Viggers: I am grateful for the chance of hearing my right hon. Friend's comments. Does he agree that our troops in the former Yugoslavia have done an exceptionally difficult job with great skill and courage and that they have consistently carried out the policy of distributing humanitarian aid for as long as it has been possible for them to do so? Does he further agree that the person to emerge from the recent crisis with the least credibility is the right hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown), who demanded further troop deployments and then immediately demanded that they be pulled out—[Interruption.]

The Prime Minister: I must first congratulate my hon. Friend on his narrow escape and his capacity to swim. We are delighted to see him here today. He is right to say that British forces are doing an outstanding job in a dangerous situation. They are inevitably running risks as the difficulties on the ground become more serious. I wish to ensure that those risks are kept to a minimum and I assure the House that the necessary contingency plans exist should there be a further deterioration in the situation. As my hon. Friend intimated, I believe that the policy that we have followed in Bosnia has been right and any other policy would have been reckless of the lives of British soldiers.

Mr. John Smith: What changes in the law is the Prime Minister considering with regard to the disclosure of secret donations to political parties, given the continuing scandal over the £1·5 million donated to the Conservative party by Mr. Asil Nadir?

The Prime Minister: The right hon. and learned Gentleman may occasionally care to comment on some of the people who may in the past have donated money to his party—[Interruption.] I have no present proposals for changes in the law.

Mr. John Smith: Why does the Prime Minister refuse to introduce legislation requiring the public disclosure of all substantial donations made to all political parties, so that the political parties that receive them have to declare them? In addition to putting political contributions on an open and honest basis, would not that also prevent the breaches of company law which occurred in the case of Mr. Nadir, whose companies apparently made seven illegal donations amounting to £440,000 to the Conservative party?

The Prime Minister: As the right hon. and learned Gentleman knows, the requirement to declare company donations to political parties under the Companies Act falls on the directors of the donor company, not on the recipient. He is wrong in his later comments—the payment itself would not be unlawful. Only the failure to declare it in the company accounts would be unlawful and that is a matter for the company, not the recipient.

Mr. John Smith: Does not the Prime Minister understand that, if the Conservative party had had to disclose the payment, the breach would have been revealed when the company acted illegally? Does he not realise that he cannot sweep the matter under the carpet and that there are people in the United Kingdom who believe that it is wrong that political parties should be financed in a furtive way or by excessively large donations from those who are not prepared to be publicly identified? Those are the words of concerned members of the Conservative party. Why cannot he act in this matter to get a level playing field that will encourage honesty and equality?

The Prime Minister: Donations to the Conservative party are freely offered and they are accepted on that basis, unlike the way in which so much is donated to the Labour party.

Mr. Garnier: Will my right hon. Friend welcome the visit of the President of Azerbaijan later this month and confirm that it underlines the strong diplomatic links between our two countries and confirms the existence of strong commercial links to the mutual benefit of our two countries?

The Prime Minister: Yes, I certainly share the view expressed by my hon. Friend. There is no doubt that there are huge markets opening up in that part of the world which I believe will be satisfactory for the United Kingdom, provided that we are prepared to take an interest in them at an early stage. Undoubtedly, we are prepared to take that interest and I very much welcome the vist here.

Q2. Mr. Canavan: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 15 June.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Canavan: What exactly is the Prime Minister going to do now that Lady Thatcher has effectively given him the kiss of death, Asil Nadir is overtaking him in the opinion polls and Sir Bernard Ingham tells us that the Tory party is behaving like a headless chicken? If the party is too chicken to take the necessary steps—[Interruption.]—would not it be more honourable for heads to roll voluntarily and let the people decide on a fresh menu?

The Prime Minister: More rehearsal needed, I think.

Mr. Dover: Has the Prime Minister noticed that, during the recession, the private sector has frozen wages and earnings, reduced earnings on many occasions and had massive job reductions? Are not there lessons to be learnt by the public sector, especially if the burden on the private sector is not to continue increasing?

The Prime Minister: I believe that the private sector has taken dramatic action in order to keep its costs down. The implications of that are now being seen in the extent to which many companies are now recovering. As far as the public sector is concerned, as my hon. Friend knows, we have held strict control over public sector wages over the past year.

Mr. Hoon: Last week, the right hon. Member for Kingston upon Thames (Mr. Lamont) suggested that the Prime Minister ordered interest rate cuts for purely political reasons against the advice and better judgment of his then Chancellor of the Exchequer. Is that true?

The Prime Minister: It is not what my right hon. Friend said and it is not so.

Q3. Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 15 June.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Jenkin: Will my right hon. Friend confirm that a further 1·8 million people so far have registered an interest in applying for the third British Telecom share flotation? Is not that the clearest evidence possible that, far from running out of steam, the British people cannot get enough popular capitalism?

The Prime Minister: I believe that my hon. Friend is right about that. Today, almost one in four adults owns shares compared with about one in 20 a decade or so ago. People want to build up a stake in Britain. They want to own a part of it. That is very much part of our philosophy and we will continue to encourage it.

Q4. Mr. Davidson: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 15 June.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Davidson: Will the Prime Minister accept my delayed but sincere congratulations on his decision to sack his Chancellor of the Exchequer? Will he come to Govan soon, while he is still Prime Minister, and tell the people there that he will sack any Minister who proposes a drastic reduction in the already inadequate level of invalidity benefit?

The Prime Minister: As I indicated earlier to the hon. Member for Edinburgh, Leith (Mr. Chisholm), we are considering invalidity benefit and I believe that it is entirely right that we should do so. Expenditure on invalidity benefit has risen from about £1·5 billion 10 years ago to more than £6 billion this year. No responsible Government could ignore an increase of that order. We have a duty to consider whether all that taxpayers' money is being wisely spent. The number of people receiving invalidity benefit has more than doubled during the past 10 years from 700,000 to more than 1·5 million. Frankly, it beggars belief that so many more people have suddenly become invalids, especially at a time when the health of the population has improved. I make no apologies for looking at this area of expenditure.

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: When my right hon. Friend goes to the European Council meeting in Copenhagen, will he take the opportunity to impress on our partners that all of us in Europe operate in an intensely competitive international market and that the costs of bureaucratic regulation, particularly the social chapter, represent a severe disadvantage to Europe's competitiveness in world markets?

The Prime Minister: Yes, I undertake to raise that matter at the European Council at the weekend. The president of the European Employers Federation recently appealed to Community employment and social affairs Ministers to "stop taking measures which unnecessarily destroy jobs".

I agree with that. I have made it clear in the past. I believe that the social chapter falls into that category and I shall reiterate that view at the European Council meeting this weekend. It is not just a problem for the United Kingdom. All of Europe is facing increasing competition from Japan, the Pacific basin and the United States. Unless all Europe keeps its costs down, we shall not create jobs, but export them.

Q5. Mr. Hanson: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 15 June.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Hanson: When the Prime Minister visited Wales last week did he have a chance to see the report showing that in the last year of the Labour Government family incomes in Wales were 87 per cent. of those in southern England, whereas in the first year of his premiership those incomes fell to 64 per cent. of those in southern England? Is that a record to be proud of? How, tell me, will the abolition of the wages councils help to improve that situation?

The Prime Minister: The hon. Gentleman in his litany unexpectedly neglected to mention that in recent years unemployment in his constituency has fallen by 49 per cent. That is because of this Government's policies. It will probably fall even further as a result of the abolition of wages councils, which themselves cost jobs.

Mr. Heald: Will my right hon. Friend confirm that the proposed European Community ban on large engined motor cycles, which would have damaged the British Triumph, has been successfully resisted by the Government? Will he accept the congratulations of motor cyclists throughout the country, including the North Herts Motor Cycle Action Group, on that achievement? Does he agree that that achievement will enable the British Triumph motor cycle to be successful throughout the world, knocking spots off the opposition, something which my right hon. Friend has done since he became Prime Minister?

The Prime Minister: I can confirm to my hon. Friend that the Government received a derogation from a Community directive relating to motor cycle engine size. That has had some beneficial effects for the United Kingdom and it means that our industry can continue to sell motor cycles with a large engine in the United Kingdom until at least the start of the next century. That is excellent news for Triumph and British motor cyclists. I am delighted at that outcome.

Q6. Mr. Pope: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 15 June.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Pope: Does the Prime Minister recall the recommendation last year from the Select Committee on Health that maternity services should be community based and close to a woman's home? How does the Prime Minister square that with the decision to close the maternity unit at the Accrington Victoria hospital in my constituency? He claims to be a listening Prime Minister; when will he listen to the women in my constituency who want their maternity unit kept open?

The Prime Minister: If the hon. Gentleman wishes to take up his particular constituency point with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health, I am sure that she would be prepared to listen to him.

Points of Order

3.30 pm

Mr. Peter Hain (Neath): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. Do you have any information about an impending statement from the Prime Minister about his answer to me contained in Monday's edition of the Official Report, at column 433, that Downing street office costs have trebled since 1981? What sort of example is that to the old and those on invalidity——

Madam Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman must not raise arguments with me. The answer is no, I have not received any such information. That was a most bogus point of order, and I hope that other hon. Members will not follow that example, because the House is getting very weary of such points of order.

Ms Joan Walley (Stoke-on-Trent, North): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. Given that the Department of Transport has today published its plan for the first private toll road, the northern Birmingham relief road, will you make inquiries about the circumstances under which the environmental assessment, which goes with the statement of plans, could be placed in the Library of the House so that hon. Members could have an opportunity to take on board the environmental considerations, which are most important?

Madam Speaker: I think that the hon. Lady might take that up with the Department herself.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. I suspect that this is a genuine point of order. Will you please rule that, when the hon. Member for Harrow, West (Mr. Hughes) is standing to your right, with his back up against the Box where the civil servants sit, he should not participate in the debate by haranguing and shouting at Members on the Front Bench or anyone else in the House, since he is outside the confines of the House and, as a Government Whip, he should, of course, not say anything?

Madam Speaker: That is almost a genuine point of order, because I find that many hon. Members, who are outside the confines of the Chamber, are also doing a lot of shouting when Front Bench spokesmen are at the Dispatch Box. I hope that that will cease from now.

Statutory Instruments, &c.

Madam Speaker: With permission, I shall put together the motions relating to statutory instruments.

Motion made, and Question put forthwith pursuant to Standing Order No. 101(3) (Standing Committees on Statutory Instruments, &c.).

PARALYTIC SHELLFISH POISONING

That the Food Protection (Emergency Prohibitions) (Paralytic Shellfish Poisoning) (No. 3) Order 1993 (S.I., 1993, No. 1476) be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.

That the Food Protection (Emergency Prohibitions) (Paralytic Shellfish Poisoning) (No. 4) Order 1993 (S.I., 1993, No. 1483) be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.

DRUG TRAFFICKING (PROCEEDS)

That the draft Confiscation of the Proceeds of Drug Trafficking (Designated Countries and Territories) (Scotland) Amendment Order 1993 be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.

OVERSEAS FORFEITURE ORDERS

That the draft Criminal Justice (International Co-operation) Act 1990 (Enforcement of Overseas Forfeiture Orders) (Scotland) Amendment Order 1993 be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.—[Mr. Wood.]

Question agreed to.

National Health Services (Amendment)

3.33 pm

Mr. Mike Hall (Warrington, South): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to make further provision as to the functions of Family Health Services Authorities in relation to the rights of general practitioners' patients; and to amend section 20 of and Schedule 7 to the National Health Service Act 1977 to ensure that such patients are consulted by Family Health Services Authorities when substantial variations are proposed to their medical services.

The need for the Bill arose because of recent events that took place on the Windmill Hill estate in the Runcorn part of my constituency. Those events demonstrate the ineffectiveness of both the Department of Health and the patients charter to protect the interests of the general public.

On 29 April 1993, the doctor's surgery that serves the Windmill Hill estate district of my constituency was closed, and 703 patients of Dr. O'Connor were given only five days' notice of the decision. They were confronted by the news that they had only five days to find another general practitioner.

A number of my constituents in that district are elderly, a number of them are disabled and some of them are both. The district contains many families with young children who live on the estate. The decision to close the local doctor's surgery meant that they would now have to travel even further to the nearest general practitioner.

It will be a difficult journey for a number of my constituents, for a number of reasons. First, there is an inadequate bus service to the next doctor's surgery, and many of my constituents are not car owners, which means that they will have to walk the two miles to the doctor's surgery through open park land, which, when the climate is bad, will mean a difficult journey. It will mean that, every time that those constituents need to see a general practitioner, they will have to make the journey on foot to and from their doctor's surgery.

The provision of locally based general practitioners and their surgeries is a fundamental and essential part of proper care in the community. Indeed, it is probably the starting point of care in the community, but my constituents have had the facilities at that starting point removed. My constituents' reaction to the decision was one of anger that they had not even been consulted by the family health services authority. They were anxious that the provision of services to them was to be removed, and they were concerned that the level of health service provision in that part of Runcorn would be diminished.

It is the role of the family health services authority to consult on such issues, but it did not consult my constituents. It did not even give them warning that the decision was on the way. It simply sent them a curt circular letter telling them to find themselves another general practitioner within five days. It gave a list of the surgeries which my constituents could use. My constituents were not asked whether or why—they were not consulted, but were told what they would have to do. The decision had an immediate impact on the services of the local hospital.

A number of my constituents said that they were unable to find a doctor's surgery within five days and that if something was wrong with them they would go to Halton general hospital for their medical needs. I was confronted by my constituents on the day that the decision was taken and I promised them that I would raise the matter in the House of Commons in any way I could.

I raised the issue during business questions, and asked for a statement, but was told that, as I had informed the Department of Health that day, I would be receiving a letter. I tried unsuccessfully to catch your eye, Madam Speaker, at Health questions, but was unable to do so. I now have the opportunity of the ten-minute Bill procedure to raise the issue on the Floor of the House.

When I realised that my constituents had been presented with a fait accompli, I was not sure what to do, as I had already raised the issue with the Department of Health. I turned to that champion of citizens' rights, the citizens charter, published in July 1991. Page 5 states:

"The public sector should provide choice wherever practicable. The people affected by services should be consulted. Their views about the services they use should be sought regularly and systematically to inform decisions about what services should be provided".

"Health Authorities must seek local citizens' views on their services."

I also looked at the patients charter, as I thought that it might provide back-up and further instructions from the Government. In the foreword to the patients charter, the then Secretary of State for Health wrote:

"The Government is also firmly committed to improving the Service—to creating a better National Health Service. This means a Service that:

—always puts the patient first, providing services that meet clearly defined national and local standards, in ways that are responsive to people's views and needs."

I was encouraged by those words, which seemed to give me hope that the views of my constituents on the Windmill Hill estate, who had not then been consulted about the removal of their medical services, would be entitled to have their voices heard.

The Government's commitment in the citizens charter and the patients charter led me to contact the Department of Health to seek its intervention, even at such a late stage, to ensure that my constituents were provided with the adequate medical facilities that they wanted in their locality. It was their view that the surgery should stay open, and that view was in line with the views expressed in the citizens charter and with the supposed rights contained therein.

Unfortunately, I need to present the Bill because the response by the Department of Health was less than adequate. I was advised in writing by the Secretary of State for Health that the legal position on matters of this kind is that the Cheshire family health services authority should consult the Halton community health council about the proposed closure of the doctor's surgery on Windmill hill.

The Minister further advised me that the decision about whether to replace the outgoing doctor rested with the medical practices committee, which is an independent public body. The Minister stated that that committee bases its decisions on reports from the family health services authority, following its consultation with the community health council. The letter stated:

"The decision of whether to dispense or advertise a vacancy is a matter entirely for the Medical Practices Committee and is not subject to Ministerial intervention."

The Minister said that the Cheshire family health services authority had been consulted about the closure of the doctor's surgery on Windmill hill, and that the legal procedures had been followed. That means that the hopes and aspirations contained in the citizens charter, which were said to be at the heart of Government policy in the 1990s, have not materialised, and that the views of my constituents have been totally ignored.

In terms of the National Health Service Act 1977, the promises in the citizens charter and the patients charter to consult people affected by services counts for nothing. Even if the Government wanted to act in this case, they would be prevented from doing so by current legislation. If that legislation remains unamended, the citizens charter and the patients charter are merely expensive paper tigers. They will remain a political gesture which, when put to the test, will be shown to have no teeth and no means of effecting the change that they desire.

That is another example of the Government failing to deliver their promises to the people and of people being misled into believing that the citizens charter is something that it is not.

The matter that I raise is not an isolated incident, because doctors' surgeries are being closed throughout constituencies. My hon. Friend the Member for Walthamstow (Mr. Gerrard) raised the problem 12 months ago in the House. He was told the legal position, which means that the citizens charter counts for nothing in such cases.

In the light of such events, the 1977 Act needs to be changed. My constituents in Windmill hill deserve to have their views heard, and they are entitled to the minimum consultation about their family needs for health service provision in Runcorn.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Mike Hall, Mr. Neil Gerrard, Ms Ann Coffey, Mr. Colin Pickthall, Ms Estelle Morris, Mr. Jim Dowd, Mrs. Bridget Prentice, Mr. David Hanson, Mr. John Heppell, Mr. Greg Pope, Mr. Doug Hoyle and Ms Janet Anderson.

National Health Services (Amendment)

Mr. Mike Hall accordingly presented a Bill to make further provision as to the functions of Family Health Services Authorities in relation to the rights of general practitioners' patients; and to amend section 20 of and Schedule 7 to the National Health Service Act 1977 to ensure that such patients are consulted by Family Health Services Authorities when substantial variations are proposed to their medical services; And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a second time upon Friday 2 July, and to be printed. [Bill 203.]

Orders of the Day

Trade Union Reform and Employment Rights Bill

Lords amendments considered.
Lords amendments Nos. 1 to 7 agreed to.

New Clause

ACTION SHORT OF DISMISSAL: NON-INFRINGING ACTIONS

Lords amendment: No. 8, before clause 13, to insert the following new Clause—

(". In section 148 of the 1992 Act (consideration of complaint of action short of dismissal), after subsection (2) there shall be inserted—

"(3) In determining what was the purpose for which action was taken by the employer against the complainant in a case where—

(a) there is evidence that the employer's purpose was to further a change in his relationship with all or any class of his employees, and

(b) there is also evidence that his purpose was one falling within section 146, the tribunal shall regard the purpose mentioned in paragraph (a) (and not the purpose mentioned in paragraph (b)) as the purpose for which the employer took the action, unless it considers that the action was such as no reasonable employer would take having regard to the purpose mentioned in paragraph (a).

(4) Where the action which the tribunal determines to have been the action taken against the complainant was action taken in consequence of previous action by the employer paragraph (a) of subsection (3) is satisfied if the purpose mentioned in that paragraph was the purpose of the previous action.

(5) In subsection (3) "class", in relation to an employer and his employees, means those employed at a particular place of work, those employees of a particular grade, category or description or those of a particular grade, category or description employed at a particular place of work.".")

3.45 pm

The Secretary of State for Employment (Mr. David Hunt): I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

I shall commence by making two important points. First, I shall explain how the amendment will restore to the law the meaning that it was intended to have before two recent Court of Appeal cases. Secondly, I strongly reaffirm that the law must protect all employees from any action by their employer that is designed to force them to give up membership of, or to join, a trade union. Against the background of those two important points I shall seek to put the record straight, in the light of some recent comments, which were based on a number of misconceptions.

During the debate, it is important for all hon. Members to differentiate between the right to belong to a trade union and that of collective bargaining. Trade union membership must not be confused with the law and practice relating to collective bargaining, and I hope to explain why.

Amendment No. 8 concerns the law on action short of dismissal, which is contained in section 146 of the Trade Union and Labour Relations (Consolidation) Act 1992, but dates back to the legislation of a previous Labour Government, and that aspect of the law has not been changed since 1975.

Section 146 protects employees against action by their employer that is intended to deter or compel the employee either to become or to cease to be a trade union member. That is why I stressed at the outset that the Government believe that the decision whether to be a member of a trade union must be a matter of free choice for the employee. Once again, I reiterate that employees ought to be protected against any action by their employer that is designed to force them either to be, or not to be, union members.

Mr. Richard Burden (Birmingham, Northfield): I am grateful to the Secretary of State for giving way, and wonder how he feels about having this as his first job. Does his logic apply to Government Communications Headquarters, Cheltenham and if not, why not?

Mr. Hunt: I am delighted to have this as my first job, because I am explaining why that principle lies at the heart of the Government's stance on trade union legislation. Indeed, an examination of the Government's step-by-step approach, which has been so successful in transforming industrial relations, reveals that that principle has consistently lain at the heart of the Government's legislation, and I am happy to reaffirm it. Government Communications Headquarters, Cheltenham is a very different set of circumstances. The greatest challenge is for the Labour party to give that principle the same unequivocal support.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Why does the Minister, who claims to be a Tory wet, not have the guts to admit that the Government are all about allowing people to be members of a trade union but not to be effective members, so that they are unable to join with others to negotiate with employers? The truth is that the Government rattle on about a classless society, but they are going to give the bosses a chance to deduct wages from people who are members of a trade union, while the blue-eyed boys and girls will get more money. The whole thing stinks to high heaven.

Mr. Hunt: I am not prepared to join the hon. Gentleman in his own individual class war. Those days are fast and far behind us. What he looks back to are, in his words, the good old days; in my words, they are the bad old days of the 1960s and 1970s, when a few trade union leaders could dictate to the Government and we had the worst industrial relations record of any country in the world. The Government have transformed that bad industrial relations record into one in which everyone in the country can take pride. I am determined to stay wedded to the principles which brought that about.

Mr. Alex Carlile (Montgomery): Will the right hon. Gentleman answer the underlying point that has just been raised by the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner)? Is he not proposing a restriction of the exercise of the right of which he has just spoken—the right to be a member of a trade union? Will he explain to the House how it is not a breach of article 11 of the European convention on human rights to introduce that proposal?

Mr. Hunt: It is an interesting dimension to have Bolsover interpreted by Montgomeryshire. I do not think that the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) needs any lessons from the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile) on how to put his points.

Mr. Carlile: Answer the question.

Mr. Hunt: I shall come to his question, but I do not think that the hon. Member for Bolsover needs any lessons from those on the Bench behind him. In my experience in the House, the hon. Member for Bolsover has given many lessons back the other way to those on that Bench.

The hon. and learned Member for Montgomery has once again confused the two issues that I tried to caution the House not to confuse right at the outset—the principle of collective bargaining and the issue whether an individual has the right to belong to a trade union. If one can separate those two issues—[Interruption.] Will the hon. Gentleman allow me to respond to his point, instead of trying to be a barrack-room Commons lawyer, which he does not do very well?

It is very important not to confuse the issue of collective bargaining with that of trade union membership. That is why I can answer so vehemently the hon. and learned Gentleman's latter point. We are respecting the right of an individual to belong to a trade union of his or her choice and the right not to belong to a trade union.

Ms Dawn Primarolo (Bristol, South): The Secretary of State may be aware that, in my constituency, an employer called Arrowsmith issued new contracts to its work force, all of whom were members of a trade union. The contract specifically required that they were not to be members of a trade union. When they refused to give up their trade union membership, the employer sacked all 120 of them. Will the Secretary of State suggest what action they should take against an employer who is breaching the principle that he said he adheres to—the right to choose to be a member of a trade union?

Mr. Hunt: Any action taken by an employer which is designed to force an individual employee not to join a trade union or to give up trade union membership is contrary to section 146. I am happy to look at all the details of the contracts, but I think that the hon. Lady must be mistaken in two important respects. She must not confuse the question of collective bargaining, but it has always been possible for employers, under the law as it stood——

Several hon. Members rose——

Sir Michael Neubert (Romford): Does my right hon. Friend agree that the problem is that those self-same unions that he mentioned in reply to the hon. Member for Bolsover, which disrupted and undermined good industrial relations back in the 1960s and 1970s, are still the essential support and financial prop of the Labour party today, which may account for them wanting to take all the day on this one issue?

Mr. Hunt: I gave way to my hon. Friend because I knew that he would make a good point, and he did not neglect to do so.

As I have explained on many occasions to many trade union colleagues of mine both now and in the past, it is important that the British trade union movement should give up its stranglehold on the Labour party. It undermines its case in industrial logic for seeking to cling on to its power over the Labour party.

It is important to recall that, as my hon. Friend's point bears out, it was not that long ago that Mr. John Edmonds, the leader of the GMB—Opposition Members may well shift uneasily in their seats when I remind them of this—said, "We pay for the Labour party, so we have a right to democracy in the Labour party." That point made by my hon. Friend is important. If the Labour party wishes to escape from the accusation——

Several hon. Members rose——

Mr. Hunt: I am answering the point. It may be embarrassing to hon. Members, but I am answering the point made by my hon. Friend.

If the Labour party wishes to escape from the accusation that it is a fully paid-up subsidiary of the trade union movement, it must take steps on this point.

Mr. George Howarth (Knowsley, North): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. Will you rule whether a discussion on links between the Labour party and the trade union movement has anything to do with the amendment?

Madam Speaker: A number of hon. Members who are questioning the Secretary of State are leading him down that road. If that is the case, he must reply. I am sure that we shall soon return to the amendment, so that other hon. Members who wish to speak will be able to do so.

Mr. Hunt: I feel strongly that it is time that the trade union movement gave up shouting that he who pays the piper calls the tune. [Interruption.] I know that it is uncomfortable, but I make this point. Mr. John Edmonds let the rat out of the bag. What he said is the true state of affairs in the nation today. Opposition Members are indeed spokesmen, spokespeople, spokespersons and spokes for the trade union movement. It is about time that they started to represent the real interests of union members rather than some trade union leaders.

Mr. Ron Leighton (Newham, North-East): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hunt: Of course I shall give way to the hon. Gentleman, then I shall return to the point made by the hon. Member for Bolsover.

Mr. Leighton: I know that this must be embarrassing for the Secretary of State, but will he please return to the point under discussion and not waffle round all these other matters? Let me try to clarify what he has said. Has he not said that he does not mind a worker holding a trade union card privately, but if that worker wants to use the facilities or good offices of the union—for example, by getting the branch secretary to write to his employer about wages or conditions—that worker can be penalised? Is that not the essence of the matter?

Mr. Hunt: I was trying to explain that that is not the case. For many years, I was a solicitor acting for a number of trade unions and for one in particular. I became aware of the importance of the trade union movement in areas other than collective bargaining. It has never been part of the trade union case that, without collective bargaining, there is no such thing as a trade union movment. The hon. Gentleman is confusing those two issues, which I pleaded with the House not to confuse in order to avoid a disjointed debate.

Mr. Ronnie Campbell (Blyth Valley): What is the difference between Lords amendment No. 8 and the Union of Democratic Mineworkers receiving a bigger wage increase than the National Union of Mineworkers a few years ago, which we had to go to court to stop?

Mr. Hunt: I am making a point relating to union membership. It has always been possible for an employer to give an employee an incentive to engage in individual contracts rather than to negotiate through collective bargaining. The amendment seeks to take the law back to where people believed it was before the Court of Appeal cases. It is perfectly in order for an employer to negotiate directly with individual employees and to offer them an additional pay increase if they will negotiate on an individual basis. I can produce a number of comments made by Labour Ministers which clearly show that this provision was never intended to affect collective bargaining, which is the issue before us today.

I emphasise that the cases that have made the amendment necessary do not concern union membership: they arise as a result of employers wanting to change the methods by which they negotiate their employees' pay. It has always been generally understood and accepted that the statutory provisions with which we are concerned do not extend beyond issues of union membership, and certainly were not intended to cover collective bargaining.

Ms Angela Eagle (Wallasey): I welcome the Secretary of State to the Dispatch Box and congratulate him on his appointment. As to the distinction that he appears to be drawing between membership of a trade union and actually using the good offices of that trade union, the employment appeal tribunal, under Mr. Justice Knox, considered this question and rejected it with the following words:

> "We find ourselves unconvinced of that distinction. In our judgement, the activities of a Trade Union officer in negotiating and elucidating terms of employment is, to use a prayer book expression, the outward and visible manifestation of Trade Union membership . . . and we see no genuine distinction between membership of a Union on the one hand and making use of essential services of a Union on the other."

Would the Secretary of State care to comment on that?

Mr. Hunt: I am grateful to the hon. Lady for her kind words in welcoming me to the Dispatch Box.

The words that I would add are "not collective bargaining issues". I have already referred to this. In a debate in the other place on 23 September 1975, Lord Jacques, who was then a member of the Labour Government, when dealing with clause 45—which is now essentially clause 146—said:

> "Clause 45 deals with individual rights of employees, not collective bargaining issues."

It is important that we should bear that difference in mind. It is clear that it was the intention of the Labour Government in 1975, in introducing the provision, that the clause should deal with individual rights of employees and in circumstances with collective bargaining issues.

Lord Jacques went on to explain:

> "A prohibited action must be for the purpose of prevention, deterrence or penalisation. Actions aimed at other purposes, such as helping recognised unions, which have the incidental effect of restricting some employees' rights comparatively, do not infringe these rights."

Nothing could be clearer. It was on the basis of that understanding of the law that two separate companies, Associated Newspapers and Associated British Ports, acted when they decided to change their negotiating arrangements.

Mr. Frank Dobson (Holborn and St. Pancras): Will the right hon. Gentleman confirm that, when it came to the meat of the matter, Lord Jacques, for the Labour party, in the same debate said:

"The clause provides, negatively, that the employer must show tolerance and not prevent participation in union activities"?

On behalf of the right hon. Gentleman's party, Lord Gowrie—who some time later gave up being a Minister in the House of Lords because he could not get by on £33,000 a year—said:

"In dealing with individual rights, we were anxious that negative rights—the right not to be forced into doing things—should be part of such laws."

Lord Jacques said the alternative to passing the measure would mean that

"The individual employee has no rights to take part in any of his union's activities at work".—[Official Report, House of Lords, 23 September 1975; Vol. 364, c. 189-92.]

But this clause was passed, and they are so entitled.

Mr. Hunt: I shall savour this, as it may be the only occasion on which I agree with every word that the hon. Gentleman has said. I have those quotations at my disposal as well, because they prove my point, which is that this clause does not concern collective bargaining issues. Anybody who knows anything about trade union membership will know that many other benefits of such membership exist side by side with, but separate from, collective bargaining issues. That is an important point to make.

Another debate in the other place on 28 July 1982 again expresses the point that I am seeking to make. Earl Ferrers said:

"it would not be unfair to have a differentiation between rates of pay".

If one looks at the context in which he said that, one will see that the situation about which we are now talking has been thrown into considerable doubt by the two Court of Appeal cases.

When the companies that I have mentioned decided to change from collective bargaining to personal contracts and to reward those employees who agreed to accept personal contracts, they had every reason to believe that they were acting lawfully. They have made it clear throughout that they were in no way seeking to prevent their employees from remaining union members. Had they done so, they would have been acting unlawfully. That was never the purpose or the effect of the action that they took.

Mr. Dobson: The right hon. Gentleman referred to the 1982 debate involving Earl Ferrers. Will he confirm that, at the end of the paragraph from which he quoted, Earl Ferrers went on to say—it is the reverse of this situation, but we can assume that it applies both ways—

"What would be unfair would be to say, 'We shall negotiate a wage increase for union members and union members will have a wage increase, but meanwhile non-union employees will have no increase.'"

It appears from that debate that Earl Ferrers did not know whether he was talking out of his hat or his elbow.

Mr. Hunt: I was quoting from the end of the paragraph. The hon. Gentleman said that he was quoting from the end of the paragraph, but he did not. That is a matter of detail. The quotation used by the hon. Gentleman continues:

"However, it would not be unfair to have differentiation between the two."

The end of the next paragraph says:

"That would be unfair, but it would not be unfair to have a differentiation between rates of pay, provided that they are consistent."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 28 July 1982; Vol. 434, c. 331.]

It is simple to understand, but the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) obviously has some difficulty with it.

I shall explain in another way. Cases were brought against the two companies in question under what is now section 146 of the Trade Union and Labour Relations (Consolidation) Act 1992. In each case, the industrial tribunal found that the employer had contravened section 146, but in each case that finding was reversed by the employment appeal tribunal. The latter's rulings were fully in line with what had been generally accepted as the intention of the section and were in line with the words of the Labour spokesman—which I have already quoted—in 1975.

Mr. Eric Martlew (Carlisle): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way on that point?

Mr. Hunt: I am still dealing with the point raised by the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras.

On 30 April, the Court of Appeal reversed the decision of the employment appeal tribunal and ruled that the employers had acted unlawfully in both cases. As a result, it is clear that section 146 can be interpreted in ways that go far wider than was ever intended when Parliament originally adopted this provision in 1975. When the law has become so confused on such a fundamental matter, the case for amending the statute is overwhelmingly persuasive.

Mr. Peter Bottomley (Eltham): I join other hon. Members in welcoming my right hon. Friend to his new position, but I wish that his first debate was not on such a subject.

The Court of Appeal said that the employment appeal tribunal was wrong to find any complication in the law. The Court of Appeal made it very plain that the industrial tribunal had been right to rule that the employers had acted unlawfully. There was nothing in the Court of Appeal judgement to suggest that there is any need for clarification or that the industrial tribunal ruling had changed the law. Having heard my right hon. Friend's speech, and bearing in mind what I call section 23(1)(a) of the Employment Protection (Consolidation) Act 1978 but which my right hon. Friend will call by its updated consolidation number, the House will want to consider whether the industrial tribunal ruling did in fact change the law from what it was held to be by most employers, all trade unions and people who have been industrial relations and personnel specialists for decades.

Mr. Hunt: I thank my hon. Friend for welcoming me to the Dispatch Box in my new position.

I have thought very long and hard about this aspect of the law. I am convinced that the Government's proposal and the Ullswater amendment in another place are absolutely right, and will do much to make the position as clear as it was before the Court of Appeal judgment. I ask my hon. Friend to reflect for a moment, because I believe that he is referring mainly to what are findings of fact by the tribunal.

[Mr. Hunt]

I in no way seek to diminish the tribunal's ability to reach findings of fact and to do so robustly, but I am seeking to return the law to where I believe it was generally believed to be before the Court of Appeal interpreted the law in a way in which I, those in another place, and I hope this House believe brought confusion to a matter which had previously been very clear indeed.

Mr. Derek Enright (Hemsworth): Does not the right hon. Gentleman recall that the judgment was announced on 30 April but that the Government announced that they were going to introduce amendments before the full transcript was available? In panic, at a very late stage, they subsequently included the amendment, which I do not believe will stand up in court because it is so incoherent. Is it not a fact that the Government's friends were found guilty, and that the price of support for the Prime Minister was to table the amendment?

Mr. Hunt: The hon. Gentleman does nothing to assist his case by fogging the issue with such emotive phraseology. I strongly believe that, if one dispassionately considers the law as it is after the Court of Appeal judgment—it was, of course, necessary for the Government to move swiftly, because the Bill was in another place, and it was the final opportunity to make——

Mr. Martlew rose——

Mr. Hunt: May I finish my response?

As it was the final opportunity to make changes, one will see that the law needed clarification. That is what we are putting to the House this afternoon, and what my noble Friend Viscount Ullswater proposed in another place.

Mr. Martlew: Does the Secretary of State think it right that an employer should pay an employee more because the employee decides to give up his trade union rights?

Mr. Hunt: That, as I have explained, is contrary to the law.

Mr. Tim Devlin (Stockton, South): I am very interested in what my right hon. Friend is saying, but will he clarify one point? Is it his contention that, prior to the three cases being brought, it was legal to discriminate between employees who were in a union and those who were not? What was his understanding of the law before those cases were brought?

Mr. Hunt: As I have already said, it is contrary to section 146 of the Trade Union and Labour Relations (Consolidation) Act 1992 for an employer to make it conditional on membership or non-membership of a trade union—trade union membership is the important point, and I am not talking about collective bargaining—[Interruption.] I understand that the hon. Member for Bolsover believes strongly that, without collective bargaining, it is impossible to have properly effective trade union rights, but that is an individual rule——

Mr. Skinner: Then membership means nothing.

Mr. Hunt: And membership means nothing. However, that is his individual view but, as I shall now explain to my hon. Friend the Member for Stockton, South (Mr. Devlin), not the law prior to the two Court of Appeal decisions. The hon. Gentleman knows that, because he has argued against Government proposals many times, saying that they drew the teeth of the trade union movement. It is possible for an employer to derecognise a trade union.

In response to my hon. Friend the Member for Stockton, South, I must say that it is perfectly possible for an employer to offer a pay inducement or an additional pay rise to an employee who chooses to make an individual contract with the employer rather than through the collective bargaining processes. To return to the direct point that my hon. Friend made, it is still perfectly possible for that individual member to remain a trade union member and still benefit from that pay rise. The pay rise and the inducement must not be conditional upon membership or non-membership of a trade union.

That will do a great deal to reassure my hon. Friend because there has been an enormous amount of distortion outside the House. I hope that we can now return to the debate, which is about trade union membership—that is the subject of the amendment—and collective bargaining, which must be viewed separately.

Mr. Harry Barnes (Derbyshire, North-East) rose——

Mr. Alex Carlile rose——

4.15 pm

Mr. Hunt: May I continue with what I was saying about the two cases? Then I shall, of course, give way again.

On 30 April, the Court of Appeal reversed the decision of the employment appeal tribunal and ruled that the employers had acted unlawfully in both cases. I have explained that, when the law has become so confused on so fundamental a matter, the case for amending the statute is overwhelmingly persuasive.

The section was intended to prevent employers from victimising individual employees on the ground that they were or were not trade union members. It was not intended to apply where an employer changes arrangements, such as pay negotiating arrangements, for organisational or business purposes. The fact that section 146 has now been interpreted as having a wider meaning shows that the law is unclear, and is no longer achieving the purpose for which it was intended. I have read out in the Chamber the words of Lord Jacques——

Mr. Hunt: Let me finish my point.

If the section is no longer achieving the purpose for which it was intended, it is necessary—indeed, I contend that it is imperative—that the amendment be made.

The amendment clarifies for the benefit of tribunals and courts the way in which an employer's purpose should be determined in cases such as those that have occurred recently. It provides for the situation in which a case comes to a tribunal and, as happened in the cases in question, the employer and the individual put different arguments about the employer's purpose in taking a particular action.

Let me explain to my hon. Friend the Member for Eltham (Mr. Bottomley) what will happen before the tribunal. The tribunal will consider the evidence that both parties bring before it, and will determine whether that evidence is credible. Then it will decide the case on the basis of that evidence. When credible evidence is brought forward, on the one hand that the employer's purpose was to bring about a change in the way in which he conducted his relationship with his employees, or with a class of them, and on the other hand that his purpose was one falling within section 146, the tribunal is to take the bargaining purpose as the relevant purpose.

That is not to say that any tribunal's hands are to be tied. The tribunal must always have regard to the reasonableness of the action taken. If the action is such as no reasonable employer would take in the circumstances, the tribunal will still be able to decide that the action amounts to action short of dismissal, in the terms of section 146.

Mr. Andrew Miller (Ellesmere Port and Neston) rose——

Mr. Hunt: I shall give way in a moment.

The amendment will restore the proper distinction, drawn in section 146 of the Trade Union and Labour Relations (Consolidation) Act 1992, between individual matters and collective matters. Section 146 will continue to give individuals protection against victimisation—that is, action short of dismissal—because of their trade union membership or non-membership, but it will not prevent employers from making and implementing legitimate decisions about how they wish to negotiate with their employees.

Mr. Alex Carlile: Does the Secretary of State take the view that Lord Justice Dillon was stating the law correctly when, in the Wilson case, he said that the employer enters a potential danger area—in other words, he breaks the law—if he offers a douceur to employees for supporting his policy of derecognising a union and making consequential changes in the terms and conditions of employment? If that is a correct statement of the law, as I certainly believe it to be, is not the Secretary of State now legalising the offering of what Lord Justice Dillon called a douceur to employees who will support his policy? Is not "douceur" a rather elegant alternative for "bribe"? How can the right hon. Gentleman justify such a change?

Mr. Hunt: I thought that I had dealt already with that matter. Having read the judgments of the Court of Appeal in both cases, I believe that the clear distinction that was drawn between individual rights of employees and collective bargaining issues has been confused. Surely that was never the legislature's intention in passing the original provision. I have already referred to Lord Jacques's comment that the provision deals with individual rights of employees, not collective bargaining issues.

It has always been possible for an employer to derecognise a particular trade union. It has always been possible for an employer to offer different rates of pay, to reward those employees who wish to enter into individual contracts rather than participate in collective bargaining. We could have a long argument, but I hope that hon. Members will accept that it is my genuine belief that the confusion between the individual rights of employees and collective bargaining issues has made the need for this amendment as urgent as I am arguing that it is.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I should like to quote some words of an employer. As it may be for an industrial tribunal to judge whether the employer was being reasonable, or whether any reasonable employer could hold this view, I do not want my right hon. Friend to reply to the point. These are the employer's words:

"We believe that higher pay for those on personal contracts is essential if individuals are to be treated fairly."

In other words, people doing the same work should be paid at different rates.

The House ought to consider whether a reasonable employer could hold that view. My understanding is that, according to the Ullswater amendment, whatever else might be demonstrated before an industrial tribunal, it will not be possible in such circumstances to demonstrate that an employer has acted unlawfully, as there is a purpose in addition to the purpose of deterring trade union membership.

Mr. Hunt: I am not disagreeing with my hon. Friend. Let him reflect on what I have just said. I have quoted from the speech that the noble Earl Ferrers made in another place in 1982. The noble Earl said that it would not be unfair to have differentiation between rates of pay. It has always been possible for an employer to offer additional money to employees who are prepared to enter into individual contracts. I have been trying to explain to the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery that this amendment is necessary so that we may get back to the situation that existed not just before the Court of Appeal cases but since 1975.

The amendment does no more than clarify this aspect of the law. It will apply only in a particular set of circumstances, similar to those that arose in the recent cases that I described. Only when an employer wishes to bring about a change in the way in which he conducts his relationship with his employees and in order to do so takes action that is argued to be in contravention of section 146 will the amendment come into play—and even then only if the action is reasonable in all the circumstances.

It is an important amendment, but it does not amount to a change in the law as it was understood before the Court of Appeal cases. As I have argued, the Government believe that it does no more than to ensure that the law is applied in the way that was originally intended, by clarifying the distinction between bargaining arrangements on the one hand and membership of trade unions on the other.

Mr. Martlew: Is the Minister saying that, if an individual employee for some reason did not wish to join a trade union, it would be legal for the employer to negotiate a contract allowing him to pay that employee less than the members of a trade union?

Mr. Hunt: It is perfectly possible—indeed, it is part of normal practice—for employers to wish to enter into individual arrangements with individual employees and to provide additional rates of pay if that employee decides to move in that direction. It is perfectly possible to have differential rates of pay. That could mean more or it could mean less: it has always been possible to pay less or more in accordance with individual contracts with individual employees. The hon. Member for Bolsover pointed out that, in the UDM-NUM case, the issue was extra pay because of trade union membership. That is why I differentiated as I did.

Mr. Leighton: We seem to be living in an age of macho management. The Minister says that it has always been possible to do this sort of thing. Can he give examples of precedents for employers offering such "douceurs"?

Mr. Hunt: It is a recognised fact of life: it happens all the time in various industries. I find it extraordinary that, whereas the traditional case made by Opposition Members for trade union membership has been that trade unions force wages up, they now argue that companies all over the United Kingdom will actually pay people more when they renource collective bargaining arrangements. That is a paradox that I find it difficult to accept. Of course I will provide the hon. Gentleman with precedents, but I ask him to take it from me that the amendment merely takes the law back to where it is believed it was before the Court of Appeal cases.

Moreover, I want to make it very clear—because I reckon that we may be treated to some wild assertions by the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson)—that the amendment will not apply solely to cases in which the action taken by the employer is related to his decision to derecognise a trade union. The amendment means that, in any circumstances in which an employer wants to change his negotiating arrangements and takes reasonable action to bring about that change, he will not be acting in contravention of section 146 of the 1992 Act.

Mr. Devlin: I accept what my hon. Friend says about the law always having been this way, but may I go back to the point made much earlier by the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile)? I am not saying that my hon. Friend the Minister is wrong but, if—I emphasise "if"—it were found that the law as it is now being clarified was in breach of the European convention on human rights, would the Government then be prepared to change the law as quickly as possible to bring the clarification within the remit of the convention?

Mr. Hunt: I would not bring forward the amendment if I felt that it would be in breach of international conventions or would affect the right of an individual to belong, or not to belong, to a trade union. I make that clear to the House. Obviously, the law is kept under review. If there is an argument that my hon. Friend can make, I shall look at it, but I present the case to the House on the basis that there is to be a clear distinction between trade union membership on the one hand and collective bargaining rights on the other.

Mr. Hunt: I shall finish dealing with the point before giving way, because I wish to make it clear that the amendment means that, in any situation in which an employer wants to change his negotiating arrangements and takes reasonable action to bring about that change, he will not be acting in contravention of section 146.

I give another example. It means that if an employer wants to introduce a single-union deal—that is, recognition, for collective bargaining purposes, of a single union to represent the work force—he will be able to offer his employees a financial or other incentive to persuade them to agree to such an arrangement.

It will, as I have emphasised, remain unlawful for any employer to take action against any employee on grounds of trade union membership or non-membership. But an employer would not be acting unlawfully if he took action to encourage his employees to be represented in negotiations by a trade union. The employer who judges that a single union deal or collective agreement is the best option for his business will be protected by the amendment, just as much as the employer who opts for personal contracts. I hope that the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras will bear that in mind.

Mr. Oliver Heald (Hertfordshire, North): Will my right hon. Friend confirm that, during the 1980s, there was a trend towards individualised contracts or single-union deals because of the efficiency and competitiveness that resulted from them, and because they allowed terms and conditions of employment to be tailored to the needs of the workplace? Does he agree that many modern businesses that are competing well in Swindon, Sunderland and elsewhere have those arrangements?

Mr. Hunt: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. A major achievement of Conservative Governments who have introduced legislation in this area since 1979 has been to remove the rigidities which inhibited competitiveness in the British economy. The statistics show that clearly. Opposition Members are always throwing statistics at the Government. I ask them to heed the statistics that show that, between 1974 and 1979, when we last had a Labour Government, the average number of working days lost per 1,000 employees was over 500. We are now down to 20, 30 or 40 working days lost per 1,000 employees. That is the greatest testimony to the success of Conservative industrial relations legislation.

Mr. Barnes: Does the Minister believe that trade unions should be only friendly societies, providing legal services and pension funds for their members, and should not be involved collectively in bargaining to improve the conditions of their members? That seems to be the attitude surrounding the right hon. Gentleman's argument, particularly in relation to Opposition Members.

Mr. Hunt: It is on that point that the hon. Gentleman probably has the biggest problem understanding the situation. It is for employees to decide whether or not they wish—[Interruption.] I thought that the hon. Gentleman referred to collective negotiation. I am differentiating between collective bargaining and individual trade union membership.

I assure the hon. Member for Derbyshire, North-East (Mr. Barnes) that I have had the benefit of a great deal of experience of trade unions. To describe them as friendly societies—while, at the same time, the only alternative is collective bargaining—is ridiculous. Trade union membership means much more than just membership of a friendly society, even when the members of a trade union decide that they do not wish their trade union membership to be involved in any way in their collective bargaining issues.

Only an employer can determine the negotiating arrangements that best suit his specific business, on the basis of his knowledge of all the relevant circumstances. As my hon. Friend the Member for Hertfordshire, North (Mr. Heald) said, if an employer comes to the conclusion that he wishes to move from collective bargaining to a more flexible pay negotiating system, why should the law prevent him from taking reasonable steps to encourage his work force to agree to his proposals and thus implement that decision? Why should employees who want to benefit from moving to personal contracts be prevented from doing so, whether they are trade union members or not? Those are the questions that the House must answer.

Mr. Frank Cook (Stockton, North): Like other hon. Members, I welcome the Secretary of State to the Dispatch Box in his new position. I first recall him as a more junior Minister for Energy, and he was competent and proficient then. This afternoon, he is trying to make a fist of his job, under the guise of clarification of the law, to make a fairly radical change to it. The law did not need clarification in the first place. At least, if it needed clarification, it would appear to be only for the Secretary of State. He is simply trying to convince the House that many people out there want the change—the clarification—that he is offering.

This afternoon, Cleveland county council faxed to me a clear statement that it is wholly opposed to the proposals, and asked me to bring that opposition to the attention of the Secretary of State. I am sure that he will not be surprised by that, and will tell me that it is because Cleveland county council is Labour-dominated. I want him to know that a unanimous decision was made at a fully attended meeting, so everyone is against his proposal.

Mr. Hunt: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his kind words. I hope that his attempt to destroy my career by heaping me with praise will be unsuccessful.

As far as Cleveland county council is concerned, many outside observers have had considerable concerns aroused by listening to media reports and reading some of the press reports and scare stories about this amendment. I encourage the hon. Gentleman to ensure that a copy of Hansard containing my speech and his intervention goes straight back to the council, and that the council reconsiders its decision in the light of the assurances that I have given.

To allow a law that was created for different purposes to impede business decisions of the nature that I have described is wrong. I reiterate that amendment No. 8 will restore the law to the meaning that it was intended to have when it was approved by Parliament in 1975, and I commend it to the House.

Mr. Dobson: I welcome the Secretary of State to his task. He comes to it with a newspaper reputation for liberalism and decency, and we look forward to evidence of that at some stage in the proceedings.

I remind the House that, since I first stood for Parliament, I have been sponsored by what is now the National Union of Rail, Maritime and Transport Workers, formerly the National Union of Railwaymen. The union makes a substantial contribution to my election expenses and the salary of my agent. I am grateful to the union for its help. I am proud to be sponsored by the union of which both my father and grandfather were members. I am proud to be associated with the union that represents thousands of transport workers, especially the railway workers employed at King's Cross, Euston and St. Pancras main line stations and 16 other stations, mainly on the underground, which are all in my constituency. Those facts are well known to my constituents and have always been on the public record—and that is how it should be. Only those who are ashamed of the sources of their funds need to keep them secret.

Let me make it clear that we are utterly opposed to amendment No. 8 passed by the other place. We object to it because it is wrong in principle and certain to be harmful in practice. The proposal is a savage attack on the rights of individual employees. It undermines their right to freedom of association and to choose freely who will represent them. We also object to the way in which the amendment was bounced through the other place, without proper consultation or notice. Presented at the last minute, the amendment was an abuse of parliamentary procedure and the Government's powers. It was most ably resisted by Labour and other peers, but the Government used their majority to force it through.

For those reasons, we pressed the Government to devote the rest of today's debate to this important amendment and we are glad that they have agreed. I hope, although I am not hopeful, that by the end of the debate they will accept that their proposal is wrong. By the amendment the Government propose to make it lawful for employers to bribe employees to give up the right to trade union representation. In other words, this corrupt Government want to make corruption part of the law of the land. Until now everyone has accepted that such action by employers was against the law.

The law in question was first passed in 1975. It has remained unamended since then, through all the changing scenes of life at the Department of Employment—untouched by Tebbit or Thatcher and undefiled even by the right hon. and learned Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard). The Tories have passed five major industrial relations laws since 1979, but until now this law has been left intact. The present law is set out in the Trade Union and Labour Relations (Consolidation) Act 1992 which was passed as recently as 14 July last year. That Act makes it unlawful for an employer to dismiss an employee for being a union member or for joining in union activities. The Act also makes it unlawful for an employer to take "action short of dismissal" with the purpose of preventing or deterring an employee from joining a union and to penalise an employee for doing so. The Act also makes it unlawful to prevent or deter an employee from or penalise him for taking part in union activities. Such action is, rightly, against the law, yet this amendment would change all that.

If we were to agree to the amendment, it would permit employers to prevent or deter employees from union membership or union activity and to penalise them for it. The amendment would not just permit employers to act in that outrageous way, but would encourage them by giving their action the seal of parliamentary approval.

All this has come about because on 30 April the Court of Appeal made it clear that the law meant what it said: that it was unlawful for an employer to offer bribes or threaten fines to induce employees to give up trade union representation. The Court of Appeal took the common-sense view that bribes and fines meant that employers were out to prevent, deter or penalise trade unionists.

It is worth reminding the House just who had been breaking the law. The two companies in question were Associated Newspapers, owners of the Daily Mail and by appointment principal media supporters of the Tory party, and Associated British Ports, by appointment of this Tory Government owners of Britain's privatised ports. Both companies had long-standing agreements with their employees to recognise trade unions and negotiate with them the terms and conditions of those of their employees who wished to be represented in that way. In the case of the Daily Mail, the agreement dated back to 1912. Under the agreements negotiations were conducted between the employers on the one hand and the unions on the other, and the employers and employees each chose who would represent them in the negotiations. Both companies decided that they wanted to put an end to these arrangements and put their employees on individual contracts that ruled out employees being represented by their union. In other words, in future the employer would decide who represented both sides in the negotiations.

Mr. Heald rose——

4.45 pm

Mr. Dobson: Just a minute. I may give way in a moment.

In case anyone thinks I am exaggerating, I refer the House to the Court of Appeal judgment which records that at Associated Newspapers the group managing director explained that "henceforth staff would be represented by their Editors and Heads of Department."

In other words, in future relations between staff and management individual staff would be represented by their boss who would in turn negotiate with his or her boss. The Tories have some strange concepts of representation, but that beggars all description.

In an effort to induce employees to accept this one-sided bargain to give up the right to choose who represented them or the right even to seek such representation in future, both companies offered big pay increases to those employees who were willing under duress to sign away their rights. The companies denied such pay increases to any employees who refused to relinquish trade union representation. As I shall explain, the sums were not trivial.

In the case of Associated Newspapers, Mr. David Wilson, backed up by the National Union of Journalists, challenged this as an unlawful action short of dismissal. Dock workers from Southampton, Mr. Teddy Palmer, Mr. Brian Stedman and Mr. Eddie Wyeth, backed up by the Rail, Maritime and Transport union, made a similar challenge. In both cases the employees were supported by an industrial tribunal. In both cases their arguments were rejected in rather bizarre and certainly non-unanimous judgments of the employment appeal tribunal. In both cases the employees were backed unanimously and clearly by the Court of Appeal.

Mr. Heald: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Dobson: Not for the moment.

The Tory Government, however, inhabit a world where big business can do no wrong. The Government decided that if the views of Associated Newspapers and Associated British Ports did not conform to the law, it was right that their views should become the law, so we have this amendment.

Mr. Heald: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Dobson: I will in a moment.

I ask the Secretary of State to make public all representations made to him, his predecessors or any of his colleagues or officials by Associated Newspapers or Associated British Ports or anyone on their behalf. Will he tell us what threats were issued and what promises were made? Will either company contribute in future to Tory party funds? I admit that these companies and others like them may not have a vote at the Tory party conference, but they do not need one. By arm twisting in secret, they have got the Tory Government to change the law and strengthen their position by taking away the rights of their employees.

Mr. Heald rose——

Mr. Skinner: The hon. Gentleman has a handout from his Front Bench.

Mr. Heald: This is actually a letter asking me to phone my wife.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Geoffrey Lofthouse): Order. I am sure that the message from the hon. Member's wife has nothing to do with the debate.

Mr. Heald: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that for Associated Newspapers and Associated British Ports the decision has been made? There is nothing in this for them because the proposal starts from now. It does not affect the past.

Mr. Dobson: There are plenty of times when I am glad that I am not a lawyer and I am even gladder, if there is such a word, having heard that contribution from one who is. That is one of the daftest interventions that I have heard in this place—and I have heard some daft ones.

The amendment is before us now because the Court of Appeal upheld the position of people who had worked for many years at Associated Newspapers and Associated British Ports. We are illustrating what will happen to others if the House agrees to the amendment, only in future such action will have the endorsement of Parliament. If the amendment is agreed and the Government make it lawful to bribe and fine employees for seeking to be represented by a union, will any action short of dismissal be against the law? Will there be no limit on what employers can do?

In future, as a result of the amendment, employers will be able to promote and demote, not on merit but on the basis of an employee's willingness to sign away his rights. Employers will offer longer holidays or shorter hours only to those who conform. Non-conforming employees will be the ones who are redeployed from a good location to a bad one in an unpopular part of the country. They will be the ones set to work in the worst conditions, doing the dirtiest and most dangerous jobs. They will be the ones who are made to work awkward shifts or permanent nights.

The Tories are introducing victimisation by Act of Parliament. As a result of the amendment, employers will also be able to deny profit sharing or bonuses to people who want to be represented by their union. Unscrupulous employers will also be able to threaten the pensions and other benefits of employees.

If employers are to be allowed, by law, to bribe and fine, is there anything that they will be prevented from doing in the future? Under the new Tory law anything goes. Employers will be able to exercise any duress on their employees to make them deal with their bosses on their own, without the help of their union.

Mr. David Young (Bolton, South-East): The Government's action causes great constitutional concern because it is clear that, if courts decide anything that is offensive to the Government, the Government will then change the law. Are we not moving towards a one-party or fascist state, where the courts become the puppet of the state and the Government?

Mr. Dobson: My hon. Friend has raised an extremely good point. The reason why the Government are so opposed to the European Community having any say in our employment legislation is that, in the case of laws that start with the Community, if the Government are found to be breaking them, they must put those laws right. They cannot just change court decisions on a whim, as they have done in this case.

What is happening is part and parcel of the Government's move to derecognise trade unions. They started with GCHQ, as the Secretary of State said, with their step-by-step approach. They have kept up the pressure. Their object is to weaken not just trade unions, but the bargaining position of employees.

Unions came into being because individual employees realised that they were in a poor bargaining position when up against a corporate body with enormous assets and legal privileges. That is as true today as it was in the past. The lack of parity between employers and individual employees was recognised as long ago as 1908 by Winston Churchill, who said:

"Where . . . you have a powerful organisation on both sides . . . you have a healthy bargaining which increases the competitive power of industry and thus forces a progressive standard of life . . . But where you have no organisation, no parity of bargaining, the good employer is undercut by the bad and the bad employer undercut by the worst."

Putting people on individual contracts is to make a mockery of the idea of parity of bargaining. Just look at the bargaining position in the two cases that went to the Court of Appeal.

Associated British Ports must be a wealthy organisation because it pays the boss more than £233,000 a year in salary alone. It has a turnover of £310 million and pre-tax profits of £97 million. Teddy Palmer, Brian Stedman and Eddie Wyeth did not have such resources at their disposal. All that they had to bring to the bargaining process was their skill and experience. If they did not accept the terms offered by Associated British Ports, the alternative was to try to get another job. I must point out to the Secretary of State that that is not much of an alternative in Southampton, where, even according to the Government's fiddled figures, more than 13,000 people are on the dole. That was not much of an alternative for three men, whose average age was 50, in a city where one in five men are officially out of work. There was no parity of bargaining there and the Secretary of State knows it, but he wants the newly privatised bosses to get their own way.

Associated Newspapers is so wealthy that its highest paid director was paid more than £500,000 last year. It has assets of £500 million and pre-tax profits of £76 million. I am sure that very few people would believe that one solitary journalist had parity of bargaining with that company, which owns the Daily Mail, The Mail on Sunday and the Evening Standard and which supplies teletext to ITV.

Those two companies are not, of course, the only ones that are derecognising unions. In the publishing industry, Reed Elsevier, the printing and publishing company, is busily trying to put all its British employees on individual contracts and to end union recognition. There is not much parity of bargaining there. Even before its merger with Elsevier, Reed International was so wealthy that it paid its chairman £391,000 and had net assets in excess of £1·4 billion. It is ironic that the new combined company can pursue its course of action only in Britain. The Elsevier part of the operation is still based in Holland, where the company is required by law to recognise unions and operate works councils.

Another major British company, Shell UK, is trying to put its employees on individual contracts and derecognise the unions. Shell is such a rich organisation that it pays its directors more than £1 million. Its net assets total more than £3,500 million. No parity of bargaining exists between Shell and its individual employees. Even with collective bargaining, such a company has always had the whip hand.

Mr. Bill Etherington (Sunderland, North): I am enjoying my hon. Friend's speech. Has it occurred to him that one reason for trying to keep employees wages down might be so that many of the illustrious companies can add a little more to the Conservative party coffers, even though we do not know the exact amounts?

Mr. Dobson: As far as I know, there is no evidence, yet, that Polly Peck is derecognising unions. I must admit, however, that I am not familiar with employment protection laws in northern Cyprus. The Lord Chancellor might be, however, because he paid it a special visit.

Mr. Graham Riddick (Colne Valley): Considering that the debate is about the position of trade unions and the rights of individuals, can the hon. Gentleman tell the House whether he believes a system of one man, one vote should be introduced for the election of the Labour leader and Labour Members?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The proposed one man, one vote for the Labour party or anywhere else has nothing to do with the debate.

Mr. Dobson: The problem is that, in the companies I have mentioned, it has been decided that one man, the chairman, has one vote and he votes in both sides of the negotiations.

If the amendment goes through, every company that wants to derecognise unions will be given a free hand by the Government. All forms of bribery and coercion will be made lawful. It is all part of the wretched Government's craven approach to international competition. They no longer believe that we can compete with Germany, Japan, Holland or Belgium on quality.

Whatever personal ambitions may drive individual members of the Cabinet, when it comes to the future of our country the Cabinet Room has become an ambition-free zone. Instead of competing with the best on quality, the Tories have thrown in the towel. The future that they offer for Britain is to compete not with the best on quality but with the cheapest on price. The Tories want to drive down wages. They want British people to continue to work the longest hours in Europe and to take the shortest holidays.

Mr. David Hunt: I am sorry to interrupt such a carefully prepared speech. I greatly appreciated the opening generous remarks of the hon. Gentleman. He asked me a specific question about Associated British Ports and Associated Newspapers, but he will recollect that I was not Secretary of State at the time when those cases came to court. I have checked, however, and I am advised that no representations of any sort were made by either ABP or

[Mr. David Hunt]

Associated Newspapers before the Government decided to act. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will withdraw his accusation. Instead of relying on such a heavily prepared script, will he address the issues that I raised in my opening remarks?

5 pm

Mr. Dobson: The right hon. Gentleman has not answered all my questions or those that I asked on behalf of other people. He is getting a bit like the bosses of the companies: he prepares his speech, but apparently does not like it when I prepare one. We listened to him for three quarters of an hour and did not get one inch further forward. I am proceeding with my speech as I prepared it.

Mr. Hunt: I will also use the words, "or any other persons on their behalf". Of course, the hon. Gentleman had a right to prepare his remarks. All I am asking is that, at some stage during his reply, he addresses the issues that I raised.

Mr. Dobson: Although the right hon. Gentleman is a Secretary of State, he must learn that, to be in order, one addresses the subject of the amendment. One does not necessarily have to address all the issues raised by Conservative Members. I am addressing what I believe to be the major issues that arise from this disgusting amendment. I shall continue to raise such issues insofar as they remain in order.

In order to reduce wages—which is the only way that the Government believe we can compete—the Government need to weaken the bargaining position of British people at work. They do not do that simply by threatening them with a dole queue of 4 million. The Tories are determined to casualise employment in Britain, and the proposals are part of that casualisation process.

At present, people who want to work full time are being forced to go part time. Millions of people—mainly women—are left with no right against unlawful dismissal unless they have worked for five years. People with family responsibilities are being told that they face the sack if they do not work all the hours that God sends. People who thought that they had a career have been called in by their bosses and told that they can have a two or three year contract—and must take it or leave it. People have been told that, under their new contracts, they can find and fund their own pensions. As a result, people at work are feeling more and more threatened and insecure.

I am talking not about any old people, but about the people of this country who are being treated worse at work than any other people in western Europe. It is disgraceful to have to say it, but they are being treated in that way by British-owned companies at the behest of the British Government. It is not Nissan or Toyota which behaves in that fashion—generally, the multinationals do not behave badly. They know the obligations expected of employers in Europe. They are accustomed, at least in Europe, to complying with international standards and are familiar with dealing with Governments who discharge their international obligations.

The Opposition's next objection to the amendment is that they believe that the proposal will infringe the right to form or join a trade union set out in the European convention on human rights. We believe that it will infringe the right to organise which was set out in the Council of Europe's social charter. We believe that it will infringe the guarantee of the right to collective bargaining set out in the treaty of Rome, and the obligation to develop a dialogue between management and labour required under the Single European Act, which was pushed through the House by the use of a guillotine motion by Mrs. Thatcher's Government. It will breach the International Labour Organisation convention, which provides protection against anti-union discrimination and specifically outlaws deprivation of wages or limitation on wages for taking part in union activities.

Just in case the Euro-sceptics on the Conservative Benches are not impressed by the mainly European obligations that I have listed and believe that such protection is confined to Europe, I should add that, in Japan, the right of workers to organise, bargain and act collectively is guaranteed by the Japanese constitution. The Opposition believe that if workers in the rest of the European Community and Japan receive the benefit of decent employment protection laws, British workers should receive the same.

The Government have come up with two justifications for the change in the law. They have argued that their proposal is not an attack on the right of employees to be members of a trade union. The Tories say that the proposal only prevents union members from trying to make use of their membership. That argument was rejected by the Court of Appeal, which quoted with approval an earlier decision quoted by my hon. Friend the Member for Wallasey (Ms Eagle). That decision, which is worth repeating, stated:

"the activities of a trade union officer in negotiating and elucidating terms of employment is . . . the outward and visible manifestation of trade union membership."

It also stated that the argument now used by the Government would emasculate legal protection. Later, the Court of Appeal described as unreal the argument that being a union member meant nothing more than having a membership card. How right it was: having a union card but not being allowed to use it would be as unreal as having a credit card, but not being allowed to use it. In those circumstances, both cards would be neither use nor ornament.

Although Conservative Members may prefer to forget what they said at the general election, I am sure that my hon. Friends need not be reminded that the Tory party manifesto stated that the Labour party would disrupt industrial peace by weakening the courts. It is not the Labour party which is weakening the courts today. The Tories also said that the workers' rights in which they believed were those which enhanced individuals' status and opportunities. David Wilson, Teddy Palmer, Brian Stedman and Eddie Wyeth are all individuals. What about their status and opportunities? What about the status and opportunities of the thousands of individuals who will now be subject to lawful bribery and brow-beating if the amendment is passed?

The Government have also claimed that the amendment is necessary to clarify the law. Presumably they would like us to believe that Associated Newspapers and Associated British Ports were innocently misled into their law-breaking campaign of bribery and corruption. Most people would find that hard to believe. They would find it even harder to believe if they knew about the battery of lawyers that each company has deployed on the case.

The law is clear; the wording is plain. However, if for the sake of argument we were to conclude that the law needed to be clarified, that does not mean that it needs to be clarified for the benefit of employers and the disadvantage of employees. It could be clarified in another way. Parliament could make clearer still the fact that bribery is against the law. That is what was previously meant and what the law should mean now.

We believe that British people should have more rights at work than they have now. In times of rapid industrial change, uncertainty and insecurity, people at work need more protection, not less. Their need for trade unions grows rather than diminishes in times like the present. When individual employees are being picked off at leisure by unscrupulous employers, the right of employees to act together to protect one another should be strengthened, not weakened. We believe that the Government should end derecognition by changing the law.

We believe that, as in the rest of the European Community, employees in Britain should have the right to be represented through trade unions, and that that recognition should be obligatory where there is substantial support among the employees. That idea works as we can see from the rest of the EC. Decent employment laws do not hold back countries or economies. Decent employment laws apply in the seven EC countries which have a higher standard of living than Britain. Decent employment laws apply in the seven EC countries which export more per head of population than does Britain. Decent employment laws apply in every other EC country which have a better trade balance with the rest of the world than Britain has. Decent employment laws go with economic success, high pay and prosperity. The Government's policies of promoting casual employment and insecurity go with economic failure, low pay and poverty.

The amendment shows the Tory party at its worst, capitulating to secret pressures from its rich and powerful supporters to the disadvantage of ordinary people who have to work for a living. It is wrong in principle, it will be harmful in practice, and it will add to the growing insecurity of everyone at work. It is an assault on free trade unions and seeks to shift Britain's industrial relations back to the previous century rather than move them forward to new, better and more productive relationships for the century to come. This elected House should represent the interests of people at work and tell the House of Lords, "We do not accept this amendment."

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The amendment proposes to change the part of the Bill that is headed:

"Rights in relation to union membership".

It is clear that it has to do with wrongs in relation to union membership.

It was recently said that

"talk of undermining freedom of association was poppycock".

I should like to share with the House the decision of the industrial tribunal. Paragraph 60 of its report states:

"The Tribunal was satisfied that in the context of this case and on the facts we have found the respondents' purpose was so to reduce the power of the union as to negate it totally. If this had not been their purpose they would have recognised the union for matters other than wage negotiations if they had so wished."

To say that what the amendment proposes is not an attack on free association is undermined by those words.

On page 16 of his Court of Appeal judgment, after the quotation

"The purpose was not in dispute—it was to 'end collective bargaining'".

Lord Justice Dillon said:

"That was indeed the stated purpose of the employers, and it is common ground that 'collective bargaining' was not intended to be limited to collective bargaining about pay."

We have on reasonable authority, on behalf of the Government, the statement that discrimination against individual workers on grounds of trade union membership will remain illegal. Paragraph 61 of the industrial tribunal's judgment states:

"The Tribunal considered that the respondents were fully aware that by depriving the union of any function in the work place (save on health and safety) they were effectively rendering the union powerless and thus membership pointless."

I remind the House that the case before the industrial tribunal was under a section dealing with deterring an individual from union membership. It is difficult to square that with the statement that discrimination against individual workers on the ground of trade union membership will remain illegal.

My understanding of the words to be inserted before clause 13 of the Bill by what is referred to as the Ullswater amendment is that they would forbid an industrial tribunal to hold that an employer had acted illegally if the consequence of his action would be held by that tribunal to have the purpose of deterring an individual from union membership.

Those of us who want to support the Government—as I normally do, though in this case I want to keep the law as it is—have been told that if an employer can show that it is reasonable to have another purpose, an industrial tribunal will not be able to hold that that which is now illegal will remain illegal.

I could quote at length from the Court of Appeal judgment, which upholds without difficulty the industrial tribunal's findings of fact and law. I shall not do that, but shall merely quote from paragraph 62 of the industrial tribunal finding. It states:

"The Tribunal did not consider that the respondents"—that is, the employers—

"could hide behind their right to de-recognise the union so as to deny successfully their ultimate purpose which was to effect the wholly foreseeable consequence of deterring individual journalists from being union members."

Of course, the case goes far wider than that because for "journalists" we could read "any employees".

5.15 pm

In his judgment, Lord Justice Dillon considers the four points that the employment appeal tribunal considered. He says that the employment appeal tribunal found a distinction or a difference that did not amount to much.

The question was: what was the purpose of the employers in derecognising the union, ending collective bargaining and changing the terms and conditions of their employees? It was held, with the agreement of the other members of the Court of Appeal, that the industrial tribunal was entitled to find that the purpose was as stated in paragraph 60:

"so to reduce the power of the union as to negate it totally."

The evidence quoted by Lord Justice Dillon is sufficient to support that finding, which does not square with the statement "that talk of undermining freedom of association is poppycock".

It is unwise for hon. Members to say that the considered view of a member of the Court of Appeal is "poppycock".

If I wanted to disagree with the Court of Appeal's judgment, I should say, "It has stated the law, which is its right, unless that is overturned by the House of Lords, but I should prefer the law to be different from what it appears to the Court of Appeal and the industrial tribunal." Although my background is not comprehensive, I would argue that people have understood the law for about the last decade.

I was taken on as an industrial relations officer by the British Steel Corporation in 1968. I spent a year working with industrial relations and personnel specialists throughout the corporation, which was substantially larger then than it is now. I had dealings with Government Departments and worked in an office that dealt with local and national trade union relations, personnel and social policy. I was fairly low down.

I gained the qualifications of the Institute of Personnel Management and was later upgraded to a fellow of the institute. I do not think that it was a consequence of that that the then Prime Minister asked me to join the Department of Employment, where, for more than a year, I was an Under-Secretary with responsibility for industrial relations, employment law and matters such as health and safety. Following a change of responsibilities, I took over equal opportunities from Alan Clark. Since that time, I have maintained an interest in those issues.

With the exception of one or two parts, the Bill has my support because it is justifiable. I shall not reiterate any of my speeches on Report or on Second Reading. That which the Minister has tried to defend in the context of this amendment is unjustifiable. If the amendment is accepted, its provisions will be reversed in the same way as the exportation of the Tolpuddle martyrs in 1834 was reversed three years later, I think by a Conservative Government, although when the martyrs returned the Government may have changed.

The watchword of those farm labourers from Dorset, who, in practice, were sent abroad because they had formed a trade union, was, "We will, we will, we will be free."

The Court of Appeal has said that employees are free to join trade unions and that whatever other purpose an employer may have, if he takes action that has the effect of totally negating trade union membership, that is and has been unlawful. I think that that is a fair summary of the law.

Whatever other purpose the employers had in the newspaper case and the ports case, what they did was unlawful because it totally negated union membership.

The Ullswater amendment states that we can consider some other purpose and let it overrule the admitted effect of what employers do.

On the last Sunday of Labour government in 1979, there was a Conservative Trade Unionists rally at Wembley attended by 2,000 trade union members and their families. I was the president of Conservative Trade Unionists at that time. Margaret Thatcher was there and many people spoke. We were demonstrating that trade union members and their families were welcome within the Conservative family and could trust the Conservatives to do things that were defensible on the shop floor, in the office and in various other places where people work.

I am not arguing against individual contracts for senior people or for people of any grade or level within an organisation. As the industrial tribunal held in paragraphs 60, 61 and 62 that the effect of what the employers did was totally to negate trade union membership, that should be regarded in simple terms as a straightforward undermining of freedom of association.

Associated Newspapers could have achieved its objective in a way that was not unlawful, although I would not necessarily have approved of what it did. I should be careful about how I put this, but newspapers have had great success in getting employees on to individual contracts whether or not they wanted them. In my view, it would have been possible for Associated Newspapers to achieve its objective without acting unlawfully, but it is not my purpose to give newspapers free consultancy advice on how to achieve their aims; they have plenty of good lawyers of their own.

The ports employer wrote to me saying that the company

"took legal advice at every stage of the transition to personal contracts".

If it took legal advice and was held by the industrial tribunal and the Court of Appeal to have done something illegal, I suggest that the company should consider the quality of that legal advice. If it argued that because it is now preparing to apply for leave to go to the House of Lords, let me make the following plea to my right hon. and hon. Friends on the Front Bench.

The cost and the financial risk to an employee and a trade union of even getting to the Court of Appeal where one is facing rafts of QCs is high. I would estimate that the cost to one of those applicants, if they had failed in the Court of Appeal, would have been about £150,000.

The law is supposed to be, and always was, clear. It was obvious to the industrial tribunal and the Court of Appeal. Will my right hon. Friend consider taking over the action if leave is granted by the House of Lords and indemnify the successful applicant? I am not asking for an answer today.

The Government's intention is quite clear, as shown by Lord Ullswater's announcement six days after the Court of Appeal gave its decision, that they would overturn the judgment by the Court of Appeal. Six days is pretty fast in Government terms, especially when two days were a weekend and one may have been a bank holiday; they could not have had more than four working days. If, from the moment they heard the result or even before the Court of Appeal produced its judgment, the Government's intention had been to nullify any judgment not in accord with their now stated view, there is a case in justice and equity for the Government to say that the Appeal Court decision to award costs to the applicant would stand so that, in any case in the House of Lords at least, the applicants would not be at further financial risk.

The Government made it plain on 6 May, in the debate in the House of Lords on 24 May and again today that they are not at present willing to accept the law as stated by the Court of Appeal. My view is that there is no reason for the House of Lords to give leave to appeal, because the confusion in the minds of the employment appeal tribunal —a perfectly genuine confusion—was in the distinction of words. The Court of Appeal judgment was clear.

Let us move on to what is right and return to the law in a moment. There are two circumstances that trouble or should trouble the House. The first is where there are collective agreements. The employer wants to derecognise the union for a purpose or for all purposes except for health and safety at work, as the Health and Safety at Work, etc. Act 1974 would not allow that.

If individual contracts are to be imposed, or if collective bargaining is to be nullified, my understanding is that the employer has to give sufficient notice and then can say, "From our point of view, the collective agreement has gone and there will be new terms of employment." In those circumstances, an employer should not be able to take action that discriminates between union members and non-union members to the effect of totally negating union membership.

The second circumstance would involve an employer whose employees are on individual contracts. Let us suppose that one or two of the employees join a union, or have always been a member of a union, but want to start working together collectively and approach the employer on that basis. If in the individual contracts of employment, out of a pay index of 100, for example, 20 units or one fifth of the employees' salary was paid as a consideration for being on individual contracts of employment, would the employer be able to say to two or more employees who had asked a union to approach the employer asking for collective recognition and bargaining—a perfectly reasonable request—"We are sorry, but because your contract of employment which you signed as an employee and we signed as an employer says that one fifth of your earnings are in consideration of your being on individual contracts, and because your union has now made an approach, you should now give back 20 per cent. of your pay"? Would that be lawful?

As the consideration of being on individual contracts was 4·5 per cent. in the Associated Newspapers case, I should like to have stated with authority what the position would be. I am not a lawyer; I have only been involved in industrial relations, industrial economics and other practical things. Perhaps a clever lawyer can find a way of making sure there is an instant penalty if ever a union representative appears at an employer's door saying, "We have been asked by some of your work force if you will speak to us as their representatives." I find it very worrying and see it as a possibility of undermining freedom of association.

In my trade union branch we have had occasional campaigns, although I have not taken an active part in them, to get union recognition in the hotel and catering industries, which used to have some minimum protection by wages councils, at least for a minimum hourly rate. We have been told by some Ministers that the abolition of wages councils would lead to an increase in employment. I say in passing that the best estimate was that if we reduced the pay of people on minimum rates by 18 per cent. we might achieve a 1 per cent. increase in employment in those fields.

The implication of the abolition of wages councils was that collective agreements could come in and do as well. The case constantly being offered to the House was of people in the road haulage industry, leaving aside the fact that that industry has some of the strongest union organisation in the country.

People in wages councils industries, or what will soon be ex-wages councils industries, are in the main presumably on individual contracts of employment, as union organisation is not strong in those industries. If a trade union representative, whether a lay representative or a paid representative, goes to the employer and says, "I want to say a few words on behalf of the people you employ," will penalties on those workers be lawful?

An employer can say, hand on heart, "It is in the interests of my employees, because it is in the interests of my customers, for all employees to be on individual contracts" and may consider that to be a reasonable belief. It would not be a common one, but it might be held to be reasonable. If not, what is the point of the Ullswater amendment?

I return to what people thought the law had been. That point was made by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State who spoke about restoring the law to what it was held to be. The Appeal Court has done that. I am becoming more conservative as I spend more years in the House. Perhaps I have spent too long in the House because I am becoming a little stuck in the mud.

The law was commonly held by people in personnel management, in the Industrial Society, among trade unions and among most employers' associations to be that action could not be taken which would, in effect, negate the benefits of union membership, with the exception, as my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State would remind me if I did not say it first, of some rights concerning accidents at work or other problems, in which area he has more experience than I have and union members have more reason to be grateful to him than to me because I have not done such work.

5.30 pm

My right hon. Friend said that he has nothing against trade unions. I accept that. He said that we should not confuse collective bargaining with other things. I have read out the part of the Court of Appeal judgment which elides whatever difference there may have been between us. My right hon. Friend referred to the 1975 debate. In full context, that would probably prove a point that I would want to make, but there is no need to argue about it too much, because we can always return to the fact that the industrial tribunal and the Court of Appeal produced a judgment saying that the law was what I had believed it to be and what most people had believed it to be.

The question that we must put back to the Government is whether the Ullswater amendment clarifies the law or changes the law. I hope that the debate will persuade the Government Front Bench that its effect is to change the law. That point has obviously not been accepted by the Front Bench and it may take some time to do so, but that is the essential point.

If the general view is that the law is being changed by the Ullswater amendment, introduced on a procedural basis in a fairly unusual and abrupt way, I hope that my right hon. Friend will tell the House that he will in some way try to ensure that its effect will be at least suspended until there has been consultation.

I hope that whoever replies to the debate will answer this question: what consultation paper was available in public to the trade unions, the TUC, employers, the CBI, the Engineering Employers Federation and all the other employers' federations and associations before the Government decided on the terms of the Ullswater amendment? I have not been aware of one and I have not seen an open consultation paper on its contents in the press that I read.

One can argue that from 6 May to 24 May was only about two and a half weeks, but open consultation would still have been possible. I ask any hon. Member to intervene and tell me if he or she was aware of any open consultation on the Ullswater amendment.

Mr. Peter Thurnham (Bolton, North-East): There was a fairly clear understanding of how things worked until the Court of Appeal judgment. That is what caused the difficulty. That is why the Government were right to introduce the Ullswater amendment to clear up the matter.

Mr. Bottomley: That may be so, but I remind the House that the question that I was putting was whether any hon. Member was aware of any open consultation between 6 May and 24 May when the Ullswater amendment was considered in the other place. I am not aware that hon. Members who have links with trade unions are rising. I am not aware that those who may have better links with employers are rising. In fact, I notice no movement anywhere.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, North-East (Mr. Thurnham) makes the point that everyone thought that the law allowed employers to do what two employers were told by the Court of Appeal was illegal. That may be so, but it is not a view which I share. However, my hon. Friend, in his creation of jobs, may have had a different experience. I do not think that employers previously believed that to be the law. I think that Associated British Ports and the newspaper group received legal advice saying that such action was worth a try and the industrial tribunal said that it was not worth a try.

Mr. Patrick Nicholls (Teignbridge): I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way. [Interruption.] One chooses one's friends. I put the point in the way that I wish to. The hon. Gentleman makes the point that there was no consultation. Precisely what does he think the purpose of that consultation would have been? Does he envisage that he might have changed his own mind? I have to say that I doubt it, in which case I am not sure what the purpose of that consultation would have been.

Mr. Bottomley: It is silly for people in the same party when they have a disagreement to resort to that sort of personal abuse which is uncharacteristic of Members of the House. I am aware that when I was a Minister my hon. Friend the Member for Teignbridge (Mr. Nicholls) was one of those who thought that I was not doing the right thing on wages councils. As a member of the Conservative party, I do not think that we do the wrong thing when we speak up for those who may want to band together for collective strength. We may have differences and disagreements, but some kind of loyalty to each other is a reasonable thing for which to ask. If my hon. Friend thinks that I am not open to argument, he does not know me very well.

I shall repeat the question and then leave it. Who shows any manifestation of believing that the worth of union membership could be totally negated but not have that held as a deterrence of union membership, which is clearly unlawful?

There is no doubt that deterrence of union membership is unlawful. If I am wrong about that my hon. Friend will no doubt intervene. He rightly accepts the law and that is plainly the law.

Then comes the question whether we should allow the law to be changed to allow another purpose to overtake that purpose of deterring union membership. My argument is no, we should not.

My regret is that there are not more Conservative Members who have come up through trade unions who, speaking the sort of words and expressing the sort of thoughts that I have been doing, can represent those whom I have been representing here today.

It is a mistake for the trade unions to continue their strong links with the Labour party. That is one reason why we have an unbalanced debate. I hope that in time the Conservative party will show, in its actions as well as in its words, in what it does in the House as well as in what it says at election time, that it wants the support of working people, whether or not they are members of unions; that we want people to choose whether to join a union and that we shall maintain the law as it has been clearly stated since 1975 and that no one shall be deterred from union membership.

Mr. Leighton: If ever anyone wanted evidence of the need for a change of Government, the appalling way in which the Government are behaving on this issue is it. Only a Government with the arrogance that comes from 14 years in power, a Government who think that they can do what they like, would attempt to do what they are doing and in such a way, overturning the decisions of the courts and abusing parliamentary procedures. When it come to assaulting trade unions, the Government think that anything goes.

The amendment must be a violation of international agreements. It must be a breach of International Labour Organisation conventions because it is a direct assault on the freedom of association, which is a basic human right. It penalises and victimises citizens for what the Government appear to regard as the crime of collective bargaining.

Let us consider the case, mentioned by the hon. Member for Eltham (Mr. Bottomley), of Associated Newspapers Ltd. v. Wilson. That company publishes the Daily Mail and similar associated papers and had recognised the National Union of Journalists since 1912. In 1989, the editors of the firm's three papers decided to derecognise the NUJ and to move from collectively agreed terms and conditions of employment to individual contracts.

Those on individual contracts received salaries that were 4·5 per cent. higher than those being paid under the collective agreement. Incidentally, that increase was backdated to 1989. The individual, Mr. Wilson—I emphasise the word "individual" because I have heard all the Government's rhetoric about how they are looking after the rights of the individual—claimed that, by paying him less and providing him with less favourable terms and conditions than those who had transferred to individual contracts, the firm had taken action short of dismissal against him which was penalising him for being a union member.

What is the law? Section 23(1) of the Employers Protection (Consolidation) Act 1978 states that "every employee shall have the right not to have action (short of dismissal) taken against him as an individual by his employer for the purposes of . . . preventing or deterring him from being or seeking to become a member of an independent trade union, or penalising him for doing so".

That is the law; that language has been in our law for two decades. It was introduced in the early 1970s, since when six anti-union Bills have been enacted without interfering with it.

In its judgment allowing the appeal, the Court of Appeal held that when terms offered under personal contracts were better than those available under a collective agreement, with the aim of reducing the power of the union to the point where it was wholly negated, the purpose of the action was clearly to give effect to "the wholly foreseeable consequence of deterring employees from being trade union members".

As such, it was an action taken to deter people from trade union membership within the meaning of section 23 of the Act. A similar judgment was made in the case of Associated British Ports.

That judgment was unanimous: all three judges concurred that the employer's action constituted unlawful discrimination. The law is clear; the employer's action breached Acts dating back to the early 1970s and the words that I have quoted have been consolidated in all the legislation that the Government have enacted since 1979. It is ludicrous for them to claim that the law is unclear and that the amendment is intended merely to clarify it. The truth is that the law is too clear for the Government. They do not want to clarify it; they want to change it, to the detriment of individual employees. It is all part of their vindictive attack on workers' rights and freedoms.

Surely, if there is any difficulty, the law should be clarified in the courts. We do not know whether this case is likely to go to the House of Lords. How is it possible to talk about clarifying the law when the Law Lords have yet to consider the matter? One cannot but be amazed and appalled by the Government's extraordinary behaviour: they are showing complete disrepect for the law and the courts. Within days of the judgment, before anyone had read the full transcript of the ruling and without waiting to see whether there would be an appeal to the House of Lords, they announced the tabling of an amendment to change the law because the judges had not done what the Government wanted them to do. They proposed immediate legislation, with none of the usual prior consultation with interested parties. Moreover, the text of the amendment was not available until the last possible moment before the debate.

I understand that the Standing Orders in the other place were suspended to allow the amendment to be dealt with in Committee, on Report and on Third Reading in a single day, which kept the House sitting until 2 am. What a way for the mother of Parliaments to behave; what an example to set other countries. Some of us are members of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association and the Inter-Parliamentary Union, and take part in seminars to explain to visitors the wonderful way in which our Parliament works and the rule of law in this country. I wonder whether we shall be sufficiently proud of this example to explain it to them.

The amendment is an attack on workers' freedom of association—on basic human rights and freedoms. The Minister has told us that it is all right for a worker to have a union card—that is a private matter—but, if that worker wants to use the union's facilities, he will be penalised. That would give bad employers the green light to victimise and penalise trade unionists. It would allow them to withhold pay increases from workers who refused to renounce union representation. Workers who bargained through their unions would lose all protection against discrimination and the powers of those unions would consequently be reduced. The unions would be negated —a word used by the hon. Member for Eltham.

The Government used to talk of reforming unions. It is now clear that they want to destroy them completely and to deny them their legitimate role. The Government are venting their spleen and malice on unions: they want to stack the cards against them and in favour of macho employers. The Government should be careful; show me a country without free trade unions and I will show you a dictatorship.

The Government should stop this vendetta against their own people. After six anti-trade union Acts, the unions cannot be blamed for the ghastly state of the British economy. Given the current state of the labour market, trade unions are more necessary than ever to give workers some protection and some rights in the workplace. Our people now recognise that: public opinion polls show that the unions are very popular and that workers want the protection that they afford.

This mean, spiteful, malicious amendment is a disgrace to Parliament. If it is passed, I hope that a future Labour Government will give priority to its repeal.

5.45 pm

Mr. Nicholls: Let me begin by declaring my interests in Hill and Smith Holdings, the NSCC, Port Enterprises Ltd., the Waterfront Partnership, the Howard de Walden Estates, MinOtels and Dunn and Baker.

The theme that runs through this debate is what the Conservative Government have tried to do in the trade union legislations that they have enacted since 1979. Although it seems narrow, the amendment raises some fundamental questions, as was pointed out by both the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) and my hon. Friend—as he wishes me to call him—the Member for Eltham (Mr. Bottomley).

The debate has featured at least one red herring. There has been disagreement about whether the law is being clarified or changed. Obviously, to some extent, one man's change in the law is another's clarification; however, I see nothing wrong in saying that, although it is clear that the legislators originally intended the law to operate in a certain way, the law has now been found not to be operating in that way. At that stage, the House will need to make a decision. The circumstances are not unique, but relatively common. The House must say, "If that is the way in which the words come across literally, and it is not what we intended, we must take steps. Shall we accept that the law must be thus—although we never thought that it should be—or shall we change it?"

Usually, when such circumstances arise, Ministers are consulted. They normally reply that, if a suitable legislative vehicle existed, they might be able to do something; but such a vehicle can rarely be found when a clarification of the law is thought necessary. It just so happened that a Bill was going through the House whose long title suggested that it might be suitable: I see nothing wrong in principle with saying, "For once we have a suitable vehicle. Let us take advantage of it."

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I shall try not to intervene again, but my hon. Friend may be able to help me on the question of what the law was thought to be. I have failed to find any reference in any of the personnel management books and loose-leaf binders, or in any decisions made by industrial tribunals, employment appeal tribunals or the Court of Appeal, that suggests that those decisions came as a surprise. What makes my hon. Friend believe that the people involved considered it possible to negate the benefits of union membership without offending against subsection (1)(a) of what was section 23 of the 1978 Act?

Mr. Nicholls: I cannot begin to aspire to my hon. Friend's command of the sections and subsections. Moreover, it is clear that he has thoroughly researched the case law in the hope that it can help him with a particular proposition.

When the law is thought to be settled and definite, nothing can be found in case law, because the practitioners have made a correct assumption. What does happen from time to time is that, even when the legislation is believed to be operating in a certain way, it then goes to be tested in one court or another, and it turns out that what was thought to have been settled has not been settled after all.

The Minister of State, Department of Employment (Mr. Michael Forsyth): It may help the House if I explain that the employment appeal tribunal said that the section

"has caused and may well continue to cause problems . . . We share the difficulties which this Industrial Tribunal found in the wording of section 23(1)(a)."

Mr. Nicholls: It was wrong.

Mr. Forsyth: What was asked for was an indication of who had said that there was some difficulty in understanding the law.

Mr. Nicholls: What my hon. Friend the Minister has said is a perfectly correct statement of what the law's approach would have been in a situation such as this.

In effect, we have three tribunals. We have the tribunal of first instance—the industrial tribunal—the employment appeal tribunal and then the Court of Appeal. If three such tribunals can come to differing conclusions, whatever the law might be, it is obvious that it is far from clear, and that it needs to be clarified. The fact that that difficulty had not arisen before proves the point precisely. It was thought to be settled, there was a disagreement between the three tribunals, and it needs to be clarified.

Mr. Heald: Does my hon. Friend agree that the employment appeal tribunal is the most knowledgeable and skilled tribunal of any in this area, because it consists of a chairman who is a High Court judge and who handles those cases day in, day out, and representatives from both sides of industry? Will my hon. Friend accept from me, as a lawyer who was advising people on these issues at the time, that there was considerable complexity involved?

Mr. Nicholls: That is right. I too used to do a considerable amount of industrial relations law. I will probably be in hot water with the Court of Appeal if I say that if one is looking at a thorough working through of the complex issues involved, the employment appeal tribunal usually provides better guidance than most.

The plain fact is that, if three tribunals cannot agree, whatever else one might say about the law, it is not clear.

Mr. Alex Carlile: Before the hon. Gentleman took on all those impressive parliamentary consultancies that he mentioned, I understand that he used to practise as a solicitor. Does he not think that it might have been wiser for the Government to wait for a determination of the issue by the House of Lords before rushing headlong into this new legislation, or does he think that the employment appeal tribunal is a more useful guide to these issues than the House of Lords, which is the highest court in the country?

Mr. Nicholls: The hon. and learned Gentleman's deference as a silk to the House of Lords is truly impressive. I dealt with that point a moment ago. Even if the matter had gone to the House of Lords and it had decided one way or another, two things would still be apparent. First, it would be apparent that there had been a difference of opinion about the state of the law as it passed through the various appellate processes—so to say that the law was clear would not have been true; secondly, the House would still have had to return to the question whether it believed that the effect of the law should be as the courts have decided.

At that stage, one has to look for an appropriate vehicle to change the law and, by then, the vehicle may well have gone on. There was a clear difference of opinion among the various tribunals, and the House now has an opportunity to say whether the law should be clarified in the way in which it was always thought that it would be interpreted. That is the proposition, and there is nothing wrong with it.

The point of principle underlying this amendment is what we are in the business of doing. The hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) dealt with his point of principle somewhat late in his speech, but with engaging frankness. He stated baldly that this is about the belief that more trade unions would be good for employees. It is a perfectly reasonable proposition, and for somebody who is sponsored by a trade union it is probably a predictable and inevitable conclusion to reach. However, should the House believe that more trade unions would automatically be a good idea for the people of this country and for employees? I do not necessarily see it that way.

This legislation is not anti-trade union. How could it be anti-trade union, when it is from a Government who enacted the right not to be refused employment on the basis of trade union membership? It is worth reminding ourselves that it was a Conservative Government who introduced that legislation.

We know that the Labour party is opposed to this amendment. How long will that opposition last? The background to this has included five employment Bills, and we should look at the things that the Labour party has opposed to the rooftops. It has opposed secret ballots before the election of trade union officers, secondary picketing, secondary action, pre-strike ballots and the idea of a postal ballot. It is not long ago that it was opposing to the nth degree the idea that the closed shop—that monstrosity—should be abolished.

In due course, the Labour party suddenly decided that it was not against all those things after all. We must look at this proposition in that light. It would be entirely inconsistent for a Government to enshrine in law the idea that one should not be refused employment because of trade union membership and then to indulge in this piece of legislation if it satisfied the description given by Opposition Members.

Of course trade unions should be entitled to combine in their own interests. However, recognition is a matter for trade union members. It cannot be right for them to impose recognition on employers simply because trade unions decide that that is what they want. I apologise if, in a misplaced attempt at humour, I upset my hon. Friend the Member for Eltham, but, as one Conservative to another, I find it difficult to see how one can go along with the idea that a trade unionist should be entitled to impose recognition on an employer.

That cannot possibly be right. It must be up to an employer who owns, runs and knows his business to decide whether to recognise a trade union for particular purposes. My hon. Friend the Member for Eltham obviously finds that a bizarre proposition; I do not.

Mr. Leighton: It is not about whether an employer can derecognise, because, under the law, he can. The judge has said that he should not offer a bribe to a certain section of workers to do so.

Mr. Nicholls: The hon. Gentleman can put it in those terms if he wishes.

Mr. Leighton: It was not me—it was the judge.

Mr. Nicholls: One of the things that we are trying to cope with today is the fact that different judges and three different tribunals see things—

Mr. Leighton: Three judges.

Mr. Nicholls: It is touching to see the Labour party say how much it wants to support judges. The Labour party supports judges only when they say what it wants them to say. The hon. Gentleman is being highly selective in the judges that he is prepared to agree with. It is tempting to wish that it would go to the House of Lords—I say this in a moment of jocularity—simply so that he might have to come back in due course and say how much he supports the judges in the House of Lords.

There is an ambiguity, and it needs to be clarified. This is about the proposition advanced by the Opposition and my hon. Friend the Member for Eltham—that, once trade union members decide that they wish to be collectively responsible, it should be imposed on employers, and that any paid differentials which come about can be dismissed as a bribe or a douceur. The thread running through this issue is not that more trade unions are good, but that it should be open to the people involved to make up their own minds—that includes employers—whether they will accept the recognition that unions may demand of them in a particular situation. I do not find that an ignoble principle—it is a theme that has run through our legislation since 1979.

When my hon. Friend the Member for Eltham and I were members of the Government together, trade union legislation was being passed. My hon. Friend had day-to-day responsibility for trade union matters, as I also did for a time. Perhaps we can agree on one thing. When I saw the themes running through such legislation, I did not feel that I as a Minister was being asked to do something so appalling that I should resign. Hearing my hon. Friend speak, with some eloquence, I wonder how he managed to stay on board at times if he felt so strongly about the legislation that we were introducing.

Mr. Peter Bottomley rose—

Mr. Nicholls: I shall now give my hon. Friend the opportunity to make the resignation speech that he denied himself at the time.

Mr. Bottomley: First, I do not recall industrial relations legislation being passed when I was a Minister at the Department of Employment, although my memory may be at fault. Secondly, nor do I recall in the first 14 years of Conservative government any proposal to change the law so as to negate completely the benefits of union membership, in flat contradiction of section 23(1)(a)—the industrial tribunal's finding of fact.

Mr. Nicholls: Let me cheer up my hon. Friend at once. If he is casting his mind back to find out when he was an Employment Minister, I can tell him that it was between September 1984 and January 1986. Mercifully, I can agree that, at that precise point in time, no employment legislation received the force of law. If he wants to point out that he voted against employment legislation when he was in another Department and somehow remained a member of the Government, I shall accept what he says.

However, my hon. Friend is making a serious point, which needs to be dealt with. The amendment will not negate all the benefits of being in a trade union. We are all aware of examples of people being members of trade unions and presumably paying their dues willingly, but their employer is not able to negotiate their pay. My hon. Friend might believe that the only benefit of being in a trade union is the ability to negotiate pay, but there is much more to it than that.

Mr. Thomas Graham (Renfrew, West and Inverclyde): Does not the hon. Gentleman realise that the Government are in the business of improving industrial relations, but that the legislation is a recipe for disaster? I do not know whether the hon. Gentleman has ever worked in a factory alongside people who are members of a different union. What happens if one person earns £2 an hour more than another for exactly the same work merely because he is not in a trade union? Surely no hon. Member could accept such a situation in British industry.

Mr. Nicholls: The hon. Gentleman speaks with great sincerity, but I should have more sympathy with what he is saying and be more likely to agree if, since 1979, the Opposition had not opposed every trade union reform that we have introduced. The Labour party's position on all our trade union reforms has been that it agrees with the reform before last, is not quite sure about the last one and believes that the present one is an outrage. That is the way the party presented itself to the electorate.

In a practical sense, I accept what the hon. Gentleman says. Such a situation might cause difficulties, but working life is difficult. Is he leaping from that proposition to saying that the state should be in the business of fettering an employer and stopping him offering a salary structure which he finds makes his business work? If the hon. Gentleman believes that, he would impose a restriction on employers and businesses and prevent them from offering jobs which last and succeed.

In the end, the one thing that unites—or should unite—all parties, although I sometimes wonder whether it does, is that we want businesses to succeed. That is what the amendment is all about, and that is why it is entirely right.

Mr. Alex Carlile: When the hon. Member for Teignbridge (Mr. Nicholls) began his speech, he read out what sounded like a litany of private consultancies that he holds. If he were told by you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, or by those who have such authority that, because of those consultancies, they would deduct all the money that he receives as a consultant from his salary as a Member of the House plus one penny piece, I bet my bottom dollar that he would give up those consultancies in a flash. This proposal is about something very similar.

The proposal is an attempt to bribe or, to use the words of Lord Justice Dillon, to offer a douceur, or sweetener, to union members. It is not a sweetener to try to persuade them not to be members of a trade union—their right to be in a trade union remains, of course, enshrined in law—but it is an attempt to allow employers to offer a sweetener to make employees unable to exercise their rights as members of a trade union. That is offensive.

I regret that it was far from a privilege to listen to the hon. Member for Teignbridge when compared with the speech made by the hon. Member for Eltham (Mr. Bottomley). It was a privilege to listen to the hon. Member for Eltham because I believe—I hope that the Minister of State will reflect on this—that it represented the authentic voice of trade unionists who do vote or have voted for the Conservatives. I believe that Conservative trade unionists will find this proposal as offensive as trade unionists who vote for any Opposition party. The Government have signally failed to recognise that, perhaps because of the indecent speed with which the proposal was inserted in the Bill in another place.

The amendment makes doubtfully proper use of both Houses of Parliament. It is insupportable to suggest that it could be regarded as just; and its legality is questionable in the context of international law.

As for the propriety of their use of the House and of another place, I wonder why the Government thought it proper to introduce the clause with indecent haste when it was known that the employers who lost in the Court of Appeal were intent on going to the House of Lords on appeal. Why have not the Government waited for the determination of the House of Lords? Why have they sought to diminish the courts, which, in other contexts, they seek—or pretend to seek—to support?

The appeal decision was not the idiosyncratic decision of a radical who had accidentally found his way into the Court of Appeal. It was the unanimous decision of Lord Justice Dillon, Lord Justice Butler-Sloss and Lord Justice Farquharson, two men and one woman who are very experienced in the application of employment law, lawyers of eminence and brilliance who were not taken by surprise in having to reach such a finding.

Why do the Government seek to arrogate to themselves the role of a legislative Court of Appeal when the appellate remedies provided by our courts system have not been exhausted? Is it a precedent for the future? If so, it is a fine demonstration of the fact, now accepted not only by my party but by the Labour party, that there is a need to write down some constitutional limits. It is a good example for the argument that it is high time that we had a constitutional court, or its equivalent, so that we are not driven to seek remedies from distant courts in the international arena in order to assert individual liberties and rights.

How can the Government say that they were taken by surprise by the view expressed by the Court of Appeal and the industrial tribunal in the two cases involved? Where did the Government get their legal advice and what legal advice did they obtain? I ask the Minister of State to tell us when he answers the debate where in the past the Government obtained the legal advice that left them so surprised by the findings of the Court of Appeal. They certainly did not go to John Hendy QC, one of the leading employment lawyers in the country, who appeared for Mr. Wilson before the Court of Appeal. Had they done so, they would have found it far from surprising that the Court of Appeal should reach that conclusion. I do not pretend to be an expert on the subject, but I can tell the Minister of State—perhaps the Department of Employment needs to learn this—that there are plenty of employment lawyers apart from Mr. Hendy who have long believed that the decision of the Court of Appeal on behalf of Mr. Wilson and in the other case that has been mentioned were entirely predictable and were an application of the law as it was understood.

The hon. Member for Wallasey (Ms Eagle), who speaks in the House on employment issues with great skill and authority, referred earlier to the decision of the employment appeal tribunal—that, at least, should appeal to the hon. Member for Teignbridge—in the case of Discount Tobacco and Confectionery Ltd. v. Armitage, which was reached in 1990, nearly three years ago, and publicly reported in the "Industrial Relations Law Reports" for 1990 at page 15 onwards. Mr. Justice Knox, giving the judgment of the tribunal, said that it would "emasculate"—that is a strong word—our understanding in this country of the right to be a member of a trade union if it could be successfully argued that there was a distinction to be drawn between membership of the union and resorting to the services of a union officer to elucidate and negotiate the terms of employment. He said that the right to be a member of a trade union if that distinction, which was argued for in the case but rejected, were to exist in law. He continued:

"would be reduced almost to vanishing point"

"it would only be just the fact that a person was a member of a union without regard to the consequences of that membership that would be the subject matter of that statutory provision, and it sems to us that to construe that paragraph so narrowly would really be to emasculate the provision altogether".

In Mr. Wilson's case Lord Justice Dillon said that that judgment was "unquestionably correct". Lord Justice Dillon did not seem to think that the interpretation had been questioned in the period between the Armitage case and the decision in the Wilson case.

Mr. Nicholls rose——

Mr. Carlile: I shall give way in a moment.

Why do the Government claim surprise, when they knew the effect of the decision in the Armitage case? If they had considered the effect of Armitage at all they could only have concluded that the law was as Lord Justice Dillon declared it to be. In my view, for the Government to say that they were taken by surprise is a pretence. I do not accept for one moment that that was the sincerely held view of the Government when Lord Ullswater spoke, or that it is their view now.

Mr. Nicholls: The hon. and learned Gentleman defends his fellow judges with passion and sincerity. So that we can understand where he and his party stand on the matter, will he tell me whether he supports the right of a trade union to be recognised for collective bargaining purposes in a company if it represents a significant proportion of the relevant part of the work force, even if the employers do not wish to recognise it?

Mr. Carlile: I believe that the law must fall within article 11 of the European convention on human rights, as I shall explain in a moment.

Mr. Nicholls: Answer the question.

Mr. Carlile: If the hon Gentleman is more patient than usual, he will see that his question will be answered in due time.

Now I turn to whether the proposal can be regarded as just. How could it possibly be regarded as just, or as fair? Again, we must consider the words of Lord Justice Dillon. Whether we talk about a douceur, a sweetener or a bribe —call it what you will, Mr. Deputy Speaker—that is the effect of the measure. It is intended to allow an employer to offer a sweetener to emasculate the effect of being a trade union member.

The Secretary of State said that, unless what an employer did was reasonable, he would not get away with it. However—inadvertently, I am sure—the right hon. Gentleman misrepresented what the new provision says. I refer the Minister of State to subsection (3)(a) of the new clause, which would provide that the purpose for which the employer took the relevant action would be regarded as having been taken "to further a change in his relationship with all or any class of his employees".

The employer's action would be valid unless the tribunal considered

"that the action was such as no reasonable employer would take".

So it is not for the employer to prove that his action was reasonable; the burden is on the employee to prove that no reasonable employer in the land could reasonably have taken such action. That is a heavy burden, quite different from the Secretary of State's explanation.

Furthermore, that is not the end of the matter. Subsection (3) also says:

"the tribunal shall regard the purpose mentioned in paragraph (a) . . . as the purpose for which the employer took the action, unless it considers that the action was such as no reasonable employer would take".

It then adds the words:

"having regard to the purpose mentioned in paragraph (a)."

That means that so long as the employer's purpose was

"to further a change in his relationship with all or any class of his employees", his action is most unlikely to be regarded as unreasonable. The courts will have to consider the meaning of that last part of the proviso to subsection (3).

If my understanding of the provision is wrong, I ask the Minister of State, when he replies to the debate, to tell me why. At the very least, will he explain to the House why the words are contained in the subsection and what they mean? He probably knows that since a recent decision, the courts may have regard to what Ministers say in the House. I believe that the courts will be extremely puzzled by the words that I have quoted unless the Minister gives some clarification, no doubt based on advice, of what they mean. A failure to give such clarification will be regarded by me—and, I suspect, by others—as deliberate and as an acceptance of the fact that the Government are trying to circumscribe even the test of reasonableness.

Finally, is what the Government propose legal? Did the Government take independent legal advice as to whether the proposal is legal in terms of their obligations in international law? Will the Minister at least tell us whether they obtained advice from the Attorney-General as to whether the measure was consistent with those obligations? In particular, on what basis do the Government argue that their proposal falls within article 11 of the European convention on human rights? The words of Mr. Justice Knox in the Armitage case, which I quoted earlier, will remain good domestic law, even after the implementation of this proposal. Mr. Justice Knox's judgment makes it quite clear that to circumscribe the rights appurtenant to trade union membership is to restrict the right to trade union membership itself.

I do not know whether the Minister of State has ever read article 11 of the European convention on human rights. The convention is only a little book—even the Minister could read it before bedtime. Paragraph 2 of article 11, so far as it is relevant, says:

"No restrictions shall be placed on the exercise of these rights other than such as are prescribed by law and are necessary in a democratic society in the interests of national security or public safety, for the prevention of disorder or crime, for the protection of health of morals or for the protection of the rights and freedoms of others."

How can the Government say that this provision does not amount to a restriction on the exercise of the right to membership of a trade union? How can they claim that it is necessary in a democratic society? Do they say that it is necessary for the protection of public morals or to prevent disorder or crime? Certainly they cannot, with any justification, claim that it will protect the rights and freedom of others.

I know that the Minister of State is not enthusiastic about international organisations, although in this regard he sometimes tries to hide his fire under a bushel. Even so, he must agree that it is very important that the House of Commons should not demonstrate contempt for international law. Have the Government considered the international law implications of what they are doing? I believe that they may have failed to do so. If they have, I believe that they have got it wrong and I ask them to reconsider their position.

Mr. James Paice (Cambridgeshire, South-East): I should like to begin by declaring interests in Dixons plc, the British Fibreboard Association, the National Training Federation, United Framlingham Farmers Ltd. and Writtle College.

I listened with great care to the speech of the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson), who opened for the Opposition. The hon. Gentleman twice mentioned dates. He quoted words of Winston Churchill dating back to 1908, and he made use of the fact that one of the agreements referred to in the two cases from which this amendment springs dates from 1912. Surely that shows that it is time for a re-examination of the issue. By quoting from legislation and agreements drawn up at the beginning of the century, when we are within seven years of its end, the hon. Gentleman showed that he is one of the unreconstructed members of the Labour party.

In my view, the significant aspect of this matter is the need for employers to be flexible. As was said during Prime Minister's Question Time today, we are in a highly international competitive, single world market. We are competing not just with the town or city up the motorway, or even with France, but with the rest of the world. Thus, it is absolutely essential that employers be sufficiently flexible to meet all needs. A bitter truth that we sometimes delude ourselves into refusing to accept is that industry and commerce do not exist for the purpose of providing jobs. Businesses exist for the purpose of engaging in economic activity, which provides people with work. When the activity ceases to be economic, the work disappears. Indeed, we have seen the disappearance of too many jobs in those circumstances.

I do not believe, and I do not make the case, that every employer in this country is perfect. There are some very bad employers. [HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] I am the first to recognise that fact, but I dissent strongly from the view, which I suspect is held by those who are momentarily supporting my words, that that law can be used to correct all the bad practices of employers. It is the sharp teeth of competition that encourages employers to adopt good employment practices and, thereby, minimise disruption and maximise productivity.

Before becoming a Member of Parliament I spent some time in training and management development. With that experience, I believe very strongly that it is in the interests of all employers to adopt employment practices that minimise disruption, minimise the number of employees who leave, and maximise the ability of everyone to contribute, to develop personal skills and to be rewarded for doing so. Otherwise, businesses fold under the pressures of competition. But it is for the employer to decide how these issues should be addressed; it is not for this House to legislate.

I support the principle of minimum employment protection legislation, but this amendment is giving employers flexibility to amend their arrangements with individual employees to meet their needs.

Ms. Eagle: I have been listening with interest to the hon. Gentleman's comments about international competition and the pressure that it puts on those who organise industry in this country. Will the hon. Gentleman admit that when all restaints are removed, by virtue of the fact that there are minimum employment rights and there is no trade union organisation, competition is achieved by lowering wages, by introducing terms and conditions that exploit employees and by generally impoverishing the work force, whereas it should be achieved by having good research and development, good sales techniques and high-quality products?

Mr. Paice: High-quality research and development and products are obviously vital in any market. I do not accept, however, that low wages are necessary to the achievement of maximum competitiveness. What matters is not the amount of money that is paid to the individual but what each unit of production costs. Into that equation must go the whole question of investment in technology —machinery and whatever else is required for production —as well as the overlaying costs of employment, the social chapter and work force flexibility. I do not accept that low unit costs can be achieved simply by reducing wages. Unit costs, rather than the number of pounds that an employer receives per week, are the key to competitiveness.

As I have already said, I am the first to accept that there are bad employers who seek to achieve competitiveness by lowering rates of pay. In the long run, however, such employers are doomed to defeat because they are ducking the key issues. If they pay too low a wage, they will have problems with their work force. Their staff will be discontented and many of them will leave to go to other jobs for better wages. Ultimately, such behaviour will cost employers money and cause them to wish that they had adopted more advanced and sensible employment practices.

Mr. Graham: How in God's name can we ensure good industrial relations if we introduce an amendment that will divide the work force by enabling employers to say, "If you are not a member of a trade union, we will pay you extra"? How can that create better employment relations in Great Britain and get Britain back to producing goods? It makes no sense deliberately to divide the work force in that way, and it seems to me that the Government are wasting the time of the House with their mad and stupid measures.

Mr. Paice: Clearly there is a difference of opinion as to what the amendment does. I do not believe that it will necessarily divide the work force as the hon. Gentleman suggests. I agree with the point that he made in an intervention in the remarks of my hon. Friend the Member for Teignbridge (Mr. Nicholls), which was that the concept of two people who work alongside each other doing an identical job but earning different rates of pay is bound to lead to discontent. But the amendment refers to the tribunal regarding the purpose mentioned in paragraph (b) as the purpose for which the employer took the action

"unless it considers that the action was such as no reasonable employer would take having regard to the purpose mentioned in paragraph (a)"

I submit that no reasonable employer would embark on a course of action that would lead to two people doing identical jobs being paid different rates.

Mr. Dennis Turner (Wolverhampton, South East): Where has the hon. Gentleman been these last few years? He talks about good and bad employers. Is he not aware that in Britain today thousands upon thousands of working people are being subjected to injustice every day of their working lives? There are bad employers who are making people redundant or placing them on temporary contracts. People are starting one day and being sacked the next. They receive no unemployment pay and no sickness benefit and have no rights whatever. People are working in those circumstances because they are in fear of the legislation that the Government have introduced. Why cannot the hon. Gentleman see that the Bill and the amendment will exacerbate the problems with which working people are already faced?

Mr. Paice: The hon. Gentleman was not listening to what I said. I said quite clearly that I accept that there are bad employers in this country—although I suggest that redundancies are more likely to be the result of the economic circumstances facing a particular business at a particular time than the mark of a bad employer. I do not believe that the amendment would have the effect that the hon. Gentleman believes it would.

In addition to the importance of competitiveness to which I referred earlier, it must be remembered that the whole concept of working practices is changing fast—not only because of the international situation but because of people's changing priorities and desires. I refer, for example, to the development of part-time work, which is often sought by employees rather than imposed by companies. The attitude to weekends—and, dare I say it, Sundays—is changing. Some mothers wish to work for only a few hours a day while their children are at school. Such developments have caused British businesses to consider more flexible working arrangements. Employers therefore need to be more flexible.

We have moved away from the situation that pertained 20 or 30 years ago when massed ranks of people, all of them doing identical jobs, came out of the factories. Of course such businesses still exist, but they are changing fast. The vast majority of people are now employed in much smaller companies and there is a much greater range of responsibilities and job functions within those companies. That is why I believe that the flexibility embodied in the amendment is essential.

Mr. Jimmy Boyce (Rotherham): Does not the hon. Gentleman realise that what he is saying would ring more true if the proposals included protection against the bad employers whom he recognises exist? We could accept much of the hon. Gentleman's argument if the proposals encompassed such protection, but in fact the opposite is the case.

Mr. Paice: No. The minimum legislation to which I referred is already in place. We are discussing a particular amendment today, but a number of employment Acts have been introduced during the Government's term of office. Those Acts have drawn the sting from the impositions made by Labour and other Governments on employers while leaving in place the minimum standards of employment protection that I believe are essential.

Mr. Eric Clarke (Midlothian): I have spent much of my life negotiating deals nationally with nationalised industry. An important aspect of such negotiations was the discipline that we could bring to the negotiating table. Is the hon. Gentleman aware that it is easy for a major employer to discuss with the trade union movement? I have also spent my life negotiating and discussing with my members the deals that have been reached. We had to sell them the idea. The argument is that it is easier that way. Moreover, it was good for industry and good for production. One had a sense of fairness. Everyone knew exactly where he stood.

The hon. Gentleman seeks to turn the clock back. He suggests that the amendment is fair because it gives the employer a better deal, but employees are not getting a better deal, are they? No one in the House could sell that argument to a group of people——

Madam Deputy Speaker (Dame Janet Fookes): Order. The hon. Gentleman is now making a speech.

Mr. Clarke: Can I just say——

Madam Deputy Speaker: No. That is enough.

Mr. Paice: The hon. Gentleman talks about reasonable employers and about benefits to employees. It is a sad reflection on our society that we still refer to employers and employees as if they were on opposing sides. I accept what the hon. Gentleman said about the benefits of trade unions being able to negotiate on behalf of a number of members and to reach agreement with the management of a nationalised industry—although I suggest that nationalised industries are perhaps not the best examples of the success of the process—and then to go back and sell to their members the benefits of a package that has been negotiated.

I do not think that I have ever said anything in my political life to suggest that I do not support the principle of trade unions or the right of employees to belong to trade unions if they so wish. I do, indeed, believe in those principles. I also believe, however, that it is in the interests of employers to be able to adjust their bargaining arrangements with individual employees to meet the needs not only of their business but of those employees, who may wish to work certain hours, undertake certain training and so on. A whole gamut of factors now comes into play.

We are not today faced with a situation in which everybody in a business works the same number of hours doing the same job. That was commonplace years ago. In the evolving world of the last decade of this century and into the next, every employer who wants to achieve the competitiveness that is required and wishes to meet the aspirations of many of his employees must have the flexibility that the amendment provides.

Ms Jean Corston (Bristol, East): I am grateful for the opportunity to speak in the debate. I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) that the amendment will ensure, in the employment context, that all forms of bribery and coercion will be lawful. It is a spiteful amendment which will undermine the rights of trade union members.

It is also an affront to normal parliamentary procedure in the manner of its introduction, for it represents an amendment of settled law. It will have the effect of negating trade union membership. It is clear that parties to the action would seek recourse to the House of Lords, which is supposed to be the highest judicial authority in the land and the decisions of which are binding on all lower courts, including the employment appeal tribunal. Those facts must be within the knowledge of the hon. Member for Teignbridge (Mr. Nicholls), who is a practising solicitor.

The Conservative party says that it is not against trade union membership. Conservative Ministers have said over the years, while introducing one piece of repressive legislation after another, that they were simply giving unions back to their members.

Labour Members see the legislation for what it is—an attempt to turn the industrial relations clock back to 1906. I make no apology for mentioning that date because if Conservative Members could find a way round the immunity from prosecution for torts committed in contemplation or furtherance of a trade dispute, I am sure that they would do so.

The amendment will ensure that trade union membership will be positively discouraged. Individuals will face the choice of accepting a pay cut or signing a new personal contract. That will happen under coercion and, in the process, they will be required to surrender the right to union representation. Such a choice cannot be said to extend the rights of employees. We recall that the Conservative manifesto of 1992 stated:

"We will take measures to give individuals greater freedom in choosing a union."

Instead, the amendment will give employers greater freedom to take vindictive action against trade union members. Nowhere was that better illustrated than in a company called J. W. Arrowsmith Ltd of Bristol. The factory is located in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, South (Ms Primarolo), though many of the employees live in my constituency.

Arrowsmith was a well-established printing company with no history of industrial unrest. There was never a strike, although there was a lock-out 13 years ago over a pay claim. But in 1988, employees were asked to take a pay cut of between 20 and 25 per cent., representing about £50 a week for most crafts people. That was agreed, to save the company.

Early in 1991, the company decided to discontinue the national agreements between the BPIF, the British Printing Industries Federation, which represented the employers, and the GPMU, the Graphical, Printing and Media Union, which represented the work force. That was supposed to take effect on 1 January 1992, and obviously it meant having an in-house agreement. So there was at least an element of collectivism in that there was an agreement between the people employed and the employer.

The company refused to enter into negotiations at the end of 1992 for the 1993 agreement, saying that it could not afford an increase because of the high cost of overtime. The company then reneged on a holiday pay agreement. In April, the GPMU decided to involve the company in the national pay claim, which was for £6·05 a week on basic pay and an extra day's holiday. That would have represented just under 3 per cent. The company refused that claim, so there was a dispute. Most other companies in the BPIF signed.

In accordance with Conservative-initiated legislation, a legal ballot was held and, by 98 to 14, it was agreed that industrial action short of a strike would be undertaken. They decided on a work to rule, the effect of which was that no overtime would be worked. One would have expected the employer to be pleased about that. After all, one of its reasons for not giving a pay rise was that overtime cost so much.

Three days later, the company issued a warning letter. It concerned anybody going on strike or doing anything outside the terms of a contract of employment collectively negotiated and agreed. The warning letter was followed on 26 April by departmental meetings addressed by Victoria Arrowsmith-Brown who, for all purposes, was the employer, informing them that if they did not sign a letter dissociating themselves from the action, they would be dismissed. They then received dismissal notices.

Hon. Members will find the terms of the dismissal notice interesting, bearing in mind the amendment that is before the House. The dismissal letter said:

"Industrial action short of a strike commenced on Thursday April 22 and you were asked to dissociate yourself from it and to give an undertaking that you would not participate in it. You declined to do that and you have therefore participated in industrial action which has disrupted production. By participating in that industrial action you have been, and still are, in repudiatory breach of your contract of employment. The company accepts your breach as terminating your employment with immediate effect. It is also accepting breaches of contract by other employees who have also been, and are, participating in industrial action, as terminating their employment. Your employment having ended, your form P45 and any money due to you will follow shortly."

The same notices were issued to staff who were absent through sickness, to those on holiday, to women on maternity leave and to an employee who had given 43 years' service and was due to retire the following day.

The following day, the workers were locked out. On 1 May they received new contracts containing similar pay rates to the previous year, a pay freeze for two years, lower overtime rates, lower shift rates and—a real sticking point—no recognition of any trade union and no representation by a trade union. The deadline for signing was 14 May. Three members of the trade union signed and returned to work. One other returned on 24 May, and he is on a three-month contract terminable at one day's notice.

It is important to remember that the company told employees on 1 May, when they were offered new contracts, that the company was willing to employ them only on the terms and conditions of employment which I summarised. The letter went on:

"No other terms and conditions will form part of your contract and, in particular, no term in any collective agreement which may have been reached by, or on behalf of, the Company with any union representing you will form part of the contract which is now being offered to you."

It went on to make it clear that the contract was exclusively individual.

As a result of the amendment that we are debating, Arrowsmith—assuming that it is a bad employer—would be able lawfully to differentiate between employees in terms of rates of pay. To date, the company has lost several contracts, many more are threatened and production is virtually nil. That employer seems to have had all the foresight and long-term planning of a Kamikaze pilot. The employees are not on strike, have never been on strike and have never threatened to strike.

The whole tragic and scandalous story reveals the way in which Conservatives condone, even encourage, behaviour by employers that is in breach of all accepted civilised standards. What will be the result if the amendment—and the nods and winks that accompany it—becomes law? What will the future hold for people in Bristol who cannot get income support, who cannot get maternity fund payments through the social fund and who cannot receive unemployment pay, even though the letter that I quoted said that they were dismissed? The employer will not confirm to the Department of Employment that they have been dismissed.

The effect of all that is that those people who at least understand what collective provision is about, and who are showing some form of support and solidarity to each other, will be able to be picked off because no one will refuse a pay rise at the end of the day.

Mr. Paice: I know nothing about the specific case to which the hon. Lady refers. However, I suggest that taking an individual example is a poor basis for any legislative action. More importantly, has not the hon. Lady made my case for me? She said that, since the dispute has arisen, the company has lost many orders and production is virtually at a standstill. That spells a dismal future for the company. Does that not demonstrate my point that a good employer will recognise that he must operate in a way that minimises disruption? I am sorry that employees will suffer if the company goes to the wall. But the company will also suffer—it will pay the price for handling its work force badly.

Ms Corston: The hon. Gentleman makes my point for me. If we were proceeding simply on the basis of one example, it would be outrageous. But that is exactly what we are doing—we are proceeding on the basis of what three learned judges, who are fully conversant with employment law, decided in one case. It is exactly the same as one example of an employer defying all of the decent standards. That is happening under the present law.

What the Government are doing—I presume that the hon. Gentleman will condone this in the Lobby tonight—is making it easier to negate trade union membership by offering sweetners. We are used to seeing sweetners in legislation from the Conservative Government, but the Bill extends them so that workers can be set against other workers—workers alongside each other will get different pay rates.

In terms of international labour obligations, the TUC said—and I agree with this—that the Government's action is in breach of International Labour Organisation convention No. 98, which provides for the right to organise and collective bargaining. The general principle of the convention is that no person should be prejudiced in his or her employment by reason of trade union membership or legitimate trade union activities. It is not simply a matter of a few bad employers because such behaviour undermines good employers—good employers can be undercut by those who pay below the agreed rates. What does that do for decent civilised standards and those companies which the hon. Gentleman considers to be good employers? It gives an employer a green light to treat his work force in that way.

The amendment has implications for the whole economic well-being of our country. We continue to hear Conservative Members say that they want the recession to end. We all want the recession to end. We all welcome real signs of recovery, but that is based on confidence not only in the City but in every home. Confidence depends on the ability to plan for the foreseeable future. How can people take out a mortgage, buy a car or enter into a hire purchase agreement if they have a three-month contract that is determinable at one day's notice?

It is time that the Government stopped substituting sound bites for sound policy. Conservative Members would do well to join the hon. Member for Eltham (Mr. Bottomley) in voting against the amendment tonight; otherwise they must accept that the Government's declaration of wanting a classless society that is at ease with itself and in which there is real choice for individuals is absolutely nothing but weasel words.

Mr. Thurnham: This debate is certainly generating a great deal of light and heat. Most of the light is on the Conservative Benches, and most of the heat and confusion is on the Labour Benches.

I warmly congratulate my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State on his new appointment. I am glad that he has been able to make his debut by speaking on this excellent Bill.

I regret that I did not have the opportunity to speak earlier on this Bill or serve on the Standing Committee. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Minister on his role in taking the Bill through the Standing Committee and ensuring that it is the important and valuable Bill that it is.

I am delighted that we have this amendment. The hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) said that it is a savage attack on freedom of association, but I cannot see what could be more reasonable. The amendment as introduced by Viscount Ullswater is couched in reasonable terms. It says:

"the tribunal shall regard the purpose mentioned . . . as the purpose for which the employer took the action, unless it considers that the action was such as no reasonable employer would take".

I cannot understand how the amendment could be construed as it has been by Labour Members.

I am sorry that my hon. Friend the Member for Eltham (Mr. Bottomley) is not here because I should like to take up some of his points. He said that he was not against individual contracts for senior people. I do not see why we must distinguish in that way and say that something is all right for senior people but not all right for other people. We should be able to have individual contracts right the way through. The whole purpose of the Bill is to ensure that employers and employees can reach individual bargaining arrangements. It in no way challenges the right of individuals to be members of a trade union.

Mr. Michael Clapham (Barnsley, West and Penistone): Does the hon. Gentleman accept that the Ullswater amendment gives not only the possibility of derecognising by virtue of individual contracts but the opportunity for employers to switch bargaining rights from one trade union to another trade union, thereby negating the freedom of choice of the employees whose bargaining rights are transferred?

Mr. Thurnham: If the hon. Gentleman had waited, I was about to come to that point. The law was never meant to interfere with the decisions of employers on what bargaining arrangements best meet their requirements. It is an employer's right to decide, in the light of the needs and circumstances of his business, how he wants to negotiate with his staff. The law should not put obstacles in the way of employers who want to move from collective bargaining and introduce individual pay negotiations and personal contracts.

The hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile) seemed to advocate—it was clear that he is a member of the legal profession—that people should continue to appeal at enormous cost and, undoubtedly, generate a lawyer's beanfeast rather than have the Government do what is obviously sensible and clarify the law as quickly as possible, in view of the fact that some doubt has arisen. My hon. Friend the Member for Romford (Sir M. Neubert) said that the Labour party is paid for by the trade unions.

The hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras told us about his grandfather and his father and went into the history of legislation going back to 1912. That legislation is all antique—it is not relevant to the modern world. He referred to Japan. I wonder whether he has had an opportunity to read "The Machine that Changed the World", which makes it clear that individual arrangements can lead to much higher productivity figures. The hon. Gentleman is looking strained.

Mr. Dobson: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that, generally speaking, productivity in German industry is greater than it is here and that the value of exports of manufactured goods per head of population is considerably higher in Germany than it is here? Does he also accept that it is exceedingly commonplace for there to be collective bargaining in German industry? The Germans believe that it enhances productivity and efficiency, and all the evidence shows that it does.

Mr. Thurnham: There is higher productivity in organisations all round the world where employers and employees are free to negotiate agreements to their own advantage. I recommend that the hon. Gentleman should go along the Corridor to the Library, ask for a copy of the "Machine that Changed the World" and read it. It was written by three lecturers from the Massachusetts Institute of Technology and paid for by this Government, the American Government and others in order to find out what happened in Japan. It is remarkable how it shows improvements in productivity.

The hon. Gentleman, when opening for the Opposition, cited the docks industry and the old Fleet street printing industry, as if they were examples of exactly what we should have. Those industries were riddled with restrictive practices and the hon. Gentleman voted against every piece of legislation introduced by this Government to clear out those practices. Perhaps he will say now whether he has changed his mind about his opposition to that legislation which has helped to make this country so much more productive now than it ever was in the past. [Laughter.] It is not a laughing matter.

Mr. Dobson: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Thurnham: No. The docks were riddled with restrictive practices, yet the hon. Gentleman did not support the Government's legislation to sort them out. How could the country achieve the necessary productivity and international trade if——

Mr. Terry Lewis (Worsley): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Thurnham: The hon. Gentleman has just walked into the Chamber, so I suggest that he sits down and listens to the debate——

Mr. Lewis: Give way.

Mr. Thurnham: ——rather than going on any longer.

Mr. Lewis: Give way.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. Members know quite well that if the Member who has the Floor does not give way they must resume their seat.

Mr. Thurnham: Thank you, Madam Deputy Speaker. it is reprehensible for Opposition Members to wander into the debate and try to intervene when they have not been here throughout the debate to listen to the points being made.

The hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras spoke about the Daily Mail. Perhaps he should remember the old Daily Herald. Was it not that newspaper that the Labour party wanted to see exist? He forgets that newspapers are bought by individuals. It is an individual contract, so to speak, when individuals buy newspapers. That must run throughout industry. Industry must rely on individual agreements. Newspapers are bought by individuals who decide to buy them. In the same way, an employer should be free to pay more or less for an employee.

The Labour party forgets that the amendment is all about pay increases. Labour Members want to level people down to the levels that they would have encouraged under collective bargaining. There has been opposition to the judge mentioning douceurs and so on. We are talking about pay increases.

Mr. Roy Hughes (Newport, East): The hon. Gentleman has talked about the industries that we have got rid of and about progressive trade union legislation that has been enacted during the 14 years of office of this Government. Will he ponder over what we have at the end of it? First, we have at least 3 million unemployed—and that is with rigged statistics. In addition, we have a £50 billion budget deficit. Is that what he calls progress?

Mr. Thurnham: I have not referred to any industries that we have got rid of. I can assure the hon. Gentleman that unemployment would be a great deal higher now than it is if industry were conducted as the Labour party would wish it. It is only by running our industry as competitively as we can that we can compete in world markets. Flexibility is the keynote to it. The importance of the individual must be paramount. That is built into the legislation and into this excellent Bill.

The Labour party has a record of opposing every piece of legislation we introduce to improve industrial relations, and no doubt it will oppose this measure. I call on my hon. Friends fully to support the amendment. I am sorry that my hon. Friend the Member for Eltham is not here. I hope that he will change his mind and will support the amendment.

Mr. Miller: The Secretary of State said that he intended to put the record straight. No one outside listening to his long diatribe would agree that the record is at all straight. The record is being established by a biased and bigoted Government who are intent on one thing. It is obvious that the Government deviously introduced the clause in order to mount a direct attack on the trade union movement.

I have already spoken privately to the Secretary of State for being most unneighbourly. I was going to congratulate him on his elevation to his new position, but he would not give way to me during his speech, so I shall save my personal criticism of him for outside the House.

We must ask ourselves: will the clause stand up to examination, and what exactly does it mean? My hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, East (Ms Corston) referred to the International Labour Organisation convention, which is particularly important. Several other international treaties to which we are party have been mentioned and in no case can the Government say that their argument stands up. The ILO convention makes it clear that the clause will not stand up. The precise wording of article 1 is:

> "Workers shall enjoy adequate protection against acts of anti-union discrimination in respect of their employment. Such protection shall apply more particularly in respect of acts calculated to:
> (a) Make the employment of a worker subject to the condition that he shall not join a union or shall relinquish trade union membership;
> (b) Cause the dismissal of or otherwise prejudice a worker by reason of union membership or because of participation in union activities outside working hours or, with the consent of the employer, within working hours."

To my mind, that article says it all. When the Minister replies, will he tell us what legal authorities the Government sought in drafting the clause? What comments were made about article 1? It is obvious that the Government cannot have taken seriously the commitments that we have entered into in convention No. 98 of the ILO.

In the other place, Viscount Ullswater led for the Government and produced what in contradiction to his name—Ullswater is reckoned to be deep—was a shallow, disgraceful speech. That lead has been followed in this place today.

Mr. Alex Carlile: Still waters.

Mr. Miller: Still waters, as the hon. and learned Gentleman says.

On several occasions, the noble Lord said that he was referring to what was best for a company. What is a company? What sort of company exists without employees? The failure to consider the interests of the company at the same time as the interests of the employees is a failing by any employer. That is exemplified in references made later, in column 24 of the Official Report of the other place of 24 May, to the way in which industrial tribunals will consider these matters. I shall deal with that in detail in a moment.

The clause is bound to cause a great deal of confusion. Given the resources available to the Government, one must conclude that the confusing speeches by the noble Lord and the Secretary of State were deliberately so, to confuse the public about the intention of the clause.

The hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile) referred eloquently to some of the other legal requirements that the Government appear to have carefully ignored. It is also important to consider the practical effects of the new clause for industrial tribunals. In another place, Viscount Ullswater said:

"However, the tribunal must always have regard to the reasonableness of the action taken. If the action is 'such as no reasonable employer would take' in the circumstances, then the tribunal will still be able to decide that the action amounts to action short of dismissal in the terms of Section 146 . . . it will not prevent employers from making and implementing legitimate decisions about how they wish to negotiate with their employees."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 24 May 1993; Vol. 546, c. 24.]

That argument is fundamentally wrong, on two counts. First, the employer is given unilateral rights under the clause to determine the content of a contract. The rights of the majority in a workplace are totally ignored should they decide that collective bargaining is the best means of negotiating. Secondly, the operation of the clause will place industrial tribunals in an impossible position. The Secretary of State has already listed the various considerations that those tribunals would have to consider. They will make their work impossible.

The clause is another lawyers' charter. The Government should tell the House how much the clause will cost the public purse, given that it will increase the work load of the tribunal system, which is already creaking at the knees. Have they estimated the costs to employers and employees and their trade unions of fighting such cases? The clause will significantly alter the costs that were set out when the Bill was first presented to us. When the Minister of State replies, he should tell us about the likely costs.

The Secretary of State, in his past life, attended quite a few industrial tribunals. I wonder how recently he was engaged in such work. In our area, the north-west, the industrial tribunal system cannot cope with its current case load. It is faced with an enormous backlog; cases that I filed in my past occupation have still to be heard. That delay is due to the confusing nature of legislation.

The hon. and learned Member for Montgomery noted that reference can be made in higher courts to what is recorded in Hansard. The new clause will pose a complicated dilemma for any court that is called upon to make head or tail of what the Government have said. On the one hand, they have said that they have no intention of creating a union-bashing charter, but on the other it is obvious from the examples cited in the other place to justify the introduction of the clause that that is the purpose behind it. The courts will have an impossible task.

The Secretary of State sought to clarify the position, but he failed to do so. I do not wish to detain the House because I know that a number of my hon. Friends want to speak. The key to my speech is the ILO convention. It is worth repeating that it states that protection should be offered against acts designed to "cause the dismissal of or otherwise prejudice a worker by reason of union membership"—

"designed to prejudice a worker". No other interpretation can be made, given that the Government justified its introduction on the ground that this will be the effect of the clause. Against that background, I urge all hon. Members to act in the interests of the rights of individuals who decide, collectively, to have their terms and conditions negotiated by a trade union. Their rights should not be prejudiced by such a shabby and disgraceful clause.

Mr. Riddick: I had hoped to use this opportunity to welcome my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State to his new position. It gives me just as much pleasure, however, to welcome my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State to her position in the Department of Employment. I know that her style is robust. I hope that the Secretary of State will follow the robust tradition of recent Secretaries of State. I hope that he will follow in the tradition of my hon. Friend the Minister of State.

My right hon. Friend's finest moment came during the election campaign in 1987, when he addressed the massed ranks of my constituents-to-be on a rainy day in Netherton, in the Colne valley. Six people turned up to listen to him, and, indeed, to me. For some reason, however, my right hon. Friend went away saying, "We're going to win this seat." Sure enough, we did, for the first time in 102 years. I certainly respect his political judgment.

This has been an interesting debate. I was amused to note that the Opposition spokesman, the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson), now seems to be in favour of multinationals. I am delighted that they are now in good odour in Labour circles. There was a time when they were figures of socialist hatred, so I am pleased that the Labour party is now displaying some common sense. I noticed, however, that the hon. Gentleman did not respond to my intervention about one member, one vote——

Mr. Boyce: On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. Is the hon. Gentleman speaking to the amendment, as he should be, or replying to the debate?

Madam Deputy Speaker: I understand him to be speaking to the amendment. I am, of course, always anxious to observe high standards, but if I were to follow the advice of the hon. Member for Rotherham (Mr. Boyce) I fear that many hon. Members would be quickly shut up.

Mr. Riddick: I assure the hon. Gentleman that I shall speak to the amendment, but I was sorry that the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras did not feel able to respond, if only briefly, to my point about one member, one vote. The reality is that the trade unions are kicking the leader of the Labour party in the teeth over this issue. It appears that he will suffer a serious reverse at the hands of the trade unions. At the end of the day, those unions are vital to the Labour party.

The debate is another example of, when the Trades Union Congress says jump, the Labour party jumps. It is another example of the RMT, the union that sponsors the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras, saying, "Yap", and the hon. Gentleman yaps.

Mr. Miller: I was interested to hear the hon. Gentleman refer to the Trades Union Congress telling Opposition Members to jump. That would have been totally impractical, given the time scale in which the Government introduced the clause. The Opposition representatives in the other place had to think on their feet and move quickly. There was no way that consultations could have taken place with the TUC before the Opposition tabled their amendment in the other place.

Mr. Riddick: I know that some TUC members are a bit slow, but they are not so slow as to use the days and weeks—[Interruption.]

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. Hon. Members must not pass between the hon. Member who is on his or her feet.

Mr. Heald: I apologise, Madam Deputy Speaker. I thought that I had ducked, but I obviously did not.

Mr. Riddick: I have not taken my eyes off you, Madam Deputy Speaker, and thought that I had you in view all the time. We have all heard what you have said.

The amendment does nothing more than restate employment law as it was originally intended in the 1970s. The amendment resolves the problems created by the recent Court of Appeal judgments, and reinstates in law the status quo that has existed for about 20 years—that the law was intended to protect individual employees against specific acts of discrimination, but not to interfere with collective bargaining. That is the amendment's intention.

Employers cannot discriminate against employees for belonging to a trade union. That right exists in addition to the fact that employers are allowed to alter the collective bargaining arrangements. Both Labour and Conservative Governments have supported the right of employers to alter their collective bargaining arrangements. Governments of both parties have recognised that employers can derecognise a trade union for negotiating purposes and introduce personal contracts—there is nothing new in that. There has been a consensus between the parties that employers should have that freedom of action.

The hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras gave a catalogue of examples of individuals being forced to move to personal contracts. However, companies have been able to do that for years. The amendment does not create anything new in that respect; it simply reinstates the law to the position that everyone thought prevailed before the recent court cases.

Mr. Clapham: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that, if an employer can pay an inducement to an employee to give up his or her trade union, and so establish differentials in payments, the disadvantaged member is having action taken against him or her short of dismissal? That has created a different legal position.

Mr. Riddick: The legislation will not create the position described by the hon. Gentleman. We are allowing employers to enter into contracts with employees, but it would be illegal for those employers to sack employees because they continued to remain in a trade union—that right still exists and is enshrined in law. The Conservative Government strengthened that right.

I have some experience of the subject. When I worked in industry I worked for two multinational companies—first, Procter and Gamble and then Coca-Cola. They were good employers and I never felt the need to join a trade union. In both cases, I had a contract with my employer and was perfectly happy with it. I was aware that employees doing similar jobs were being paid different rates. That was for all sorts of reasons, not least because people were at different stages of their careers. I saw nothing wrong in that.

Mr. Thurnham: My hon. Friend speaks from his experience of industry. Does he agree that, if Opposition Members had more experience of industry, they would realise the sense of what he is saying? Earlier, I spoke with experience of starting a business in engineering and having interests in the construction industry. It is obvious that, in any industry today, there must be complete freedom of individual negotiation in order to obtain the highest productivity and compete on a world basis.

Mr. Riddick: It is regrettable that the Opposition have so little industrial experience. If my memory serves me right, the Opposition's three main economic teams—Treasury, Trade and Industry and Employment—contain practically no industrial experience. To be fair, I think that the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras once worked for the Central Electricity Generating Board, but there is otherwise little experience on the Labour Benches, which I regret—[Interruption.] The hon. Member for Clydebank and Milngavie (Mr. Worthington) points to his hon. Friend the Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden (Mr. Galbraith), who I thought had been a brain surgeon. That is an extremely useful occupation, but can hardly be classified as working in industry.

Ms Eagle rose——

Mr. Riddick: Perhaps the hon. Lady worked in industry, but she is not on the Front Bench.

Ms Eagle: Does the hon. Gentleman concede that those of us who have worked in trade unions know precisely how employers are likely to behave and, in some cases, exploit their work forces? Therefore, we understand the need for good, strong and free trade unions to achieve equality and fairness in society.

Mr. Riddick: It is regrettable that the hon. Lady should talk about companies exploiting their work forces. That is what we hear all the time from the Opposition. They seem to suggest that the majority of companies in this country are behaving in that way—they are not. Most companies in this country are good employers. The comment comes ill from a Member representing a party which has opposed every piece of employment legislation. As long as the Labour party is in the pockets of trade unions and Labour Members oppose all our trade union employment legislation, we shall not be able to take their comments seriously.

I am not saying that people should not belong to trade unions. There are cases when it is clearly appropriate to do so—for example, when an employee has a bad employer. My wife used to work for a council, and I told her that she should be in a trade union. She was a member of, I think, the National Association of Local Government Officers. Therefore, I am not against trade unions.

Mr. Boyce: Does not the hon. Gentleman understand that it will be the employer's right to recognise or not recognise trade unions? There is nothing in the provision to protect employees from bad employers. I cannot find such a protection within the legislation. Can the hon. Gentleman tell us where it is?

Mr. Riddick: The hon. Member for Bristol, East (Ms. Corston) described the position at Arrowsmith in her constituency. It sounded as though it was a poor employer and was behaving badly, but what she described was not new—companies have for many years been able to sack employees who have gone on strike. There is nothing new in that. The amendment is mild in effect, and I do not believe that it will have the drastic consequences that Opposition Members are trying to suggest.

We should consider the issues in the wider context of the massive improvements in industrial relations that have occurred during the past 14 years—[Laughter.] The hon. Member for Rotherham (Mr. Boyce) laughs, thereby showing how out of touch with reality Opposition Members are. The position in industry has been completely transformed in the past 14 or 15 years. I well remember the days in 1978-79, when the dead went unburied and strikes were the norm. As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State said, strikes were the order of the day.

In the year to last August, 500,000 working days were lost through stoppages. Under Labour, in one month alone 3 million days were lost. There are fewer strikes now than at any time since 1891, and that is to be applauded.

Mr. Boyce: I thank the hon. Gentleman for allowing me to intervene for a second time. How does he reconcile his disapproval of what happened in 1979 during the so-called winter of discontent with the undying support of Lady Thatcher—whom the hon. Gentleman's lot stabbed in the back—for Solidarity in Poland?

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. Before the hon. Gentleman replies to that intervention, I remind the House that we are not engaged in debating the history of industrial relations or their entire scope. There is an amendment to be considered, and I suggest that hon. Members address it.

7.30 pm

Mr. Riddick: Thank you Madam Deputy Speaker.

The Conservative party supports trade unions. We supported the Solidarity movement in Poland which helped to bring freedom to that country. It was a sorry commentary on the condition of trade unions in this country that we had to look to trade unions in Poland for good examples. During the hon. Gentleman's intervention, I was given some intelligence to the effect that he used to be on Sheffield city council. If ever there was a bunch of unreconstructed socialists, it must have been those councillors.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman should be addressing me, and I remind him that I must be convinced that what he says is relevant.

Mr. Riddick: My comment was merely an aside, Madam Deputy Speaker. I did not wish to upset you in any way, and I apologise if I did.

It is important to examine Labour's motives for opposing the amendment. The Opposition record is not good. The amendment is about the rights of individuals and the role of trade unions in society and organisations. Labour has supported strikes and the closed shop through thick and thin, and there have been recent examples of that. The hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras recently described the fire brigades' decision to support strike action as entirely justified. The hon. Member for Dewsbury (Mrs. Taylor) has said that she supports the teachers' case, and the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) supported striking railwaymen. That shows where Labour's loyalties lie. We shall not take any lectures from the Opposition.

Labour is in the pocket of the trade unions. More than half of all Labour Members are sponsored by trade unions, including all 20 members of the shadow Cabinet. Trade unions provide most of the Labour party's money.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman has not convinced me that what he is saying is relevant to the amendment.

Mr. Riddick: My notes tell me that I was about to speak about one member, one vote, but in the light of what you have said, Madam Deputy Speaker, I had better not.

I am delighted to support the amendment, because it protects the right of employers to change their collective bargaining arrangements. It also protects the rights of individuals to belong to trade unions and will sustain the increased flexibility in the labour market that Government reforms have brought about. Unemployment is falling at a much earlier stage in the economic cycle, and I am sure that that is due to the greater flexibility of the labour market.

Mr. John Hutton (Barrow and Furness): I intend to confine my remarks to the substance of the amendment, unlike the hon. Member for Colne Valley (Mr. Riddick).

I have listened to most of the speeches. It could be said that the Government have at least three arguments, to use the term loosely, in support of the amendment. The first of them is that the amendment is merely declaratory and that it merely brings the law into line with the position as it is supposed to be. That argument is completely bogus. It is transparent to anyone who knows the law in this area that the recent decision in the Wilson case was not unpredictable and did not change our understanding of the law.

Where were the Government's legal advisers in 1987 when the Court of Appeal decided the case of National Coal Board v. Ridgeway? That clearly flagged the eventual decision of the Court of Appeal in the Wilson case. Where were those advisers in 1990 when the employment appeal tribunal ruled in the Armitage case? There is nothing revolutionary about the recent Court of Appeal decision in the Wilson case. The issues before the court were not substantially different from those in the Ridgeway case. Both cases involved an attempt by employers to change their collective bargaining machinery. However, the changes penalised trade union members who did not wish to support them.

It is completely bogus for the Government to portray the amendment as simply declaratory. They might tell that to people outside, but to their Back Benchers they say, "Come along lads, this is another opportunity to put the boot in the trade unions and we expect your support in the Lobby." The Government are trying to have the best of both worlds.

The hon. Member for Colne Valley attempted to address the idea that the amendment must be supported because it will promote flexibility in the work force. That is also completely bogus. The Opposition do not oppose flexibility. We want industrial relations law that will provide legitimate protection for the rights of individual employees whether or not they are trade union members. The hon. Member for Colne Valley did not address that. There is no reason why any work force or company cannot be flexible and also enjoy legitimate employment protection. The amendment seeks to remove that perfectly legitimate protection from many workers, irrespective of whether they are in a trade union.

Conservative Members have not addressed the fact that the amendment legitimises and to some extent will encourage and reward the employer who tells his workers, "I have decided to change my collective bargaining machinery. You will either accept the 'benefit' or you will not receive any improvements or amendments to the terms and conditions of your employment."

The hon. Member for Colne Valley said that he used to be employed by Pepsi-Cola.

Mr. Riddick: Coca-Cola.

Mr. Hutton: I have never known the difference between Pepsi-Cola and Coca-Cola. He also said that he worked for Procter and Gamble and that he decided not to join a trade union. I am willing to bet that he took the benefit of the improvement in terms and conditions that the trade unions negotiated on his behalf. How would he have felt if he had not been given the benefits that trade unions acting on his behalf had negotiated? That is the issue under debate. I am confident that the hon. Gentleman would have been horrified if he had been told by his employer, "We have negotiated improvements in terms and conditions, but, because you are not a member of the relevant trade union, you will not benefit." I shall give way to the hon. Gentleman if he wishes to respond.

Mr. Riddick: The hon. Gentleman is missing the point. We are not suggesting that that will happen. The hon. Gentleman argues in favour of the closed shop which says that no employee should enjoy the benefits that have been negotiated with an employer unless he or she is a member of the trade union. Does the hon. Gentleman think that we should have closed shops again?

Mr. Hutton: I gave way as a courtesy to the hon. Gentleman, but, with hindsight, I have done him no favours. The hon. Gentleman has failed to grasp the point of my argument.

Amendment No. 8 will have precisely the effect that I have described. An employer will be able to say to particular groups of workers, "You are not part of the collective bargaining procedure that I have established; therefore, you will not enjoy any of the benefits of the resulting negotiations." If the hon. Gentleman has any doubt about that, he should read the transcripts of the Ridgeway case and the Wilson case that have recently been decided in the Appeal Court. That is precisely what happened to Mr. Wilson, and the Appeal Court said that it was unlawful.

Have I missed something, or are the Government trying to reverse the impact of the Wilson case? The scenario that the hon. Gentleman said was unlikely is precisely what underlines the amendments.

The Government's third argument was that collective bargaining matters should be divorced from individual employment rights. That sounds fine, but it is false rhetoric. Whenever we talk about collective bargaining, we are inevitably talking about the individual terms on which workers are employed. That is the point and the substance of collective bargaining. When collective bargaining produces an agreement, it results in changes to the individual employment contracts of the workers concerned.

It is bogus to say that amendment No. 8 is somehow necessary because we need to separate collective bargaining and individual employment rights. We cannot do that. Anyone who knows anything about industrial relations—and that rules out the hon. Member for Colne Valley—could not possibly make that argument.

What can, or should, we make of amendment No. 8? It is my view and, I am sure, that of my right hon. Friends that it is a dismal amendment which will encourage discrimination and reward efforts to break up established collective bargaining procedures. Only a perverse Government pursuing an absurd vendetta against trade union members, who everywhere else in Europe are regarded as the social partners, could have possibly tabled such an amendment and come to the House and argued in its favour.

We should remind ourselves about the claims made for the Bill when it was presented to the House for Second Reading on 17 November 1992. I quote from the speech of the then Secretary of State for Employment:

> "The Bill has two main objectives: first to strengthen and extend the rights of the individual—both individual employees and individual trade union members".

> "I put it to the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras what is unreasonable about allowing trade union members freedom to choose which union they join?".—[Official Report, 17 November 1992; Vol. 214, c. 168-80.]

It is clear that the amendment underlines the Government's case on both those counts. It is not an improvement in the rights of individual employees, and it clearly strikes directly at the heart of the basic principle which is the substance of our argument.

Amendment No. 8 undermines workers' rights to join a particular union of their choice. The results of the Wilson case make it obvious that the Government intend to reverse that and take away from individual workers the right to join the union of their choice.

It may be helpful to the House if we remind ourselves of the Tory election manifesto. I understand there is a debate in the Conservative party about what constitutes a promise. There is an election manifesto and then there is everything that Ministers say afterwards. Apparently, only the manifesto constitutes a promise.

Let us see what the Conservative election manifesto says about this issue. It says clearly:

"We will take measures to give individuals greater freedom in choosing a 'union".

That looks lovely in principle, but amendment No. 8 runs contrary to that manifesto promise. [Interruption.] The hon. Member for Colne Valley has had his opportunity to make his argument and I am afraid that he did not make a very good fist of it. He failed to convince me and, I suspect, anyone else who had the benefit of listening to him. There is no doubt whatsoever that amendment No. 8 will strike at the heart of the freedom of individuals to choose which particular union they join.

Mr. Riddick: How?

Mr. Hutton: It is interesting that the hon. Gentleman says, "How?" It is clear that he has not read the Court of Appeal decision in the Wilson case. I have explained to the hon. Gentleman precisely how that will arise. Those in the Wilson case, for example, who choose not to co-operate with a changed collective bargaining procedure and decide to remain in the union of their choice do not get the benefits of any improvements in their terms and conditions of employment. If the hon. Gentleman does not understand that simple point he has problems.

Amendment No. 8 is a partisan and puerile amendment. It will prove to be the source of injustice in the workplace which will scar our industrial relations for many years to come. The Government have said that it is a technical change, but they will let their supporters know that it is more serious.

I believe that the amendment has been drafted by the pop-eyed fanatics with a bee in their bonnet who occasionally masquerade as Ministers in the Department of Employment. They have no sense of justice, fairness or fair play. It is a purely ideological measure which will strike directly at the conduct of good industrial relations and the individual's right to choose which union to join, which supposedly has underlined the Government's industrial relations programme for many years.

I now return briefly to my main arguments. The amendment does not clarify the law. The law did not need clarifying as it was quite clear after the Wilson and Ridgeway cases. The amendment changes the law and will permit employers openly to discriminate against trade union members. The employer will need to show an industrial tribunal simply that there is evidence that the employer's purpose was to further a change in his relationship with all or any class of his employees.

We also need to remind ourselves that employers are legally free to establish whatever bargaining arrangements they choose and to recognise or derecognise unions as they think fit. Why should they also have the power actively to penalise employees who want to be members of a particular trade union? That is the essence of the amendment.

The Wilson and Ridgeway cases both involved inter-union rivalry and attempts by employers to resolve bargaining rights that resulted from that. In both cases, the Court of Appeal rightly concluded that workers were being discriminated against financially in the employers' efforts to settle the outstanding disputes about which union should be recognised. That is the point that the hon. Member for Colne Valley failed to address.

There is quite strong evidence that the amendment does not propose to change the law relating to collective bargaining, so the freedom of an employer to change or alter his collective bargaining procedures has been left intact. Why should the employer have the additional power actively and financially to penalise employees who decide that they do not want to participate in that alteration in the collective bargaining procedure? That claim has nothing to do with flexibility; it is all about imposing a direct financial penalty on employees who fail to co-operate.

Mr. Roy Hughes: How does my hon. Friend reconcile his point of view with the tendency today for one-union factories? If an individual is allowed to join whichever trade union he wishes, we will return to the old scenario of a multiplicity of trade unions with all the chaos that that can cause.

Mr. Hutton: My hon. Friend has not followed the precise point I was making. It is legally the case that employees have the right under statute to join any trade union they wish. That right still exists, although a single union agreement may apply in a particular workplace. Why should individual workers be penalised financially if they choose not to be members of a particular trade union with which the employer wishes to negotiate? It is a basic right in a workplace that employees should be entitled to join whatever union they wish, and I would not want my remarks to be construed as contrary to that point.

If there was any truth in the claim that the amendment was merely declaratory, why did not the Government act earlier? Why did not they act after the Ridgeway decision was announced in 1987, six years ago? Since then, there have been at least two occasions when the Government could have changed the law.

The second point to which I should refer briefly concerns the United Kingdom's international legal obligations. Some of my hon. Friends have already referred to the outstanding international law aspects of the amendment, but we need to remind ourselves that at least two international legal instruments have a bearing on our discussions today. One is article 11 of the European convention on human rights, which is a transparent declaration of rights with regard to the freedom of association which I am sure all hon. Members will support.

Of more immediate relevance is article 1 of the International Labour Organisation convention No. 98 of 1949. It is clear from that convention that the United Kingdom Government is under a legal obligation, enforceable in international law, to respect the right of freedom of association and not to take measures that could be construed as running directly counter to that international obligation.

What is the value and benefit of an international right if, in order to exercise it, an individual employee experiences some sanction or penalty? That is not a right at all. An employee does not have a right to do something if an employer is allowed actively to penalise or impose some sanction on him.

It is clear to me, and I suspect that it must be clear to the Government's legal advisers, that there is at least an argument that the Government have acted in a way that is inconsistent with their treaty obligation under convention No. 98. The only decent thing for the Government to do is either to acknowledge that there has been some mistake or to deratify or de-sign the United Kingdom from that International Labour Organisation convention. I bet that before too long that is precisely what the Government will do. If they do that, they will be the only Government since 1949 to deratify that convention—what an epitaph on the Government's tombstone.

Thirdly, it is worth pointing out that the amendment is badly drafted. It simply says that there must be evidence that the employer's purpose was within paragraph (a). There is no hint in the amendment about what kind of evidence there should be, its strength or quality, or anything at all about the merits of the employer's argument. There must simply be evidence that the employer's purpose was that specified in paragraph (a).

Conservative Members who wish to paint a rosy picture of the amendment should be clear that if an employer is presenting an argument under paragraph (a), it is only because there is also evidence that the employer is discriminating against an employee because of his or her membership of a particular union. That is the context in which any argument about the employer's purpose has to be deployed before an industrial tribunal. It has to be the case that in the absence of that argument the employer's case would fail; it would be regarded as illegal. Therefore, we must be clear that the amendment is set in the context of clear evidence of discrimination against an employee on the ground of his trade union membership.

The House needs to look carefully at the amendment. It should be conscious of our obligations under international law and of our obligations to act fairly, with common sense and with a sense of fair play with regard to the employment rights of individual workers. If the House reaches a decision from those two perspectives, it can only reject the amendment.

Mr. Heald: I am grateful to have the opportunity to make a short contribution. I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, who is absent, and my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State, who is present, on their recent appointments and I wish them well during the coming years.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): The hon. Gentleman speaks for himself.

Mr. Heald: I am told that I speak for myself, but I think that I speak for the Conservative party and Conservative Members in expressing those sentiments.

The amendment is necessary for two reasons: first, to clarify the law and, secondly, to enable employers to have bargaining arrangements with employees which suit the needs of the workplace.

It has been said that the legal position was clear before the decisions in the Court of Appeal. Nothing could be further from the truth. I have practised in this area of the law for many years. Companies have sought advice from me on these issues. There were contentions on both sides. It is right, as was said earlier by the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile), that somebody of the stamp of John Hendy QC is a force to be reckoned with. He had a point of view which he expressed in the Court of Appeal and he succeeded. But it is equally true that Patrick Elias QC, an eminent silk in this area, the editor of "Harvey on Industrial Relations Law", the established text, took a completely different viewpoint, argued it and lost. It is wrong to say that in those circumstances, with eminent lawyers putting forward arguable viewpoints on both sides, the law is as clear as day. That is hindsight writ large.

Mr. John Denham (Southampton, Itchen): Would the hon. Gentleman therefore argue that in every case ever heard in the Court of Appeal where barristers are found to argue for both sides the law must be in doubt?

Mr. Heald: That is not what I am saying and I think that the hon. Gentleman realises that.

The point in this case, which I shall amplify in a moment, is that the industrial tribunal, with an experienced tribunal chairman and experienced lay members who listen to detailed argument from experienced lawyers, came to one conclusion. The matter then went to the employment appeal tribunal, which has a High Court judge who deals with such cases every day of the week, flanked by members of great eminence, including senior trade union leaders whom we all remember from years back, eminent employers and so on. They heard the arguments and decided the case in a completely different way.

Both the industrial tribunal and the employment appeal tribunal said in this case that the decisions were difficult to make. The matter then went to the Court of Appeal which made a decision which is the current state of the law. There may be a further appeal to the other place, and who knows what the result of that would be in this case? But it is worth saying that the House has the opportunity to clarify the law tonight, and why should that not be done?

Mr. Clapham: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the Ridgeway v. British Coal case in 1987, when John Hendy represented the union, clarified the law and since 1987 the law has been clear? Does he further agree that that clarity was added to by the two cases that were heard in the Court of Appeal?

Mr. Heald: If the hon. Gentleman allows me to develop my argument, I shall deal with that point.

The point about collective agreements is that they are not legally enforceable. When in the 1970s the Government offered to make them legally enforceable the offer was flatly rejected on both sides of industry. A collective agreement which sets out a bargaining arrangement can be part of the individual's contract of employment only if it is incorporated in it, and usually it is not.

There has been a series of cases, of which Alexander v. STC is probably the most recent, where it was held that provisions of collective agreements that deal with bargaining machinery and such issues are not part of the individual's contract of employment. That thrust of the law has been there for 20 or 30 years. It is part of the background to what we are discussing tonight and cannot be ignored.

It was thought of section 23 of the 1978 Act that the words

"action . . . taken against him as an individual"

meant that the action had to be concentrated on the individual's position rather than being an action that could be described as collective. It was thought that derecognising the union, taking away collective bargaining arrangements, was an action more properly directed at the union rather than the individual. Therefore, in a leading text—"Harvey on Industrial Relations Law" in fact—headed:

"Taken against him as an individual"

it says:

"This requirement raises a fundamental question as to the nature of the action taken by the employer—was it collective (ie against the union itself) or individual? Action against the union that merely affects the individual as a member would not be within this section."

Hon. Members have criticised those of us who have advised companies—and individuals, I hasten to add—on the provision over the past few years. We have been in some doubt about what the law actually is.

The hon. Member for Barnsley, West and Penistone (Mr. Clapham) mentioned the 1987 National Coal Board case, in which the Union of Democratic Mineworkers received a higher pay award than the National Union of Mineworkers. I am not sure that NUM members received any increase in money at all, but, if they did, it was much less than the amount received by UDM members. It was argued then that to pay a worker less because he was a member of a particular trade union was unlawful, under section 23 of the 1978 Act. Those who advanced that argument, however, did not go on to consider circumstances in which a union had been derecognised and the employer wanted to introduce individual contracts providing for such matters as profit-related pay and profit sharing.

It was thought at that time that if an employer was introducing a contract that was more beneficial than the existing contract in terms of pay and conditions, no one could argue that employees who did not accept that contract were being penalised under section 23. It was said by lawyers that they were simply not receiving an advantage received by others. No doubt that is a very legalistic approach. Decisions made in the Court of Appeal have taken the interpretation of the law a stage further; before April this year, no cases existed that decided these issues.

I have mentioned the case involving the NUM and the UDM. The Armitage case—which has also been mentioned—clearly demonstrated that a union member had been punished for involving a union representative in a dispute with his employer; the references to the judgments involved are also very clear. What was not decided, however, was what happened when one group of employees received a payment and another group was not given a specific punishment. The effect of those judgments has been quite different from what was expected by many in the legal profession.

I am not saying that the Court of Appeal was wrong to make the decisions that it made in interpreting the law; any lawyer would accept that it has made its ruling. The House of Lords may decide the question on some future occasion, but why should we wait, when we have the opportunity to clarify the law and reach a conclusion tonight about its correct interpretation? It is unlikely, but perhaps the Opposition will triumph, leaving us with the judgment of the Court of Appeal and awaiting that of the House of Lords. What is more likely is that Conservative Members will back an amendment that clarifies the law, in the interests of both workers and employers.

One of the developments that set the 1980s apart was the change in a number of aspects of the workplace—a change for the better, in my view. Suddenly, unions were prepared to reach single-union deals. I do not think that many people genuinely believe that those deals were not in the interests of the workers. Surely they were preferable to deals made by a group of unions which might not always agree among themselves, and which did not always represent the workers as effectively. I think that they were a tremendous success.

Mr. Alan Meale (Mansfield): What about the closed shop?

Mr. Heald: I will not reply to sedentary interventions. No one could say that workers in, for instance, the Honda factory in Swindon, where individual contracts operate, do not enjoy excellent terms and conditions.

Mr. Etherington: Would the hon. Gentleman care to comment on the following circumstances? Individual employees have been balloted at their workplace, and have decided on a particular trade union, only to find later that their employer has imposed another union on them against their will. Is that the hon. Gentleman's understanding of democracy?

Mr. Heald: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for raising the point. One of the problems in this country is the chaotic nature of the union movement. I hesitate to criticise it in the presence of so many of its members, but a large number of unions are competing with each other for membership. One of the great advantages of the single-union deal was that at least it brought some common sense into the workplace.

Mr. Etherington rose——

Mr. Heald: I do not accept the argument that the hon. Gentleman is probably about to advance—that giving trade unionists freedom to choose which union to join conflicts with single-union deals. The point about such deals is that it is known which union is recognised; it does the dealing, and the end result is generally in the interests of the workers.

Mr. Etherington: How does the hon. Gentleman square his opinion with the fact that, when a single-union deal was struck in the coal industry, a Conservative Government sought to involve another union of their creation, which they sustained and nourished—the scab union that has the nerve to call itself a union, although I do not class it as one? The Government say that single-union deals must be good: that they have created harmony from chaos. Yet they were responsible for effectively trying to destroy a single-union agreement in the mining industry, in much the same way as they are now destroying the industry itself.

Mr. Heald: I could hide behind the argument that British Coal—although it has not yet been privatised—is an independent body, a corporation which makes its own decisions; but I do not think I need do that. Some Conservative Members—I am certainly one—admire the way in which UDM members stood up for common sense and decency during that long strike. I know that the hon. Gentleman will not agree, but I am glad that they were given the opportunity to play a role in the coal industry. I believe that, even now, they are presenting some of the more imaginative proposals for the industry's future—far more imaginative than those of the NUM, whose policies seem to belong to the dark ages. I do not accept that the old, NUM-style union leaders are making the most genuine, cutting-edge contributions.

The old-fashioned, dinosaur trade union leaders often say that all the Acts passed during the 1980s should be repealed; but do Opposition Members really want to return to the days of flying pickets, secondary action and all the nonsense of the show of hands at the factory gate? We have got rid of all that, and I believe that, in general, the Labour party agrees with what we were doing two or three years ago, at any rate. It is a pity that there cannot be more consensus about where we are going.

Companies want single-union deals and individual contracting because they want to be able to compete. They are just like you and me. It is a breath of fresh air to visit some of the modern workplaces and see what is being done there; indeed, it shows us the future. I believe that hon. Members on both sides of the House should go and look at those projects, and see the future. I believe that they should support initiatives that bring such features of British industry closer to being the norm.

We face threats from the Pacific rim——

Ms Eagle: We are hearing about the Pacific rim again. Does the hon. Gentleman suggest that we must compete with the lowest of the low, on what are almost slave wages, to have an industry in the future? Or does he think that we should create a floor of provision so that we can compete on quality rather than slave wages?

Mr. Heald: I am about to visit Taiwan and Japan to see for myself. I do not claim to have personal knowledge of it. What I have read and what I have heard as a member of the Employment Select Committee from the Japanese, Taiwanese and others who have come to visit us to give evidence is that they have rising wage rates. They have high-tech industries and modern, individual contracting arrangements such as those I have described. They are leading the way to the future.

It may be that some countries in the Pacific rim still have low wages, but not all of them have. We are competing against countries with high levels of skill and the wide range of instruments that are needed in order to be a successful modern economy. The time has come for a shake-up on the Labour Benches. The question is not whether we should have derecognition or recognition of trade unions for bargaining, but whether we recognise what the future requires so that we can move forward and put Britain back to where it should be as one of the top manufacturing countries in the world. We can do that if we act together in the interests of the nation.

Ms Eagle: Before making any comments on the amendment, I remind the House that when the Bill was in Committee I declared an interest as a member of the Confederation of Health Service Employees. I am also sponsored by that union. That does not mean any personal financial remuneration, but a small amount of money is paid to my constituency party every year. I am COHSE sponsored because I believe in principle that membership of trade unions is a good thing and that having an active trade union movement, unencumbered by vindictive laws, is a sign of freedom in a society and is something that we should all desire.

The background to the Lords amendment is the Government's labour market policy over the past 14 years. There has been much fine and interesting shadow boxing today, mainly between lawyers, about what is at stake. What is at stake is the balance of power in industrial relations. Over the past 14 years the Government have had at their heart the desire to deregulate the labour market. They have tried to do that because it fosters exploitation, lowers wages, allows arbitrary treatment and insecurity at work and provides no knowledge of whether there will be a set contract even within a few months.

Mr. Heald: I listened to what the hon. Lady said about the balance of power in industry. She made it sound very adversarial. Will she accept that in the best and most modern plants there is a team effort and everybody works together? They do not have a confrontational approach. Has she visited factories where that is true?

Ms Eagle: Of course, the best industrial relations is a team effort, where it occurs. Unfortunately, the way in which the Government have changed the law, together with some of their other economic policies, has encouraged and spread bad employment practices.

We have had six punishing and vindictive Acts of Parliament which have institutionalised discrimination against trade unions. That is unprecedented in western democracies, and it is a record of which I believe any totalitarian regime would be proud. The economic policy pursued by the Government has been so disastrous that it has led to mass unemployment on a scale not experienced since the 1930s. People who say that individual employees have a choice and can leave a job must remember how constrained that choice is when they are unlikely to obtain another job because of the bad state of the economy.

The Government's ambition is to turn us into the sweat shop of Europe. They have made their refusal to sign the social chapter and guarantee working people decent pay and conditions into some sort of perverted virtue whereas it is a barbaric disgrace. The Government have abolished many employment protections and failed to create a framework of law which will impose responsibilities on employers to treat their work force decently. It is against that background that the amendment must be judged.

I believe that the weakening and destruction of trade unions has been central to the Government's political aims since 1979. The Lords amendment, which is an opportunistic amendment, and was suddenly perceived as such when the Court of Appeal made its judgment and the Bill happened still to be in the Lords, is a massive escalation of the assault on trade union rights. It is an assault on not only collective but individual trade union rights.

The Government's methods and motives in this matter have been extremely cynical and beneath contempt. No other democracy would contemplate overturning a court decision so quickly, with no consultation, before the judgment was published in its written form and before all legal action in the cases concerned had been completed. We have a higher court so that it can make final judgments on such matters. The Government are so contemptuous of the rule of law and the courts that they go ahead with their ideological bigotry before the Law Lords have had a chance to sit.

On 30 April the Court of Appeal made its judgment. On 6 May the amendment was announced in the House of Lords. It was published on 20 May—a Thursday—and on the Monday the House of Lords was asked to sit in judgment on the new clause, which had come out of the blue. After 90 minutes of debate, the clause was carried.

8.15 pm

The amendment is a blatant abuse of parliamentary procedures simply because, as was said earlier, the Third Reading had already taken place. Extremely unusual tactics had to be pursued in order to fit the amendment in while the Bill was in the other place. It is immoral because it gives the green light to victimisation in the workplace. It is a serious attack on the freedom of association. It is important to remember how Hannah Arendt, that great writer about totalitarianism, defined what is meant by that term. She explained that one of the conditions that needs to exist in a totalitarian regime was what she called "atomisation". That means the isolation of individuals and the derogation of collective rights. What we have here is a precise example of atomisation.

The amendment is probably illegal. As has been mentioned, it is certainly against many of our international obligations. It is probably against article 118 of the treaty of Rome—I thought that the Government were pro-Europe. It is against the International Labour Organisation convention on freedom of association, and, as has also been pointed out, it is against the European convention on human rights. Did the Government check on any of that in their hurry to push the amendment through in the other place?

During the debate in the other place, Earl Russell asked Viscount Ullswater whether he had taken advice on whether the amendment was contrary to European law. Viscount Ullswater said:

"We do not believe that there is any infringement of any international obligations."

Puzzled by that answer, Earl Russell again asked whether that opinion was based on any legal advice. Viscount Ullswater said:

"I should have to take advice upon that."

Clearly there was confusion.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: I am sure that the hon. Lady would not want to misrepresent my hon. and noble Friend Viscount Ullswater. Later in the debate, in answer to a question from the noble Lord Russell, my noble Friend said:

"the Government have not taken legal advice outside Government on the matter. However, the Government are satisfied that there is nothing in the amendment which is in breach of our EC or other international obligations."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 24 May 1993; Vol. 546, c. 42-51.]

If the hon. Lady has read the debate, I am puzzled why she is not making that position clear to the House.

Ms Eagle: The Opposition have slightly less faith in the Government's ability to take their own legal advice and in the quality of that advice when it is taken. Doubtless the time will come when that assertion will be checked in the international courts.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Is that legal advice the same as that which backed up the viscount, as reported on 6 May? Viscount Ullswater said that the House of Lords should welcome the fact that "the Government intend to clarify an area of law which has been thrown into confusion by the Court of Appeal's decision".—[Official Report, House of Lords, 6 May 1993; Vol. 545, c. 862.]

It seems that we have returned to the position whereby the law is what the Government want it to be after the fact rather than their saying in advance what they hope it will be and changing the law if the Court of Appeal disagrees with them.

Ms Eagle: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his observation. The one thing that is certain is the fact that the Court of Appeal was sure about what the law should be when it made its unanimous decision on 30 April.

In practice, the amendment will allow bribery and coercion of individuals to sign away their rights in the workplace. Its purpose is to remove the very raison d'être of trade unions and hope that they will wither away as a result. The Court of Appeal agrees and found that the only purpose of paying non-union members a differential was to penalise people for being members of a trade union. The aim of the amendment is indirectly to abolish trade unions. I believe that that is the Government's motivation.

What protection will there be from the abuse of employers' power and from the arbitrary imposition of different terms and conditions of work? What protection is there for the individual in the workplace if the amendment is accepted? The only thing that is worse than the amendment and the intention behind it is the Government's display of Orwellian double-speak in their cynical attempt to justify their outrageous decision to introduce amendment No. 8 in the first place.

First, the Government denied that the amendment meant a change in the law. Indeed, the Secretary of State was at that trick again today. The Government said that the amendment is a clarification, but I believe that that notion has been comprehensively dealt with by my colleagues. Clearly, it is a serious change in the law.

Secondly, the Government have said that a new management right is elucidated to decide exactly how management wants to negotiate with its staff. They talk a great deal about relations between employers and their staff, but the way in which they define those relations is almost like those between master and slave. The employer can do anything that he or she wants as long as it is in the workplace, and the staff have to put up with it or go. That does not lead to a good, active economic regime in a modern civilised economy.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The hon. Lady has been studying the record of debates in another place. Will she respond to the point made by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State about the Labour Government's position in 1975? Lord Jacques said:

"Clause 45"—

as it was—

"deals with individual rights of employees, not collective bargaining issues . . . By giving the individual employee a right to take part in his unions' activities unimpeded, Clause 45 does not require an employer to recognise his union or treat with it in any way."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 23 September 1975; Vol. 364, c. 189.]

The position as enunciated by the Labour Government appears to be that which the hon. Lady is attacking.

Ms Eagle: The Minister of State must not read quotations out of context. The debate on 25 September 1975 was in answer to the Earl of Gowrie who had tabled an amendment to the effect that such protections should apply only where there was recognition of the union, which puts the entire debate in a wholly different perspective. That should be borne in mind.

I am anxious to conclude and allow other hon. Members to speak. In Tory double-speak, denying a pay rise to a trade union member is not victimisation but allowing the employer to achieve an organisational or strategic purpose. The people of this country know precisely what is behind the Government's outrageous behaviour. Unless amendment No. 8 is thrown out and treated with the contempt it deserves, the people of Britain will realise exactly how the law is being used, and they will punish the Government for it.

Mr. Boyce: Anybody listening to our debate would get the impression that the Tories are the workers' friends, but nothing could be further from the truth. There has been much wringing of hands today. One Conservative Member, who I understand has had to leave the Chamber to take a telephone call, said that we want more consensus politics. I wonder where he has lived for the past 14 years. Under Baroness Thatcher, consensus was a word which would not have dared utter its name in the House or elsewhere. Consensus politics went out of the window.

We are encouraged to believe that the amendment will lead to better protection and higher wages. One Conservative Member said that it is not about lower wages but higher wages—talk about the moon being made of blue cheese. If Conservative Members were honest, they would perhaps agree with the Foreign Secretary, who said on Radio FM that Britain would have to compete with the Tamils before we succeed in the market. I have the tape of the broadcast if anybody wants to borrow it—for example, the Minister of State.

The honest Conservative Members spoke about the least possible employee protection. If the Government were being honest, we would be discussing the abolition of trade unions because that is their final intention. Where do we go from here? One of Lady Thatcher's most praised successes was the reform of the trade unions, so why is there a need for the amendment? It is not merely to clarify the law which, in any event, is the role of the courts. We are the lawmakers and the courts interpret what we say, although perhaps not what we intended to say. The amendment is clearly a change in the law and anyone who says otherwise is not being truthful.

I should have declared an interest at the beginning of my speech. I am proud to be a member of and sponsored by the Amalgamated Engineering Union. My union was in the forefront of single union deals. I may have reservations about such deals, but they appear to be successful in many cases. What will happen if an employer can arbitrarily change the union with which he or she is negotiating without consultation? Where does that leave the employee if he decides that he wants to belong to another trade union? I could be cynical and say that I shall join the Association of First Division Civil Servants first thing tomorrow morning. I am sure that I would be welcomed within the ranks of the civil service.

I know that other hon. Members wish to speak, so I shall conclude by returning to something I said earlier. The Bill is another step towards the derecognition and abolition of trade unions by the Government. They would admit that if they were honest. They began by banning trade unions at GCHQ. To pile agony on agony, is not it ironic that a person who injures himself and earns more than £60 a week will be refused legal aid whereas, under this legislation, anyone can challenge a trade union's decision to take industrial action or any decision that he believes will affect him personally? He has only to take the matter up with Jill Rowlands, the Commissioner for the Rights of Trade Union Members, and he will be given almost a blank cheque to pursue the union in the courts. How does that square with the democratic rights of ordinary trade unionists?

Finally, somebody will have to tell us where the case law on equal pay for work of equal value stands now. If paying non-trade unionists more than trade unionists for the same work is not a change in law, somebody had better explain why. Somebody had better get an answer to that question quickly.

8.30 pm

Mrs. Alice Mahon (Halifax): Whatever protests Conservative Members may make, a vital freedom is under threat from the amendment—the right freely to associate and to join in collective bargaining. The Court of Appeal was absolutely clear, and I see no confusion in its judgments. In both cases, it found that a kind of bribery was being offered, which had only one purpose—to penalise people for being members of trade unions and to deter them from remaining members. The judges spoke with great clarity when they decided that the employers' object was to reduce the power of the unions, and that such anti-union discrimination was unlawful.

I read an article by Hugo Young of The Guardian about the court cases, in which he talked about "a shameful saga, showing up a politically sick society".

I disagree with only one word of that—the word "society". I would replace it with the word "Government".

When moving his amendment in the other place, Lord Ullswater said that the position after the judgment both of the employment appeal tribunal and of the Court of Appeal was unsatisfactory. We must ask, unsatisfactory for whom? Was it unsatisfactory for employers, who have friends in government, who want to break international law and who do not want to conform to international standards? Most of us here think that that is the truth. Of course, the amendment represents a change in the law, and it is extremely cynical to pretend otherwise. It is yet another attack on trade unions, intended to deter people from joining. The Government's objectives are clear, and they cannot hide them with all the clever "lawyerspeak" that we have heard in the debate. The amendment is designed to ensure that the rights of employers to discriminate against trade unionists are solid. Everybody recognises that. The so-called dispassionate legal gobbledegook uttered by the Secretary of State does not fool anyone on the Opposition side of the House.

I add my voice to those who have objected to the underhand way in which the amendment was sneaked into the House of Lords. It was drafted without consultation and rushed through at the last possible moment. That was a typically sneaky and cynical manoeuvre from a totally unprincipled Government.

Trade unions are an essential part of a democracy. They are the only organisations that stand between ordinary working people and the untrammelled power of business and government. Business interests and employers have massive representation in the House and elsewhere. We all know about the secret funding by wealthy individuals and the company donations that keep the Tory party afloat and influence Tory policies. The amendment is just another example of that influence. Asil Nadir was no exception; the history of the Tory party is riddled with scandal. By contrast, trade unions are open about their support for Labour, and their members are consulted at every level.

Over the past 14 years, there have been many pieces of legislation, every one of which has been aimed at seriously weakening trade unions and the way in which they represent working people in the workplace. The measure before us is the most pernicious of all. It is almost certainly in breach of International Labour Organisation regulations and of European legislation. No reporting and quoting Lord Ullswater will remove that fact, which will emerge again in the future.

The Government argument that the amendment secures the right of employers to negotiate with their staff is clearly nonsense. Of course employers will flock to offer extra money to induce staff to surrender their right to union representation, because that will pay off. It will help to weaken the unions further, and once the unions are completely ineffective in bargaining, the employer will move in and pay any kind of wages and impose any kind of conditions. Inducement not to join a union will leave many employees unprotected and, of course, it will seriously weaken trade unions.

The amendment would make it legal to victimise trade unions. It is a change in the law designed to legalise victimisation, and the Government know it. I agree with many of my hon. Friends that the next step will be to outlaw trade union membership altogether. This is a sad day for democracy, and the measure is certainly a betrayal of justice and of working people in this country.

Mr. Gary Streeter (Plymouth, Sutton): In view of what I have heard in the debate, I wish to make a brief contribution.

Lords amendment No. 8 brings the law into line with what I have always assumed it to be, and I used to be a practitioner in company and in employment law. Indeed, during the 1980s I spent much time advising employers on how they could remove themselves and their employees from the shackles of old and dusty collective agreements and local house agreements, and transform the working and legal relationship into one based on individual contracts. We went about doing that in the 1980s in exactly the same way in which the amendment envisages that it can be done. For all the right sound commercial reasons, the relationship between employer and employee was transformed.

As we look round at the industrial and commercial landscape in the 1990s, we find that in many companies the reforms of the 1980s have freed up working relationships, so that rather than having to go through a trade union intermediary and negotiate on every nut and bolt, every working practice, employers and employees now talk to each other. Instead of local and national agreements, many provisions of which were not known to people locally, employers now get round the table with employees and talk about what is required in the firm. That is happening up and down the land, whether Opposition Members recognise it or not.

Over the past 10 to 14 years, employees have benefited from better working relationships with employers than they had in days gone by. I argue strongly that what has happened as a result of Conservative trade union legislation has been to the benefit of many employees. I talk to a lot of people employed in all sorts of companies and businesses, and they appreciate having the freedom to communicate with employees and to have the kind of individual contracts of employment that can reward merit rather than rewards being locked away in collective bonuses and other agreements.

As I said at the beginning of my speech, the amendment simply reflects the law as I have always assumed it to be. Employers have the right to sit down with employees and to change the terms and conditions of employment, without in any sense discriminating against trade union members. We must ask ourselves: does the amendment prevent anyone from joining a trade union? The answer is no, it does not. Does it deal at all with the issue of employers recognising trade unions? No. That is entirely a matter for the employer to decide in consultation with his work force.

We are seeing on the Opposition Benches some of the ritual war dances that we have seen over the years. It saddens me enormously that lessons have not been learnt from the past 14 years. It is especially poignant that, as we debate the issue tonight, I understand that the management of Timex have now decided to close the factory because of the intransigence of trade unions in that locality.

Mr. John McAllion (Dundee, East): If the hon. Gentleman had any knowledge of the real situation in Dundee he would know that the factory is closing down because of the intransigence of its management, which from the very beginning has refused to negotiate. Indeed, it manoeuvred the workers outside the factory gates so that it could use Tory employment laws to sack the entire trade union work force and bring in non-union workers. But those macho tactics did not work. What we are presented with today is the sweetener approach, which it is thought will have the desired effect of doing away with trade unions and the collective rights of workers.

Mr. Streeter: Last night, I saw trade union officials leaving a hotel in Scotland, having spoken to management. They were saying that management had said that if the dispute continued, there would be a real prospect of its having to close the factory, that there would be no alternative. The interviewer asked the trade union officials, "Does this mean that you are going to change your position?" and was told, "Oh no, we will fight to the end." What a sad indictment. They have indeed fought to the end—the end of their members' jobs—and I hope that they are proud.

Mr. Heald: Does my hon. Friend agree that the situation is governed not just by the employment laws of the 1980s? The old common law of England——

Mr. McAllion: What about Scotland?

Mr. Heald: The old common law of England, Wales and Scotland has always provided that if workers go on strike, the employer is entitled to dismiss them. Employers have always been able to take such action, just as workers have always been able to strike.

Mr. Streeter: My hon. Friend makes a very valuable point. That has been the law for many generations, and it must continue to be the cornerstone of employment legislation.

I have said all that I want to say. The amendment clarifies the law as being what it has always been intended to be. In the long term, it will benefit management and employees and will facilitate modern industrial relations.

8.45 pm

Mr. Denham: We have heard much about the niceties of the law and the history of the situation. I should like to put on record what happened in one of the test cases.

The case concerning Associated British Ports in Southampton led to the judgment that resulted in this hurried amendment. It is a case that any reasonable person would describe as demonstrating unfair, unreasonable and unjust company conduct, leading to action in the Court of Appeal. The company set out to get rid of the union organisation. It offered the workers personal contracts, which required, in addition to the surrender of union recognition, the introduction of more flexible patterns of work. Three members of the union—Brian Stedman, Eddie Wyeth and Terry Palmer—said that they wanted to have continued union recognition. Those who maintained that position, following union negotiation with the company, were offered a pay increase of 8·9 per cent. Those who signed the personal contracts received an increase of 22 per cent. That is the root of this case.

We have heard much from Conservative Members about management's need for flexibility. The personal contracts to which I have just referred included more flexible patterns of work. The three men who resisted, standing out for union recognition, said that they were absolutely committed to adoption of the same flexible working patterns as the ones included in the personal contracts. In other words, the flexibility being sought by management was on offer. The management's only reason for pursuing the case through the Court of Appeal was that it was determined to break union organisation in the port. The argument that these moves are necessary for the achievement of management flexibility are therefore refuted absolutely.

It is a sad fact that, over the years, the port of Southampton has been a place of industrial confrontation. Unfortunately, the management there has never been able to develop the co-operative and inclusive style of management that we have heard described so glowingly by Conservative Members. Within the past few months a port company—part-owned by ABP, which funds the activities of at least one hon. Member, and P and O, which gives money to the Conservative party—sought to impose new working practices on a unionised part of the port and, at the same time, recruited a secret strike-breaking force to come in and take jobs on the outbreak of the predicted industrial action. But the industrial action did not break out, as the unions agreed to the changes in working practices for which the company had been asking. The company changed the rules again, in a further attempt to provoke industrial action and justify locking people out, as, tragically, has happened in Dundee. The truth is that management gets the type of trade unionism that it deserves. Confrontational management produces robust trade unionism, but trade unions are always blamed for the type of response.

This country faces a clear choice about the way in which it should go in industrial relations. In Britain, there are intelligent, co-operative, far-sighted managers who recognise the importance of developing team work, of providing information to their employees, of involving people in decisions and of producing a modern and effective industrial sector. However, there is also a brutal and stupid class of management which believes in keeping the work force in the dark, in leading only from the top and in ruling by fear and insecurity. The significance of this amendment is that the Government are throwing in their lot with the latter, backward-looking, section of British industrial management. Far from promoting and backing those managers who want to work with the work force and with trade unions, to provide information, to let people in on plans and know about the difficulties and the challenges so that they may be tackled in unity, the Government have come down decisively on the side of those who say that managers should sit in their offices and send out directives and that those who do not like it can lump it.

This amendment will not be exploited by good and far-sighted managers. They do not need it, as they do not run their organisations in such a way as to need it. The amendment will be exploited by the worst British managers for the worst reasons—the worst reasons not just for the workers, but for the country as a whole. Thus it is highly significant. It is a great shame, but not a surprise, that the Government have thrown their lot in with such people and given the wrong message to people in British industry.

Mr. Clapham: I should like, at the outset, to declare an interest. I am a member of the National Union of Mineworkers, and I am proud to be sponsored by my union.

Over the past 14 years the Conservative Government have put on the statute book six major pieces of legislation in this field. Each of them attacks trade union rights. The legislation has made it difficult for trade unions to operate, but it stops short of actually outlawing or penalising union membership. This amendment changes all that. If it is accepted, it will be lawful for an employer to pay a trade unionist more than another worker doing the same job in return either for relinquishing his union membership or for accepting bargaining arrangements with another trade union. That is a major change in the law, and it cannot be right.

Clearly the amendment makes it lawful to offer a bribe. A worker is bribed for the purpose of inducing him to leave the union that he chose to join. It therefore imposes action short of dismissal on those who stay with the union of their choice. It is clear that such action taken by an employer to induce workers to leave the union of their choice is intended to deter or prevent individuals from joining or remaining in the union of their choice. There is no doubt that the amendment has been introduced because of the recent Court of Appeal judgment in two cases—Associated Newspapers Limited v. Wilson and Associated British Ports and others. That judgment was not what the Government wanted. They therefore decided to change the law.

I believe that another motive behind the amendment is to give the employer the right to choose the trade union that he considers his employees should join. That was made plain by Viscount Ullswater in the other place:

"An employer may . . . wish to alter his bargaining arrangements. He may . . . offer incentives to encourage employees to accept a new arrangement where a certain trade union does not negotiate terms on their behalf."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 24 May 1993; Vol. 1567, c. 97.]

The emphasis—"a certain trade union"—is important. That means that if, for example, an employer finds that his employees are in a trade union which bargains hard, or which vigorously pursues health and safety issues on the shop floor, or which robustly follows through common law damages claims, he can seek to transfer the bargaining arrangements to a union that he regards as less vigorous. Under the amendment, he could claim reasonableness in the sense that his action related to the commercial viability of his concern—that he was changing the bargaining arrangements merely to reduce his insurance premiums. The amendment thus brings about a major change in the law.

The proposal is a shabby device to set in motion a procedure to impose the employer's will on the work force. Despite the assurances of the Secretary of State, it constitutes a change in the law, and I urge Conservative Members to consider very seriously, and to uphold, the rights of individual trade unionists by voting against it.

Mr. Etherington: I am proud to declare my interest as a member, since 1957, of what was then the Amalgamated Engineering Union and as a member of the National Union of Mineworkers from 1963 to the present. I am sponsored by the National Union of Mineworkers. I am quite willing to let anyone know the extent of that sponsorship and I am very proud of it. There is nothing secret; everything is quite transparent.

I was interested to note that, in seeking to justify his support for Lords amendment No. 8, the Secretary of State repeatedly referred to the need for "clarity" and "clarification". I had always understood that one sought clarity and clarification when something was opaque, not when it was transparent. If ever anything has been transparent it has been the Government's manoeuvrings in seeking to strengthen the rights and powers of employers against those whom they have the privilege to employ.

I have never been and have never wanted to be a pedantic lawyer, although I have great respect for the legal profession and, indeed, for hon. Members with a legal background. As we talked of the various sections and subsections of legislation going back as far as 1975—and even, on one occasion, as far as 1908—it crossed my mind that it was rather unfortunate that we were spending so much time discussing the law, as this is not a legal but a political matter. It is about power—and, in particular, about the creation of more power for the Government's supporters, at their request.

It was interesting to hear the differing views that were advanced about what the relationship between employers and employees should be. I agree that, in an ideal world, it would be nice to achieve consensus. I have had the pleasure for many years of working in an industry—in fact, in more than one industry—where, for most of the time, there was consensus. I was pleased to hear the speech of the hon. Member for Eltham (Mr. Bottomley). I hope that he will not be offended if I say that much of what he said reminded me of the attitude that Lloyd George took during the Liberal Government of 1906, when he supported the rights of employees on many occasions. I say that as a compliment to the hon. Gentleman.

I was interested, too, to hear that the hon. Member for Eltham is a member of the Institute of Personnel Management. In the rather better days before 1979, I attended a diploma course on industrial relations at Durham university at which I rubbed shoulders with personnel managers of firms with which I had nothing to do. We used to discuss something that I never hear mentioned now—pluralism. The hon. Member for Eltham understands that concept well. Pluralism is fairly simple: it means that the employer has a right to look after his interests and that those who work for him have a right to look after theirs. That is a basic human right that the Government seem to be seeking to destroy.

That philosophy applied for many years in this country. Many Governments—even on this occasion, Conservative Governments—have introduced legislation that has improved the rights of workers in relation to their employers. I am talking not about their individual rights, but about their rights at the workplace and in relation to their employer. Conservative Governments have introduced such improvements, although one has to go back quite a number of years to find examples. In case any member of the Government should be interested in the subject, may I recommend a book called "The History of British Trade Unionism", written by Henry Pelling, from which they will learn how pluralism developed.

Under that system, if a reasonable equation was arrived at between the rights of employers and the rights of their employees and if each was able to look after his own interests, conflicts could be resolved where they arose. We have seen that happen under various Governments—particularly in wartime, when we had compulsory arbitration and the protection of employment and so on—and it worked. For most of my teenage years and, indeed, for 20 years thereafter, I lived in a society that recognised that fact. Since 1979, however, all that has changed. I find it appalling that the Government, in the six pieces of employment legislation that they have introduced—which have been referred to extensively—have referred only to improvements in the individual rights of trade union members. "Improving that right in relation to whom?", one asks. Machinery can be set whereby anyone who has a complaint against his union and decides not to use the democratic means within that union can get redress and get legal aid. People can act against the trade union of which they are a member, but not against their employer. I defy Conservative Members to point to one piece of legislation that has been passed since they came to power that would fit those criteria. The Government have gone out of their way to look after the interests of those who sponsor them, all the time trying to give the impression that they are being even-handed and looking after the rights of the individual.

9 pm

The Government do not seem to understand—or perhaps they understand only too well—that individual rights within a collective remain individual rights. They cannot be separated. We cannot overlook the many years in Britain which were prosperous for the country and for near-full employment. People were working full time and while there were bound to be disparities between wage rates, the vast majority of people were content in their jobs.

The Conservatives would argue that through those years the trade unions had too much power. That is not borne out by the facts. Trade union members have rights across the spectrum of life—affecting housing, the law and so on—but, unfortunately, the least rights they have affect their very trade unionism. Their trade union rights are among the poorest in the European Community.

We have heard much about the rights of collectives in Japan. We have been told for years how marvellous the Japanese system is. It cannot be that good, or the British Government would have given trade unionists in this country the same rights as their counterparts in Japan.

The debate is not about the amendment but about a Government who are paranoid over the so-called power of trade unions. They are desperate to ensure that, whenever there is conflict between employer and employee, they side with the employer, regardless of the circumstances of the case. We have seen that time and again since 1979. I have yet to hear a Minister say that an employer is wrong and a trade union is right.

Labour Members are constantly taunted about the relationship between our party and the trade union movement. I regard it as a healthy, open relationship which allows people to have their say and in which democracy prevails. Conservative Members are the last people on earth to lecture us about individual rights because they do not begin to understand what democracy means, unless and until it affects their interests and power and the way in which they manipulate that power.

We have been told by the Conservatives for years that if employers and business can be free, the country will become prosperous. We are seeing the results of Government efforts in that respect. The manufacturing base has gone down at probably the same rate of knots as the power of trade unions has been reduced, yet the Government still do not see the link. Once the Government begin to remove people's rights and extinguish equality between employers and employees, strife is created, and that strife has a debilitating effect on the economy.

I accept that there are good employers, but this legislation is not aimed at them. It is a panacea for bad employers and there are plenty of those. There are plenty of sweatshop employers in Britain. People are being paid £1·50 an hour for working 50 or even 60 hours a week. The Government think that there is something wrong with people asking for a 48-hour week. Supporters of the Government are earning a thousand times more than some low-paid workers and Conservative Members think that that is fair and equitable.

There are no market forces for trade unions because the Government have gradually been ensuring that that market is shut off and the shut-off has not been all that gradual in some cases. The Government preach free market economics, with employers being free to compete and do what they like. But people representing working folk cannot have that same freedom. They must be curtailed.

Conservative propaganda blaming the trade unions for everything has been good over the years. They have neutered the trade unions and the country is in a bigger mess than ever. If Goebbels could return to life, he would realise what a failure he had been compared with the indoctrination that the Conservatives have undertaken. But the public are becoming wiser and trade unions are gaining in popularity. That is another reason why employers must be bolstered. I should like to develop that theme in detail, but I would anger my Whips if I continued for much longer. This will let the country as a whole see the unfairness of the Government. I hope that the hon. Member for Eltham and other hon. Members will see the sense in voting against the amendment and getting back to a decent system of industrial relations.

Mr. Burden: When I was reading the amendment, I cast my eyes to the top of the Bill that it was supposed to be amending. The title of the Bill has always mystified me a little. The first part of it, relating to trade union reform, is confusing, because the Bill does not contain a great deal of reform. One finds a lot of red tape as far as trade unions are concerned but not a great deal in terms of reform.

I may be a naive sort of soul but, when I see the term "employment rights", I think that the Bill should contain some rights for employees. Any extra rights that have been given to individual employees were opposed by the Government in the first place—but they were forced to accept them by Europe. In Committee and on Second and Third Reading, I heard Ministers explain and claim how the rights for employees are increasing. When they were about to abolish the wages councils, they said that it was not about cutting pay but about improving the rights of employees and employers as free agents to get together to negotiate rates for the job.

I could not see—I have not come across it since that time—a large number of low-paid workers rushing forward to thank the Government for their extra rights. Perhaps the cat was let out of the bag by Lord Ullswater on the rights that the Government were talking about. His words in another place have been echoed in many ways by Conservative Members tonight:

> "It is, of course, the employer's right to decide exactly how he wants to negotiate with his staff. After all, no one but the employer in question can know all the relevant circumstances and can decide what is best for his business. It has always been this Government's policy to ensure that employers have the freedom to act in this way."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 24 May 1993; Vol. 546, c. 22.]

When the Government talk about employment rights, it is rather one-sided. Employment rights exist only as far as the employer is concerned and of course it is not uniform. If an employer decides to exercise rights in a way in which the Government disapprove, the law is changed to restrict them. For example, if an employer decides, in free agreement with his or her employees, to enter into a union membership agreement, that is restricted by law. There are no rights or freedoms as far as that is concerned. If an employer decides that he or she would have an agreement with trade unions for check-off, that is restricted because the Government changed the law. But if an employer's purpose is to discourage collective bargaining—if the employer wants that right—suddenly the Government are prepared to change the law.

Within six days of a court judgment coming out which the Government found inconvenient, we had an announcement that the law would be changed. Suddenly we had a willingness to legalise bribery, cajoling and punishing people simply for saying that they want to use their trade union membership. The Government say that it is nothing to do with trade union membership—they say that they uphold the right of an individual to remain a member of a trade union—except of course in the case of GCHQ. They are happy for people to be trade union members in most situations, as long as they do not avail themselves of the benefits of membership.

The amendment is not simply an attack on collective bargaining and collective organisation; it also jeopardises the right of employees to choose to have individual representation by a trade union. If that does not jeopardise the right of trade union membership, I sometimes wonder where the Government's logic would lead if it were applied to political parties.

I can imagine Ministers saying, "We have changed the law for political parties. Of course, we have no objection whatever to people joining the political party of their choice." The only thing that is not allowed is for that political party to put up a candidate for election. That is the logic behind the Government's amendment.

This is a charter to bully trade unionists and deny them bonuses. It is a charter to ensure that it is always a trade union member who ends up working the anti-social shift. It is a charter that says that a trade union member can be denied promotion. Yet the Government say that this has nothing to do with victimisation of trade union members and that it is just permitting an employer, in the words of Lord Ullswater, to "achieve an organisational or strategic purpose."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 24 May 1993, Vol. 546, c. 23.]

I wonder, considering those terms, whether the noble Lord writes the scripts for "Yes Minister".

I do not know where some Tory Members have been in recent years. Are they unaware of the fear of many employees, particularly in firms, of which I have had some experience immediately prior to privatisation, when the blue-eyed boy or blue-eyed girl syndrome is so clear? Employees fear that, if they step out of line or do something of which their employer disapproves—in some cases, that could easily be merely being a trade union member in an area of the business where the employer feels that trade union membership is inappropriate—they could be discriminated against and find their career prospects in jeopardy. If the amendment is agreed, in future their pay would also be in jeopardy.

The amendment panders to all the worst prejudices of the Conservative party. I am pleased that some Conservative Members have principles and are prepared to accept that it is not necessarily contradictory for Conservative Members to support the right of an individual to practise trade union membership rather than just to have it, but it seems that most Tory Members will troop through the Lobby with the majority tonight.

They will not recognise that they would improve industrial relations if they ensured that workers who have been subject to such discrimination, for example at Timex, had greater rights. They would be doing something positive for the workers who have been dismissed at Burnsalls in the west midlands near my constituency. Such would be the positive signs of a Government who were interested in improving industrial relations rather than just knocking trade unions once again.

I would applaud the introduction of a statutory right to guarantee trade union recognition if a majority of workers in a particular firm supported it. That is not the purpose of tonight's debate. At present, trade union recognition can be removed, as has been the case for a long period, purely by an employer's diktat. Tonight the Government are taking that an important stage further: they are not just giving employers the right to derecognise the collective organisation of employees, however many employees want it, but the right to jeopardise the practical realisation of trade union membership itself. That is almost certainly contrary to European law, as many of my hon. Friends have explained.

Journalists near my constituency who work for Reed Elsevier have approached me. Why, they ask, because they happen to work in Britain, can they be pushed, cajoled and shoved to accept individual contracts with no recourse, whereas people who work for the same firm in other parts of Europe have rights?

No Minister or Conservative Member has made any mention today of the buzz words that they use so often —"the citizens charter". I wonder why? Perhaps it is because, for the Government, when it comes to trade union membership, the rights to citizenship suddenly go out of the window. As my hon. Friends have already said, trade union members will end up with fewer rights than those enjoyed by the members of any other organisation.

In years to come, people will study the debate and work out the Government's objectives. They will see through the statements made in another place and the protestations of Ministers and Conservative Members about their support for trade union membership. People will come to appreciate how the law was changed, and they will see that act as the latest in a long series of attacks on the rights of ordinary people to work collectively to ensure basic rights of pay, conditions of service and fair treatment. It is that principle of organisation and working together that gets right up the Government's nose. The Opposition will continue to support the principle of collective organisation, however, because it is an essential part of democracy. But it seems that democracy is something that the Government do not understand.

Mr. Winnick: I declare my interest. Although I am not sponsored, my constituency party receives a rather modest sum from the union of which I am a member.

As my hon. Friends have said, the Government are motivated by their attitude of sheer malice towards trade unions. They have displayed that attitude since they were elected 14 years ago. My hon. Friend the Member for Halifax (Mrs. Mahon) said that the final objective of the Government will be to abolish trade unions. Even this Government will not do that, but they will do their utmost, as they have done in the past 14 years, to undermine, weaken and erode the role of trade unions in the workplace. Even the Lords amendment, despicable though it is, should not cause any surprise to my hon. Friends.

[Mr. Winnick]

If there is any question about where the Government stand on trade union rights and recognition, I refer hon. Members to an Adjournment debate on 11 March on the bitter industrial dispute at Burnsall's factory in the west midlands. That dispute continues and it should cause grave concern, because the work force have been treated with utter contempt.

My hon. Friend the Member for Warley, East (Mr. Faulds), as the constituency Member, carried out his duties and raised the matter in the House. It is interesting to note what the then Under-Secretary of State for Employment said in that debate. Certainly the Minister of State would echo his remarks, word for word. My hon. Friend stressed that the work force had held ballots and that they had unanimously called for their trade union to be recognised. The Under-Secretary of State said of trade union recognition:

"To argue that because there was a ballot in favour of recognition Burnsall's should agree to that can only be founded on the completely unacceptable principle that recognition arrangements can properly be decided by workers alone. That cannot be correct, as it fails to take proper account of the employers' necessary freedom to decide the terms on which they will work."—[Official Report, 11 March 1993; Vol. 220, c. 1207.]

That attitude illustrates that no matter what ballots are held and no matter the wishes of the workers, they make no difference.

Mr. Michael Forsyth indicated assent.

Mr. Winnick: The Minister agrees. In his opinion and that of the Government, the management should be the deciding factor. No matter how many ballots may be held, no matter their unanimous result, the wishes of the work force are of no interest to the Government. Despite what the Government have said about balloting, the citizens charter and the rest of the cosmetic nonsense, ultimately, they believe that the management of the company should be the decisive factor and the work force should do as they are told.

Mr. Forsyth: No doubt the hon. Gentleman will recall that, when a Labour Government introduced the measure requiring compulsory recognition of trade unions, it was later abandoned. Even the Advisory, Conciliation and Arbitration Service said that the whole thing was unworkable.

Mr. Winnick: As the Minister knows, there is a difference between the compulsory recognition of unions and saying—which no Labour Minister would dream of saying—that it makes no difference what is done in ballots or what decisions are reached by the work force in secret ballots. "It cannot be decided by workers alone": that illustrates the background of the debate and the contemptuous attitude of the Government towards the working people of our country, particularly the millions of people who want to belong to a trade union.

When we criticised, attacked and denounced communist and fascist dictatorships, time and again the yardstick that we used to define them was not simply the denial of the right to vote—a fundamental right—but another yardstick associated with civil liberty: the right of assembly, the right to vote secretly to elect Governments and to have a free press. It was the right to belong to a genuine union and have that union recognised at one's place of employment. It is a sad commentary on today's society that so many people are penalised for belonging to a trade union.

The Court of Appeal made the position perfectly clear. When it was deciding on the cases that form the background to the amendment, it said that the aim was to penalise people for being members of a union or to deter them from remaining members. If the amendment is passed, it will be used by countless other employers to try to bribe people to stop them belongong to a trade union —they will deny employees pay increases. Today, that is illegal. If the amendment is carried because the Government are able to organise their majority, such a practice will become legitimate.

When my right hon. and hon. Friends say that the Government are corrupt, they are right—the Government are corrupted by power. If anyone has any illusions—none of my hon. Friends is likely to have them—they need only look on pages 1 and 3 of today's edition of The Independent to see that the Conservative party, to which Ministers belong, was willing to accept money from whatever sources, no matter how often it was told that the company making the donation was breaking the law. I am, of course, referring to Nadir. Ministers were not concerned that Mr. Nadir had not revealed the contributions in the company accounts.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Morris): Order. The hon. Gentleman's remarks do not seem to have much to do with amendment No. 8.

Mr. Winnick: My remarks are relevant to the fact that the Government are corrupt and determined to penalise people for belonging to a trade union. The Government are only too happy to accept money from sources which, at the time, must have seemed dubious and are now known to have been criminal. Therefore, I hope that not just one Conservative Member but a few more will have the honesty and integrity to know that what is being done today is absolutely wrong. When the Government's record is considered, the amendment will be the evidence of how corrupt and sick they have become.

Mr. McAllion: I declare an interest as I am sponsored by the National Union of Civil and Public Servants. Probably more important is the fact that I represent constituents who have today become the latest victims of the collusion between the Government and bad employers who want to use mass unemployment to drive down the wages and conditions of workers in this country. I shall set the record straight on the relevance of the Timex dispute in Dundee to the debate.

The Timex management and the authors of the clause share a common objective—the destruction of organised labour. The Timex management took a hard line at the start of the dispute when the issue at stake was the rotation of lay-offs because of a lack of contracts. Management was completely instransigent and refused to make any concessions to the workers, in the knowledge that that would lead to a strike. When the workers were outside the factory gates they could be sacked and Timex could seek to employ a new non-union work force whose members would accept personal contracts containing vicious cuts in wages and conditions.

That approach did not work because of the magnificent fight by the sacked workers and the magnificent support that they received from the labour and trade union movement throughout the United Kingdom. The amendment is a Government attempt at a completely different approach which will have the same effect. Instead of someone who agrees to a personal contract suffering a cut in wages, as happened at Timex, those who agree to such a contract will receive extra wages.

That approach will completely undermine the point of belonging to a trade union. What is the point of paying trade union dues when, by way of a personal contract, one can receive higher wages than could be obtained through collective bargaining? People will be discouraged from belonging to trade unions and when membership declines and the unions disappear, the employer will have a completely free hand in personal contracts and will impose whatever cuts in wages and conditions he thinks fit.

Perhaps some Conservative Members think that that will not happen. I was a member of the Industry-Parliament Trust with IBM which prided itself on never having trade unions because, through personal contracts, it guaranteed that none of its workers would ever face compulsory redundancy. IBM has now hit hard times and its workers know that the company is not true to its word because they are being made compulsorily redundant.

The Government say that they are proud of their record on industrial relations. I hope that they are proud of what happened in Dundee today. The Government have advertised in German newspapers for investors to come here because of cheap labour. They should not be surprised when some of the companies that are already here take them at their word and try to impose vicious cuts in wages.

Mr. Raymond S. Robertson (Aberdeen, South) rose——

Mr. McAllion: I am not giving way, because the Front-Bench speakers are anxious to deliver the winding-up speeches. If the hon. Gentleman had any interest at all in the welfare of workers in Dundee or anywhere else in the United Kingdom, he would be on the Opposition side of the House. I shall give way briefly.

Mr. Robertson: Will the hon. Gentleman take two minutes to explain the service that trade unions rendered in Dundee five years ago when they lost the area the massive investment of a Ford plant?

Mr. McAllion: That is not true. The hon. Gentleman well knows that the union that he backed at that time, the Amalgamated Engineering and Electrical Union, was today the victim of the actions of multinationals.

If the Government are at all interested in helping workers, instead of shackling the trade unions they should do something about the over-mighty power of multinationals which are running riot across the country against the interests of workers.

Mr. Sam Galbraith (Strathkelvin and Bearsden): I was not in the House during the passage of most of the trade union legislation of the past decade. However, my understanding from tales of folklore is that the Government Benches were full of baying Tory Members hounding the trade unions. Now there is an interesting contrast. Numerous Conservative Members have said that this legislation is absolutely vital. We are led to believe that without it this country will never recover from the deep recession, yet the Tories are running out of speakers.

The hon. Member for Hertfordshire, North (Mr. Heald) started to speak at 7.53 in a debate that it is agreed will finish at about 10 o'clock. Embarrassed Whips were sent to the Tea Rooms and managed to drag out another Tory, the hon. Member for Plymouth, Sutton (Mr. Streeter), who delivered a perfunctory few remarks at 8.35. I hope that the Tories are embarrassed, but it is more likely that they are bored because even they are getting fed up with bashing the unions, as they have done day in and day out for the past decade.

I was interested to hear how the new Secretary of State would tackle the amendment with which he has been landed. He comes to the Department with a reputation for decency, generosity of spirit and liberalism. [Interruption.] Those are the stories I hear in the Tea Room; I do not speak from personal experience. He did not make a good justification for that. I had the impression that he was embarrassed by what he had to say. Certainly the Minister of State will not suffer from that affliction. His only embarrassment will be that the amendment does not remove completely the right to be a member of a trade union as he would have liked.

9.30 pm

My understanding of the Secretary of State's analysis and the reasons behind the amendment was that they had nothing to do with collective bargaining. He tried to tease union membership and collective bargaining apart, to separate them from each other and therefore to suggest that the amendment had no effect on trade union membership. That is somewhat disingenuous. As many of my hon. Friends have said, the two issues are closely connected.

If one is a member of a trade union but cannot exercise that right, it removes de facto the right to be a trade unionist. My hon. Friend the Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) used as an example the credit card that cannot be used. My example is that the right to free speech is valueless if one can exercise it only in a sound-proofed room with no one else there. It was the same when the Minister tried to make that disingenuous separation between trade union membership and collective bargaining. It is not just collective bargaining that will be lost; it is the right for a trade union to represent its members with their employer on any issue other than health and safety. It effectively denudes the member of any rights whatsoever and is therefore a direct attack. So the Minister's first point was wrong.

A further important issue is the financial inducement or bribery that is involved. The amendment legalises bribery and corruption. That should be anathema to hon. Members on both sides of the House. Even the Minister was embarrassed by that.

The Minister tried to justify the amendment by saying that it was just a clarification of the law. I am not a lawyer, but, by golly, we should beware anyone saying that something is just a clarification of the law. The law is a many and varied thing that works in many ways. We should beware the lawyer who is just here to be helpful and simply wants to clarify the law.

The Government got themselves into some difficulty in justifying that. First, the Minister put forward the proposition that the law was absolutely clear cut and straightforward. If that was the case, I am not sure why it needed clarifying, but it was clarified.

Another argument put forward by the hon. Member for Hertfordshire, North was that the law was not clear at all; in fact, it was a shambles and everyone had different interpretations of it. They could at least have come up with the same excuses and briefed one another better.

The reason behind the confusion is that that argument is wrong. I agree with the Minister that the law was clear. The Court of Appeal has made it clear. If it was not clear, the court has clarified it. Everyone agrees about that. There was no stream of cases against employers trying to remove the rights of trade union members because employers knew that they would be in breach of section 146 of the Trade Union and Labour Relations (Consolidation) Act 1992. The Minister proposed not clarification, but simply changing the law once again to the benefit of the employers. Once again, it was an attack on the trade unions.

The Minister's third point was that somehow or other the amendment is not an attack on the trade unions. I would believe that a bit more if an amendment put forward in the other place had been accepted. Baroness Turner of Camden moved an amendment to insert, among other things,

"not to discriminate against employees who were members of an independent trade union".

That would have made it clear that, however the law was changed, it would not discriminate against trade unionists.

Viscount Ullswater indulged in some wonderful double-speak when he said:

"It would provide that in a situation where a tribunal has evidence of two purposes for an employer's action and where the clause provides that it shall therefore consider the negotiating purpose to be the relevant purpose, it will only do so if there is not additional evidence of a principal purpose to discriminate against employees who are trade union members."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 24 May 1993; Vol. 546, c. 88-89.]

That is just a start. He says that again, two or three paragraphs later, in many more words. In other words, the purpose was clearly to discriminate against trade unions. The law was clear. The Government have confused it. We shall be back in the law courts again seeking further clarification of the procedure.

The amendment was slipped in at the last minute in an underhand, sneaky, sleekit way without the opportunity for due consideration. It is a mark of the Government's weakness. Here they are, unable to accept the Court of Appeal's ruling. They pretend that they are a macho Government, show their weakness and immediately change the law. They do not even wait for the matter to go to appeal in the other place. They do not consult anyone else. They simply get in there while they can and change the law in order to establish that, with all their powers, they can do what they like. That is not a sign of strength; it is a sign of weakness, ably reflected by the Government.

The amendment also shows how the Government are in thrall to management. No matter what the Court of Appeal says, no matter what their international obligations, no matter what common justice dictates, no matter what decency suggests, everything in industrial law has to be for the benefit of management and employers; they are the only ones who have rights.

Whenever there was a conflict in Committee between employee and employer and management, the Government always came down on the side of the employer, as if they had some inalienable right, as if there were some inherent law, such as the law of gravity or Newton's third law of motion, be it ethical or physical, which I never got to the bottom of, a right not given to employees but always given to employers. The Government are in the thrall of management. When management and employers say jump, the Government jump on their behalf.

Not only was the amendment introduced in a sneaky, sleekit way at the last minute, without consultation, not quite at the dead of night, but certainly as the night was drawing in, but the Government indulge in double-speak. The Conservative research department brief on employment and training, a laughable document which is a good read for anyone who has not read the Dandy or the Beano for a while, says:

"Conservative Governments have transformed Britain's poor industrial relations record and have created"— this is the Government's aim—

"a fairer balance between employers and trade unions."

The brief goes on to say that the Government's aims are "to defend individual liberty"—

tell that to people—

". . . and to restore a fairer balance between employers and trade unions; and to make remedies available".

The Government's idea of a fairer balance is simply once again to remove the rights of employees and hand all powers and rights to the all-powerful employers.

It is a pity that the clause has not been given due consideration. It is probably technically flawed; certainly it would benefit from further debate. I have already dealt with the argument that it is not about bashing the trade unions. An amendment tabled in another place, which was turned down by the Government, would have clarified the matter.

I believe that the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile) referred to the words

"the tribunal shall regard the purpose mentioned in paragraph (a) . . . as the purpose for which the employer took the action, unless it considers that the action was such as no reasonable employer would take".

I am familiar and quite happy with the phrase similar phrases are used in medical evidence. References are made to reasonable doctors with equal standards behaving in a reasonable manner in, for instance, cases involving negligence.

"such as no reasonable employer would take";

As the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery pointed out, that is not the crux of the amendment, although it will certainly give employers a field day. The crux is in the words that follow:

"having regard to the purpose mentioned in paragraph (a)."

Perhaps the Minister will clarify that. Does it mean that paragraph (a) must be judged reasonable or otherwise—which would be the decent thing—or does it merely mean that the action taken must be reasonable in order to achieve the purpose in paragraph (a)? That purpose could be entirely unreasonable, but perhap that will not be considered, provided that the steps taken are themselves reasonable. In such circumstances, the test of reasonableness will relate not to the action taken by the employer against his employee, but to the steps that he takes to achieve his aim. [Interruption.] My manager is giving me a tick-tack message. As I am generally well behaved and an extremely reasonable chap in both action and demeanour, I shall conclude my speech.

Tonight, we are preparing to introduce yet another piece of trade union legislation. All the trade union legislation that has been introduced in the past decade has been predicated on the premise that Britain's industrial decline can be set at the unions' door: it has all been caused by trade union militancy. If only legislation could be passed to neuter the unions, unemployment would suddenly cease to exist; there would be no balance of payments deficit and no public sector borrowing requirement; and manufacturing investment would go up and up. What do we have today? We have a rip-roaring balance of payments deficit; public sector borrowing is over the top; 4 million people are unemployed; and the economy is in disarray.

The Government's legislation was based on a false premise. It has not worked, and it never will: nor will the amendment.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The hon. Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden (Mr. Galbraith) accused Conservative Members of having run out of speakers at 7.53 pm. Opposition Members ran out of argument at about 4.38 pm, two minutes after the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) stood up.

I do not think anyone could deny that we have examined the amendment in a thorough and detailed manner. We have heard conflicting views about its meaning. The Opposition have exaggerated and misrepresented its effects in an attempt to portray it as an attack on the rights of trade unionism; the hon. Member for Wallasey (Ms Eagle) even told us how to spot the seeds of totalitarianism. Let me tell her that totalitarianism begins with socialism, not with a belief in free enterprise or the market forces so hated by the hon. Member for Sunderland, North (Mr. Etherington).

My hon. Friends the Members for Plymouth, Sutton (Mr. Streeter), for Hertfordshire, North (Mr. Heald) and for Teignbridge (Mr. Nicholls) brought some common sense to our proceedings, giving us the benefit of their legal and professional training and expertise.

It should be absolutely clear that the Government value highly the protection that section 146 has offered, and will continue to offer, individual employees. It has an important role to play in ensuring that employers do not victimise individual employees to persuade them to become, or to cease to be, trade union members. It has no part to play in collective and strategic issues such as an employer's decision to introduce personal contracts for his work force.

We have had claims about the effects of the new clause from Opposition Members which, even by the high standards of the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras, have set new records. His claims about bribes to leave unions and penalties for remaining in unions are unfounded, exaggerated and nonsensical. He was at it again yesterday. He told the BBC's one o'clock news that:

"The amendment will make it lawful for an employer to bribe or punish an employee if they are a member."

He told Channel 4 news yesterday:

"The Government is proposing to change the law to encourage employers to deter people from being in unions or to penalise them for doing so."

I must tell my hon. Friend the Member for Eltham (Mr. Bottomley) that it was not the Court of Appeal whom I accused of talking poppycock, but the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras and the others who joined him in misrepresenting the position.

The amendment is not about trade union membership. It is about an employer's right to organise his business as he sees fit, and an employee's right to accept arrangements that can improve his or her terms and conditions.

My hon. Friend the Member for Eltham also suggested that we might idemnify the loser for costs if either of the two Court of Appeal cases goes to the House of Lords. Any appeal would be on the basis of the law as it currently exists. The new clause will not apply retrospectively and I do not, therefore, believe that we would be justified in acceding to that request.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: My hon. Friend's crucial point is fair. Section 146 still exists and will continue to exist even if the amendment is written into the law. My hon. Friend will agree that the industrial tribunal found, as a matter of fact, that the actions of the employers in each case wholly negated union membership. Can he tell the House whether, in his view—it will be decided by the courts in the end—Mr. Palmer and Mr. Wilson would have been unsuccessful if this amendment had been written into law when their cases were heard by the industrial tribunal?

Mr. Forsyth: I should not be drawn on that matter. The amendment is clear and it is for the courts to determine, on the basis of the facts, what will apply. The employment appeal tribunal highlighted a lack of clarity in the law and that is why the amendment is required.

The hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile) and the hon. Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden asked me to put on record the meaning of the words which include a test of reasonableness. The wording is included in the clause to provide a further test of the employer's action. If the tribunal is satisfied that there is evidence that the employer has a purpose.

"to further a change in his relationship with all or any . . . of his employees", it must also be satisfied that the action was not to further that purpose. Otherwise, the action could still be found to have been taken for a purpose within section 146, and therefore to have been unlawful. I hope that that helps hon. Members. It should help my hon. Friend the Member for Eltham with the substance of his question, if not the case that he put to me.

"such as no reasonable employer would take"

The hon. and learned Member for Montgomery also asked why we had not waited for the outcome of any eventual House of Lords hearing. My hon. Friend the Member for Teignbridge made the key point that even if an appeal were to be heard and whether or not the Court of Appeal judgments were reversed, the difficulties would not necessarily be resolved.

The purpose of the courts is to interpret the law as it is enacted by Parliament. It has become clear that this section of the law as presently drafted has caused, and is continuing to cause, difficulties for the tribunals and the courts and it is right that we should take steps to clarify it.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Cambridgeshire, South-East (Mr. Paice) said in an excellent speech, the Government have made clear their aim to create a climate in which individual effort and performance can be rewarded. In our White Paper, "People, Jobs and Opportunity" which was published before the general election—we fought and won a general election on its basis—paragraph 4.7 says:

"The Government . . . will continue to encourage employers to move away from traditional, centralised collective bargaining towards methods of pay determination which reward individual skills and performance; respond to the wish of individual employees to negotiate their own terms and conditions of employment; and to take full account of business circumstances".

Who could argue with that?

[Mr. Forsyth]

The amendment is entirely consistent with that policy. It will remove an artificial and unintended obstacle to employers who wish to differentiate within their pay structures as they move in that direction.

In response to those such as the hon. Member for Southampton, Itchen (Mr. Denham) who have questioned employers' motives in offering incentives to employees who agree to accept personal contracts, let me say that there are perfectly legitimate business reasons for doing so. In a letter to my Department on 24 May—after we had tabled the amendment—the chairman of Associated British Ports explained his company's position as follows:

"Generally, we believe that personal contracts give companies and their customers substantial advantages. We think it is only right, therefore, that those who accept personal contracts receive benefits greater than those who remain within a negotiated employment structure.

The company pays more to an employee who undertakes to work with complete flexibility, and the employment contract permits the company to base remuneration on merit and to withhold an annual pay increase if the company should run into financial difficulties. Basically, an employee who accepts a personal contract is selling a higher value product in the employment market, and should be rewarded accordingly".

I agree with him.

Many employers would echo those sentiments, as would the many thousands of employees who have benefited financially and in terms of personal motivation from the opportunity to be rewarded on the basis of their own commitment and performance. I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Hertfordshire, North. Only the neanderthals in the Opposition and their trade union mentors still adhere to the fallacy that rigid pay structures and equal pay rates for everyone doing the same work are the best way of improving productivity in a modern economy.

Mr. Dobson: If individual contracts are so attractive, why do employers have to offer financial incentives to get people to accept them?

Mr. Forsyth: If the hon. Gentleman is so wedded to the concept of collective bargaining, why are he and his colleagues so worried that people will get more money because they are abandoning collective bargaining? I thought that the Opposition's argument to justify collective bargaining was that it gained a better deal for employees. We have now heard from the Opposition that that is no longer the case.

What sticks in the gullet of members of the Opposition is that improvements in pay and conditions can be achieved by individuals acting on their own initiative, without the precious protection of trade unions and the apparatus of collective bargaining. The Opposition have always been keen to show examples where a trade union can negotiate a better deal for its members, but they cannot bear the thought that people might be able to negotiate a better deal for themselves as individuals.

In attempting to discredit the amendment, the Opposition have succeeded in tying themselves in knots. In attacking the amendment, they have sought to portray it as a new weapon in the hands of employers who want to derecognise trade unions. Perhaps they even believe that it can operate only in that one-sided way.

We certainly do not want to prevent employers from derecognising trade unions, which has been the Government's position since we abolished the previous Labour Government's wholly unworkable statutory recognition legislation in 1980. Even the Advisory, Conciliation and Arbitration Service recognised that this legislation could not be made to work and told the Government so. Nor would we want to prevent an employer from recognising one or more trade unions for collective bargaining if it suits his business purposes. The important point is that employers should be free to decide what bargaining arrangements best suit their circumstances at a particular time. That is precisely what the amendment will achieve.

The Opposition ignore entirely the fact that the amendment is even-handed. In the two cases before the Court of Appeal, the employers offered a financial incentive to those who agreed to personal contracts, but the amendment would cover the actions of employers just as much if they decided, for example, to introduce a single union agreement and to offer an incentive to those who agreed to have their pay negotiated under that arrangement. Of course the employer would still be at risk of acting unlawfully if he sought to compel people to join the particular union concerned, just as he would be at risk if he sought to prevent people from being members of any trade union when they agreed to sign personal contracts.

I should have expected the Opposition to welcome an amendment that enabled employers to offer incentives to encourage people to agree to have their pay settled through a single union agreement. After all, the Labour party, despite its much-trumpeted conversion to espousing the rights of the individual, voted against clause 13, which gives individuals greater freedom to join the union of their own choice. Why did they vote against it? They argued that it posed a threat to single-union deals. Never mind that the argument was based on an entirely false premise. Never mind the fact that the unions and the Labour party can at best be described as latter-day converts to the merits of the single union deal. Never mind that Labour's real reason for voting against the clause was to try to protect the power of the trade union bosses and to prop up the creaking edifice of the TUC's so-called Bridlington principles.

Where is the consistency in claiming to uphold the rights of individuals, yet seeking to deny them the right to join the union of their choice? Where is the consistency in upholding the merits of single-union agreements and then arguing against an amendment that would allow employers to offer incentives to promote acceptance of such an arrangement? The only consistency in those arguments—a consistency that runs right through the industrial relations policy of the Labour party—is that, as my hon. Friend the Member for Colne Valley (Mr. Riddick) said, Labour is once again obeying the orders of the TUC and the trade union bosses who still dictate its policies on such matters. Those people are at this very moment fighting a rearguard action to ensure that they can continue to dictate Labour party policies in the future. No one is fooled by the Opposition's claims to represent the interests of the individual. How could they be when the Labour party is so much in thrall to the collectivist ideals of trade unionism and traditional collective bargaining?

I wonder why have we spent whole day in the House debating the amendment. Could it be anything to do with the criticisms of Mr. John Edmonds that the Labour party was not doing enough to fight the cause of the trade union movement? Is that why there has been such an impressive display of jousting for the trade union barons? Union membership does not carry any automatic right to trade union recognition, or to have pay determined by collective bargaining. Indeed, there have always been many thousands of people who want to belong to trade unions even though their employers do not engage in collective bargaining. There are about 1 million trade unionists who are not covered by collective bargaining. That is one in 10 of all trade union members in Britain. What is the message from the hon. Members for Holborn and St. Pancras and for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) to those people? Presumably it is that their membership cards are worthless, and that they should tear them up and leave the union. The Labour message throughout the debate has been that without collective bargaining there is no proper trade union membership. I hope that that message was heard and received.

This evening, we have seen once again the shallowness of the Opposition's commitment to the individual and the depth of their loyalty to the collectivism of the past. They have not changed their spots. As my hon. Friend the Member for Teignbridge pointed out, they have consistently opposed our policies to give new rights and protections to trade union members. They have opposed the new right in the Bill for individuals to belong to a union of their choice. They have opposed the new protections for union members who pay their subscriptions by check-off. In the past, they opposed our reforms to outlaw the iniquities of the closed shop, even though that meant denying a job to thousands of individuals. They even opposed our reforms that gave individual trade union members the right to a secret ballot before their union could call on them to go on strike.

The Opposition are driven by the bosses of the trade unions, and it is the Government who have restored individual rights to trade union members. The amendment would allow individual trade union members to exercise choice over the appropriate form for their bargaining arrangements. Many trade union members have already chosen to do so, and many more will do so, no doubt welcoming the freedom given to them by a Conservative Government.

The truth is that Opposition Members will never be free to do what is right for trade union members until they are freed from having to look over their shoulders at the wishes of union leaders, on whom their power depends. That is why the Opposition would deny employers and individuals the flexibility to agree bargaining arrangements that would best reflect performance and reward individual effort. They would reinforce the rigidity of collective bargaining, where the interests of the individual are subordinated to the lowest common denominator.

This amendment will help to create and support flexibility—something to which the Government are firmly committed in the interests of competitiveness, individual motivation and the creation of sustainable jobs. I commend it to the House.

Question put, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment:—

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 14 (Exempted business),

That, at this day's sitting, the Lords Amendments to the Trade Union Reform and Employment Rights Bill and the Ways and Means Motion may be proceeded with, though opposed, until any hour.—[Mr. Conway.]

Question agreed to.

TRADE UNION REFORM AND EMPLOYMENT RIGHTS BILL

Lords amendments again considered.

Further consideration of Lords amendments adjourned.—[Mr. Conway.]

To be further considered tomorrow.

Ways and Means

Crime (Expenditure)

Motion made, and Question proposed,

That provision may be made preventing expenditure involving crime being deducted or being included in expenses of management.—[Sir John Cope.]

10.16 pm

Mr. Alistair Darling (Edinburgh, Central): I shall raise a short point in what I imagine will be a relatively short debate.

The resolution is in general terms, as are all such resolutions. Although its scope is comparatively wide, there must be some limit to exactly how wide it is intended to go. Its purpose is to allow the Government to table amendments to the Finance Bill, which is currently being considered in Committee, to strike at certain payments being claimed as expenses when such payments might involve crime.

The point that I shall address involves the definition and scope of such payments when considering the question of preventing expenditure involving crime. There may well be circumstances in which payments may be claimed as an allowable expense or deduction in the expense of management against the Revenue. For example, I want to know whether it will be possible, within the scope of the resolution, to table amendments that might help the Inland Revenue to identify payments that may not have been claimed as such, although in reality they are payments in connection with crime.

I can envisage a situation in which someone wishes to claim an expense but, for whatever reason, he or she is not willing to disclose the true nature of it. Therefore, I should like the Minister to tell us whether he anticipates that it will be possible within the scope of the resolution to table an amendment or new clause that would require a recipient of a payment to disclose that the payment had been made.

I have two examples in mind. First, I refer to the case of the Bank of Credit and Commerce International. The Inland Revenue and, indeed, others have had reason to question whether many of the payments that have been made are legitimate and whether they are an allowable expense. Clearly, if the recipients of those payments had had to declare the source of them, the job of the Inland Revenue would have been made that much more easy.

The other case is perhaps a live issue. It concerns donations that may have been made by an individual when he or she was insolvent or an individual who may have caused a company over which he or she had control to make payments that involved crime. I have in mind in particular, for example, donations made to a political party where the political party at the time it received the payment may have had no reason to believe that it could have come from money resulting from crime but subsequently realised that that was the case. If, for example, political parties were required to list the sources of donations and payments received, it would make it much easier for the Revenue and other authorities to see where the money had come from and to determine whether it involved crime, as envisaged in the resolution.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): Does my hon. Friend agree that a political party, particularly a political party represented in the House of Commons, should have the clear, moral and, one hopes, legal responsibility—if the Government accept what my hon. Friend is saying—to ensure that donations, and in Nadir's case substantial donations, made to it, bearing in mind the source and the creditors, are returned promptly, if only to ensure that creditors who are owed money receive it? The political party should not continue with sums which it should never have received in the first place—

Madam Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is talking outside the scope of the ways and means resolution.

Mr. Darling: I anticipated that at some point, Madam Speaker, you might be moved to make that point, which is why I have tried to contain my remarks within the constraints of the resolution.

I think that I am entitled to ask whether within the scope of the resolution it would be possible for us to to table an amendment requiring a political party to disclose the source of its donations. If it is, we most certainly will do so within the scope of the Finance Bill. I should be grateful if the Paymaster General will let us know what exactly he had in mind in drafting the resolution as he has. It mentions "preventing expenditure involving crime". That seems to be a wholly laudable and praiseworthy objective. Did he have in mind a political party which might receive money that may have come from crime? Do the Government have in mind that resolutions might be tabled to strike at the present practice where payments can be made and political parties are not obliged to reveal the source of the payments, which makes it that much more difficult not just for the Revenue but for the public to draw their conclusions about the nature and characteristics of the recipient, in this case the political party that has received these sums?

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): It would have been helpful to the House if the Paymaster General, instead of trying to get the resolution through on the nod, had explained its content and purpose. That would have helped Members who are seeking to find out the Government's aim in tabling the resolution. Certainly, on the face of it, it is laudable. As the House knows, it is linked to the Finance Bill Committee and what is tabled there will determine whether the resolution is of benefit. We do not know why the Government have tabled the resolution, which is why we are probing for information. If we were tabling amendments, we would be probing for information.

I echo the sentiments of my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, Central (Mr. Darling). Are the Government trying to ensure control over expenditure that is subsequently found to have been based on criminal actions to prevent it from being allowed against tax either directly or for management purposes when the management of a company or part is for criminal purposes? Or is it some other area of activity that they have in mind? Will a general clause to that effect be tabled in the Finance Bill Committee?

Has the resolution been prompted by the fact that the Government find themselves in an extremely embarrassing position—although they are extremely hard faced about it—because they received half a million quid from a man who was facing serious fraud charges? There is no doubt that there must have been some allocation of expenditure in Asil Nadir's company, either directly by that company, or through management expenses, that was involved in criminal activities. No doubt the company was seeking to set those activities against corporation tax. I have no doubt that the resolution is concerned precisely with that point.

If the Government are tabling the resolution to close a loophole, that is welcome to the Labour party and, I hope, to Conservative Members. I hope that they are ashamed that they have been financed by the criminal activities of Polly Peck.

Mr. David Ashby (Leicestershire, North-West): What about Robert Maxwell?

Mr. Cryer: If Maxwell had been found out earlier, criminal charges might have been levied against him.

If a clause based on the resolution had been passed in a Finance Bill some years ago, any illegal expenditure of a criminal nature by Robert Maxwell would have been revealed in Labour party accounts. The difficulty is that nothing is shown in the Conservative party accounts, because it does not hold them. That is a source of concern not only to Opposition Members but, I very much hope, to Conservative Members.

Mr. Ashby: The Home Affairs Select Committee heard evidence only last week from one gentleman who had asked the Labour party time and again for the source of its funding. It refused to tell him who was donating to it. The hon. Gentleman has got his party quite wrong; it is the most secretive party in the country.

Mr. Cryer: I am not going down roads that would bring me into possible conflict with you, Madam Speaker. I will not get involved in arguments concerning the Home Affairs Select Committee.

I am concerned about the resolution. It should allow the Government to table a clause to the Finance Bill to prevent expenditure involving crime being deducted for tax purposes or included in the expenses of management. If legislation based on the resolution is to have effect, however, the Inland Revenue must know about such expenditure. It cannot know if the necessary information is not provided.

Since a current case is based on the activities of Asil Nadir, it is legitimate to ask why the Conservative party is not prepared to publish its accounts.

Recent revelations have also been made about commercial lobbying organisations. Lobbying is part of the management exercise, because managements use commercial lobbyists. It is quite clear that Asil Nadir used such an organisation to get to the heart of Government by making representations to the Minister of State, Northern Ireland Office, the hon. Member for Hampshire, East (Mr. Mates), and the President of the Board of Trade, the right hon. Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine). The resolution will prevent the expenditure of commercial lobbying organisations.

Mr. Don Dixon (Jarrow): What about the watch?

Mr. Cryer: I am not sure whether that would be considered a management expense.

Commercial lobbying organisations are used extensively in this place and it is time that that stopped. It is also time that the report of the Select Committee on Members' Interests, published nearly two years ago, was debated in this place. That is another matter, however, which I am not prepared to discuss because it is outside the scope of the resolution.

There are some important issues involved. It would have helped if, instead of simply trying to allow the measure to slide through on the nod, as I anticipate the Minister hoped, he had explained its purpose. Can he assure the House that, if amendments are tabled in the Committee considering the Finance Bill that ensure that full account is given by political parties when they receive various donations—as they all do—the general public and particularly the Inland Revenue can check whether any criminal activity is involved? They will gain the information retrospectively and, when anyone is found to be conducting criminal activities, it will be possible to ascertain whether any claims are being made for allowance against taxation or management expenses.

If the Government are seeking to save face by not introducing legislation that directly requires all political parties to publish their accounts, we will shrug our shoulders and say that the Government are trying to look a little more dignified in the face of adversity, but we welcome the legislation. If the Government are not introducing the legislation for that purpose, will the Minister assure us that, in Committee, the Government will not oppose such a proposal, which is tabled in the interests of full, democratic accountability and ensures that expenditure or management expenses involving crime are not allowable against tax? That must be a laudable aim, and I expect all Conservative Back Benchers to welcome that attitude—if it is the Government's attitude.

I hope that it is the Government's aim, and I look forward to comprehensive assurances from the Minister on that matter. It is time that the Government took action to get rid of the sleaze that is currently engulfing them. It is a form of corruption of the political processes in this country which is bringing into disrepute, not only the Conservative party, but perfectly honest and decent members of the Conservative party who are completely opposed to it. They are also being engulfed in sleaze.

Mr. Peter Bottomley (Eltham): I suspect that the hon. Members for Edinburgh, Central (Mr. Darling) and for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer) would not be popular if the Daily Mail newspaper group found that it could not obtain tax relief on the payments that it is having to make to its pension fund to make up for the money that was stolen from the fund.

I suspect that my right hon. Friend the Paymaster General will tell the House that the measure will provide a ways and means cover for an amendment which I believe, following correspondence that I have had with my right hon. Friend, is likely to be tabled. The amendment would be designed to ensure that, if a business is feeling forced to make illegal payments for illegal purposes to an outside organisation, that will no longer be liable for tax relief. If the measure is as simple as that, I think that the Opposition would want to support it.

Mr. Roger Evans (Monmouth): Does the resolution involve any change in the practice of the Inland Revenue in disclosing information about taxpayers' affairs to the police and the prosecuting authorities? In tribute to the late Sir Alan Herbert, who made great sport in literature from the anomalies involved in taxing prostitution and suggested that the commissioners of the Inland Revenue could be prosecuted for living off immoral earnings, may I ask whether any change in practice in that aspect of the law is envisaged?

The Paymaster General (Sir John Cope): The answer to both questions of my hon. Friend the Member for Monmouth (Mr. Evans) is no. There is no change in practice in relation to disclosure to the police or immoral earnings.

The purpose of the resolution is to permit the Government to introduce what now appears as new clause 8 on the Finance Bill amendment paper relating to expenditure involving crime. That is the amendment's sole purpose. It is not for me to define the scope of the resolution in full. If hon. Members have suggestions which they think are within the remit of the resolution and the House is wise enough to pass it, they must see what they can do to carry through their suggestions.

Nothing in the motion extends the Revenue's powers to seek information, and I remind the House that political donations are disallowed for tax purposes. The proposed new clause does not apply in any way to that matter.

The hon. Member for Edinburgh, Central (Mr. Darling) asked for information to be made available not just to the Inland Revenue but to the public on the source of donations. I remind the hon. Gentleman that all information that the Inland Revenue receives about the affairs of taxpayers is rightly confidential. That is how it should be and how it will remain.

Mr. Darling: I would certainly not advocate that the Inland Revenue should disclose the affairs of a taxpayer to anyone who is not entitled in law to receive such information. I said that if political parties had to disclose the source of their money in a register that was open to inspection by the public, both the Inland Revenue and the public could see who had made payments. If the Revenue or another authority suspected that payments had been made by someone who they suspected was engaged in illegal activity, they could follow the payment from source to clarify matters. I seek a degree of openness, especially by the Conservative party in the light of what has happened to its donor Mr. Asil Nadir.

Sir John Cope: The proposed new clause and the resolution that makes it possible do not address that point for any political party, nor should they in the context of tax legislation. The resolution will ensure the introduction of new clause 8, which is in the selection list of the Committee. That clause would allow the Revenue, when computing income for tax purposes, to disallow payments which themselves constitute the commission of a criminal offence by the payer. They would be bribes of one sort or another contrary to the Prevention of Corruption Act 1916 and the prevention of terrorism Act. The new clause is carefully directed.

Mr. Cryer: Would it be applicable to someone who wanted to procure a knighthood or other honour by way of political donations? That sort of thing happens. As it is a crime involving the corruption of public bodies, it would surely be covered by the resolution's general proposal.

Sir John Cope: That may be so if the payment constituted a criminal offence in the circumstances that the hon. Gentleman suggests. If it did, it would be covered by the new clause.

Mr. Winnick: I understand that the resolution tries to ensure that companies do not profit from crime. For that reason, we obviously welcome it, and that will be made clear in future debates on the Finance Bill. Would not it be consistent to make it clear that political parties should not profit from crime? The Government rightly say that companies should not profit from crime. If there is any evidence that a party, say, the Conservative party, has received money from a criminal source to buy a knighthood or anything else, should not that party make sure that the money is returned? I refer to the Nadir business, because the Conservative party has undoubtedly received money from a corrupt and criminal source.

Sir John Cope rose——

Madam Deputy Speaker (Dame Janet Fookes): Order. Before the Minister replies to that intervention, may I say that an extremely narrow point is being debated. I hope that it will not provide a platform for a general and irrelevant debate.

Sir John Cope: I think that the hon. Gentleman has misunderstood the point of the new clause, which is to attack not a company that profits from crime but a payment made by a company, which is not a profit but a loss as it is a payment. It refers to a payment which a company or an individual makes which itself constitutes a criminal offence. The hon. Gentleman has misunderstood the purpose of it. It is the other way round. It may be that he did not misunderstand it but was trying to make another point. If I responded to it, I would fall foul of the strictures of the Chair, and I am not prepared to do that.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved,

That provision may be made preventing expenditure involving crime being deducted or being included in expenses of management.

PETITION

Pensions (Payment)

10.39 pm

Mr. Rhodri Morgan (Cardiff, West): This petition has more than 4,000 signatures and has been collected on the street and door to door and in post offices in my constituency of Cardiff, West following the way in which pensioners and others were scandalised and put into a state of deep anxiety by the pilot project by the Department of Social Security to change the method of payment of pensions and benefits from payment via the Post Office to payment by automatic credit transfer to banks and building society accounts.

I shall read out the petition, having described it briefly. It states:

We, the undersigned wish to express our opposition to any proposals implemented by Her Majesty's Government which would result in the public not having the right to have their state pensions and benefits paid through the Post Office. We believe that the freedom to have them paid through the Post Office is vital and that the Post Office performs a central function to those who currently collect their benefits and pensions from it and that the withdrawal of this right will involve the closure of many post offices and sub post offices which are vital to communities and to the people who currently use them. We therefore request that the House of Commons urge Her Majesty's Government to withdraw its proposals and continue to allow payment of pensions and benefits through the Post Office.

To lie upon the Table.

Standish Hospital, Stroud

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Andrew Mitchell.]

10.41 pm

Mr. Roger Knapman (Stroud): I am grateful for the opportunity to initiate the debate. I apologise to you, Madam Deputy Speaker, for keeping you up half an hour longer than might otherwise be the case and hope you will forgive me. In all probability, if I had not done so somebody else would have done so.

I am also grateful to my hon. Friend the Minister for attending the debate. I am sure that, as Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health, he is a veteran of such occasions. Finally, I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, North (Mr. Thompson), the Parliamentary Private Secretary to the Minister of State. If he does not mind my referring to him as a conduit, he is a very efficient conduit in a Department where it is important that there should be close liaison between Ministers and Back Benchers, and I thank him for his efforts.

May I now voice some concern about the proposals to close Standish hospital which is situated in my constituency between Stroud and the city of Gloucester and replace it with a new extension to the Gloucestershire Royal hospital.

I will, of course, leave my hon. Friend plenty of time to respond. I know that he is always grateful for such thoughtfulness. To ensure that, I shall first make four main points so that we can concentrate on the four or five other points which may be fractionally more contentious.

First, I acknowledge that most of the medical consultants support the proposals. Anybody who has read the response to the consultation document will have the utmost regard to the comments by doctors Prior, Durkin and Uff and others which must be of concern to us all.

I also recognise that, for obvious reasons, acute provision units should, wherever possible, be on one site. I know of one particular circumstance in Gloucestershire when an elderly man was taken to Standish, suffered a heart attack and subsequently had to be taken on to Gloucestershire Royal hospital. There have been other such cases.

Thirdly, I understand that the choice between the existing Standish hospital and a new hospital is not, as some people suggested, cost cutting. If we are not to make use of the £10 million or so for capital improvements, someone else in another area will no doubt be very glad to do so.

Fourthly, we all recognise that Standish is not a community or a cottage hospital but is an acute services unit serving a large part of the county. When I visit the hospital, not least at Christmas, I meet a number of the patients there and they are just as likely to come from the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Gloucester (Mr. French) or from the Forest of Dean, represented so ably by my hon. Friend the Member for Gloucestershire, West (Mr. Marland). There are patients from large areas of the county including my constituency.

As we are all in agreement up to this point, I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will forgive me if, despite my introductory remarks, I come to the considerable level of public concern about the proposals for Standish hospital. The crux of the matter is that the general public like Standish hospital. They like it for its setting, its staff, its friendliness and its efficiency. If they have a hospital that they like and with which, in the main, they are satisfied, they want to be sure that the proposals will lead to further improvements.

Many local people and their relatives have been treated at the hospital over decades, perhaps more than one generation in some families. Most are satisfied and regard the hospital with considerable affection. The very active league of friends attests to that. I or anybody else could deposit an elderly relative at the hospital and drive away knowing that the patient would receive prompt and excellent treatment in a well-equipped and efficient unit.

Following conversations with my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary, I am grateful to him for the considerable interest that he has shown, particularly in view of his many and heavy responsibilities. He will substantially know the arguments advanced by the district health authority and the response by the community health council which has to represent the public interest and has done so well.

Having painted in the background to the matter, I wish to ask my hon. Friend a few questions which, if he cannot or will not answer tonight, I hope he will respond to later. First, I have already mentioned that the local population likes Standish. Many people can identify with a smallish unit in a rural setting, but few really like the large tower block hospitals in city centres which sometimes have parking problems.

In those circumstances, having heard the views in the consultation document of the professionals and consultants, does my hon. Friend agree that the views of the general public should also be taken into account? Does my hon. Friend agree that Standish is set in a particularly attractive rural location on an eminence overlooking the Severn valley with extensive grounds and, as one would expect from what was originally a TB hospital, a pure air? All that amounts to a considerable help to patients for their rapid recovery and recuperation.

How can one measure those benefits? Will my hon. Friend attempt to do so? That is the major point which convinced some 20,000 of my constituents, and perhaps a few beyond the boundary, under the guidance of the Save our Standish campaign, to sign a petition. I cannot say that I counted the 20,000 names, but I can confirm that that petition had no chance of fitting in the bag behind the Speaker's Chair. When we unrolled it, it broke several times and I am grateful to the House of Commons staff who deal with petitions for their forbearance for half an hour or more.

Although consultants back the proposals, not all GPs do. A local GP wrote to me as follows:

"I have been a general practitioner in Stroud for thirty-five years, during which time a great number of my patients have made use of the facilities at Standish Hospital, mostly as in patients, but, sometimes, by using the physiotherapy or hydrotherapy departments as out-patients . . . my strong impression is that Standish is highly valued because of its convenience for patients and visitors alike, its beautiful and morale boosting surroundings, the quality of its treatment, and the consistent kindness of all its staff, medical, nursing and ancillary. There have been very few complaints, if any. For local GPs, Standish has provided a much valued alternative for emergency admissions, of patients with acute respiratory disorders in particular, when other hospitals (Gloucester Royal and Stroud General) are reluctant to admit because of pressure on beds. We have been told that major surgery should not continue at Standish, because the lack of intensive care facilities makes it hazardous. It is difficult to comprehend why this should become a consideration now, after forty years of successful orthopaedic surgery. In summary, my strong impression is that Standish Hospital is highly valued by patients, their relatives, and general practitioners locally, and that its services would be greatly missed if it was closed."

I am not suggesting that all GPs think like that, but a number of GPs—and a huge section of the general public—have written in similar terms. I hope my hon. Friend will confirm that their views will be taken into account.

Will my hon. Friend give careful consideration to the community health council's report, particularly the recommendations in paragraph 3.2, under the heading "Capital Savings"? The CHC concludes:

"More consideration should be given to the Health Authority's forecast of £9·5m to transfer services, when the cost to retain services at Standish" would be only £4·8 million.

"The potential saving, on interest and capital charges, could be usefully employed in the provision of services with a higher priority."

What consideration has been given to that point? If some £4·8 million would indeed provide a first-class hospital on the existing site at Standish, would that be a suitable alternative to the present proposals? I hope that my hon. Friend will consider that carefully before any final decision is made.

I have already paid tribute to the professionalism and dedication of the hospital's staff. Will a substantial proportion of those staff—who, over the past few years, have been welded into a very successful team—be prepared to travel to the Gloucestershire Royal and work in the new unit? Can my hon. Friend confirm that all the facilities currently at Standish will be provided at the Gloucestershire Royal extension? If not, what aspects of provision will not be available? Has full agreement been reached with the consultants with regard to those facilities?

That is quite a list of questions, and I promised my hon. Friend plenty of time to reply to them. I assure him that these matters are considered to be very serious in Gloucestershire: indeed, on occasion they are considered matters of life and death. I am sure that my hon. Friend will provide for a thorough and exhaustive inquiry. I shall support him fully, because I know that he will decide the issue on medical rather than political grounds.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Mr. Tom Sackville): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Stroud (Mr. Knapman) on having secured this debate on the proposed transfer of services from Standish hospital to the Gloucestershire Royal hospital. My hon. Friend presented his case with his typical skill and demonstrated his care for his constituents' interests.

I shall set out briefly the current position on the proposal to transfer services. As my hon. Friend knows, a major review of services at Standish hospital was undertaken in 1987 by the former Gloucester health authority, in conjunction with clinicians, professionals and representatives from the Cheltenham district health authority. At that time, there were also recommendations from the Royal College of Physicians. The review recommended the reprovision of acute services at Gloucestershire Royal hospital and the subsequent closure of Standish.

My hon. Friend will know about the approval of that recommendation by the health authority and the objection of the community health council. It was passed to the regional health authority and is now in the hands of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for a decision. I assure my hon. Friend that my right hon. Friend will take full account of all the comments that she receives on the proposal before making a decision.

I am aware that Standish is a small and friendly hospital, located in an attractive setting. I am also aware—my hon. Friend mentioned this—of the activities of the league of friends which raises funds for the hospital, together with 60 or more local volunteers who provide the trolley shop and other assistance at the hospital. For all those reasons, I am sure that no health authority will take a decision lightly about a much-loved hospital.

I understand that the overriding reasons for the proposal are based on medical recommendations, some of which were mentioned by my hon. Friend. Standish has, as has been said, 120 acute beds, including orthopaedics, chest medicine and rheumatology. It has no intensive care facilities. In the event of an emergency, the patient must endure a difficult and possibly dangerous transfer to the intensive therapy unit at Gloucestershire Royal. Also, Standish is too small to have its own specialists in all the various branches of acute medicine. That requires the transfer of acutely ill patients at times to the Gloucestershire Royal. I understand that, on average, one patient a day is transferred for other services.

Another key medical reason for reproviding the current services on a site with intensive care facilities is that a much wider range of patients than is at present allowed could benefit from major joint replacements. Those patients would be those who need pre-operative intensive care stabilisation of chronic conditions followed by post-operative intensive care monitoring. The point about intensive care is particularly apt in the case of an elderly and aging population who may require a higher level of high-tech back up.

Another medical reason is that there are no medical consultants based at Standish. Therefore, they are required to visit regularly once, twice or more each week. That results in a loss of considerable and valuable time in travelling between the two sites, which is unsatisfactory.

The royal college has withdrawn and will continue to withdraw recognition for training in anaesthesia from any district hospital that allows unsupervised trainees to anaesthetise patients. In that context, "unsupervised" means any time that a consultant or senior registrar is not present in the hospital. Standish is provided with a consultant in anaesthesia for nine of its current allocation of 14 substantive sessions. When a consultant is away on leave, the replacement must be one of senior registrar or equivalent status. That is not always possible from the small department at Gloucestershire Royal hospital, where there is only one senior registrar and where a registrar with the fellowship diploma is a rarity.

An additional problem that the limited pool of medical staff at Standish makes adequate 24-hour cover difficult without requiring junior doctors to work in excess of the 63-hour maximum week. Transferring services to the Gloucestershire Royal hospital would allow the new standards for junior doctors to be met as well as providing on-site support from senior medical staff.

There can be no disagreement about the fact that Standish hospital is set in idyllic surroundings. I take my hon. Friend's point about the effect that such surroundings may have on patients, although it is, of course, impossible to measure the therapeutic effect. I must add that the question of hospital design, quite apart from architecture, is a matter of considerable concern to me and, I hope, will continue to be so to the health service. However, having said that, it must be admitted that Standish hospital is, I think, five miles from Stroud and 10 miles from Gloucester. That has some ramifications for accessibility, especially for a general hospital which attracts customers —patients—from a very wide area.

On the question of buildings and capital investment, the 1987 review, to which I have already referred, highlighted the poor condition of many of the buildings at Standish hospital, some of which date back to the early part of the previous century. One ward was in such a poor condition that it had to be replaced. The condition of the remaining estate is such that large sums of money would have to be spent to maintain the building if services remained there for very much longer.

I very much appreciate what my hon. Friend said about the level of public concern. Standish hospital is clearly much loved, and there is considerable local feeling about it. If I were given the choice, I should want to be treated in a small hospital in attractive, rural surroundings. However, that is an ideal, and one which unfortunately cannot always be met in the real world.

My hon. Friend mentioned clinicians. There is widespread agreement among consultants about the proposals, although many local general practitioners, who would like to continue to send their patients to Standish hospital, may have a different view.

It is not merely a question of spending a certain sum of money on Standish hospital. To keep some acute services on a relatively isolated site is not desirable or cost effective, and that is all that could be achieved as a result of minor reprovision at Standish. Services at Standish would, in the longer term, need the full support of a district general hospital. As I said, there are a number of difficulties in providing the 24-hour medical cover at Standish. It would be impractical and probably prohibitively expensive for the local health service as a whole to base staff at Standish to provide such a level of cover. I have already touched on the argument about untrained anaesthetists, and the impossibility of allowing them to be in sole charge of anaesthetised patients.

My hon. Friend also asked whether all the facilities now available at Standish could be provided at the Gloucestershire Royal. The answer to that question is definitely yes. I am assured that all patient services could be provided at that site, and at a higher technical and clinical standard.

As I have said, I appreciate the opportunity to make those points, especially as the matter is now before the Secretary of State for a decision. My right hon. Friend has yet to decide the future of the hospital, but I thought that it would be helpful to explain the thinking behind the district and regional health authorities' decision to put the proposals forward. I am fully aware of the strength of feeling about the hospital on the part of my hon. Friend and of local residents, and I reiterate that the Secretary of State will pay close attention to the views of all those involved, including the community health council and all other interested parties, before reaching any decision.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at five minutes past Eleven o'clock.

Oral Answers to Questions

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Resident Diplomats

1. Mr. Jacques Arnold: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if he will make a statement on the value of locally resident diplomatic representation.

The Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Douglas Hurd): Our diplomatic representatives provide access and influence in order to further the United Kingdom's interests in the political, commercial, economic and other fields. They enhance the security and prosperity of this country and provide a wide-ranging service to British citizens abroad.

Mr. Arnold: Following the successful development of co-ordination between the Department of Trade and Industry and the Foreign and Commonwealth Office in supporting British exporters, would not it be extremely unfortunate and counter-productive to reduce the number of our missions abroad, particularly when we are having to put such effort into increasing British exports?

Mr. Hurd: It is increasingly clear to those who follow these matters that diplomacy, the work that I have just described, and trade promotion are intertwined and that, in more and more of our markets, Governments set the rules and, in many cases, award the contracts, so orders are not obtained without knowing the politics and the politicians—and that is not achieved with a fax machine.

Mr. Hain: Does the Foreign Secretary agree that British businesses and expatriates in Nigeria need the protection of the Nigerian high commission under the excellent leadership of Sir Christopher MacRae? I hope that that praise will not prejudice Sir Christopher's career prospects. One of the commission's officials accompanied four Members of Parliament to observe the presidential elections on Saturday, the results of which I hope will be upheld as they were, by and large, free and fair.

Mr. Hurd: I am grateful to my hon. Friend—[Interruption.]—the hon. Gentleman. He was so polite that my tongue slipped. That exercise went well and I am glad that the high commission was able to give some help. Nigeria will remain a huge market. It illustrates the point that I have just made. During the past year, British exports have increased by 22 per cent. and I hope that a smooth movement back to civilian rule will help them, too.

Mr. Colvin: Will my right hon. Friend acknowledge that probably the most important diplomatic representatives that Britain has abroad at this difficult time in international affairs is our permanent representative at the United Nations? Will he take this opportunity to pay tribute to Sir David Hannay for the work that he does and confirm that it is extremely important that the United Kingdom retains its seat as a permanent member of the Security Council?

Mr. Hurd: That is our intention. Sir David Hannay sets a vigorous lead in all that he does at the United Nations.

Mr. Rogers: Is not the Secretary of State being a little economical with the facts in his answer? Is not it true that not only are the number of missions being cut but the Treasury has instructed the Foreign Office to cut the number of staff in embassies? In some important embassies —for instance, in north America—the number of staff dealing with trade and exports is being cut, while staff who deal with media and presentation are being retained. Is not that another example of the Government's policy of being all presentation and no substance?

Mr. Hurd: I have had no instructions from the Treasury in these matters. We are just entering discussions on the public expenditure round. We have had to open posts in many of the 20 new countries that have come into being in the past two or three years and that has meant retrenching in other places. This is a matter of setting priorities.

Mr. Wilkinson: I accept that it is necessary to have as comprehensive a representation around the world as possible, for the excellent growth reasons which were given by my hon. Friend the Member for Gravesham (Mr. Arnold) and reinforced by my right hon. Friend's answer. Does not my right hon. Friend agree, however, that it is better to concentrate rather more on farther-flung places than on the EEC? In that context, will he reconsider the withdrawal of British defence attachées from Quito and Manila who play an important role in addition to the commercially and locally recruited personnel?

Mr. Hurd: Defence attachés are not a matter for me, but we do review the size of staff at bigger embassies. In the past few years, we have cut the size of staff by seven in Paris, six in Bonn and 17 in Washington. Diplomacy inside the Community is crucial. For example, our representatives in Community posts are currently preparing for the Copenhagen summit—warding off developments that we would not like and encouraging developments that we do like. That exercise is important for the summit's success.

East Timor

2. Mr. Kilfoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what action he is taking to protect human rights in East Timor.

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. Alastair Goodlad): Together with our European Community partners and bilaterally, we maintain a regular dialogue on human rights with the Indonesian authorities and raise particular issues—including East Timor—with them as necessary. European Community partners co-sponsored a resolution on East Timor at the United Nations Commission on Human Rights in Geneva earlier this year.

Mr. Kilfoyle: Fine words, but since the invasion and occupation of East Timor in 1979, one in three of its population has died and Indonesia has been in breach of two Security Council resolutions and eight General Assembly resolutions. Is not it wholly unacceptable for the Foreign Secretary and the Secretary of State for Defence to visit Indonesia and to give both political and material support to a regime whose record is on a par with that of Pol Pot in Cambodia?

Mr. Goodlad: Neither my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Defence nor my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs has visited East Timor. Maintaining good relations with Indonesia, which is the chairman of the non-aligned movement and an important member of the Association of South-East Asian Nations, is much the best way of increasing its observance of human rights.

Mr. Nicholls: Whatever may have been Indonesia's human rights record over the years, it has improved a great deal—but instead of the regime being given credit for that, wildly exaggerated attacks are made by Opposition Members. Instead of indulging in the wild exaggeration that we have just heard from the hon. Member for Liverpool, Walton (Mr. Kilfoyle), would not the interests of the people of Indonesia and of this country be better served if the regime were given credit for the real steps that it is taking to improve the situation?

Mr. Goodlad: My hon. Friend makes some extremely valid points. As I said, our best chance of helping to improve human rights in Indonesia and for many in East Timor is through the processes that we undertake.

Angola

3. Mr. Enright: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent discussions he has held in the Foreign Affairs Council concerning Angola.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Mark Lennox-Boyd): Angola was discussed at the Development Council on 25 May.

Mr. Enright: I am sure that the Minister is well aware that more than 1 million Angolans have been displaced as a result of the war in that country and that the Angolan Government have bent over backwards to bring Dr. Savimbi into the Government, yet he continues to terrorise Angola in the way that the former Yugoslavia is being terrorised. Will the Minister, with all possible haste and urgency, stress on the Council the need for a course of immediate action to assist the Angolan Government—possibly involving the four other Lusophone countries?

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: I join the hon. Gentleman in condemning UNITA's action in rejecting the result of the election last September, which was judged by the United Nations special representative, Miss Margaret Anstee, as being generally free and fair. I give the hon. Gentleman an assurance that the European Council will discuss at next week's meeting in Copenhagen the problems of Angola, which are firmly on the agenda.

Mr. Grocott: Will the Minister be a little forthcoming? Since last year's elections, upwards of 20,000 people have been killed and—as my hon. Friend the Member for Hemsworth (Mr. Enright) said, more than 1 million have lost their homes. The situation in Angola poses a real threat to the international community as well as being a tragedy for Angola's people. Does the Minister acknowledge that UNITA is in breach of Security Council resolution 785, which clearly states that any party that fails to abide by the peace agreement will be rejected and isolated by the international community? What steps is he taking through the international community to ensure that UNITA is diplomatically and militarily isolated?

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: Clearly, the hon. Gentleman is right. We must all put pressure on UNITA, and this afternoon the House is providing the opportunity to do precisely that. The fact remains, however, that a resolution of the problems in Angola must involve a dialogue between UNITA and the Angolan Government. There is no other way in which peace can be brought to end the dreadful problem.

Exports Promotion

4. Mr. Patrick Thompson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how his Department contributes to promotion of British exports overseas.

Mr. Goodlad: The overseas trade services jointly provided by the Foreign and Commonwealth Office and the Department of Trade and Industry offer a comprehensive range of expert advice and support to British exporters through commercial sections in 196 posts world wide.

Mr. Thompson: Bearing in mind the Government's declared support for a major export drive, which must be sustained to ensure continuing recovery, and the apparent lack of interest shown in the subject by the Opposition —when only one of their members was able to attend a full-scale debate on the subject on 21 May—will my right hon. Friend assure the House that sufficient priority, expertise and resources will be given by the Foreign and Commonwealth Office to posts overseas to meet the export challenge?

Mr. Goodlad: British exporters have told us unequivocally, and in public, that they value highly the commercial work which is undertaken by the diplomatic service and to which my hon. Friend alludes so graphically and accurately. That is, of course, the Foreign and Commonwealth Office's largest single activity overseas. It is our aim to ensure that the service continues to have the resources necessary to enable heads of mission and their staff to maintain their commercially proactive role and to meet the demands made on them by exporters, directly and via the enhanced overseas trade services in this country.

Rev. Martin Smyth: How many embassies use their own property to entertain or to present exhibitions of British manufacturing and exporters' interests, as happened quite successfully a few years ago in Paris?

Mr. Goodlad: I think that practically all of them carry out those functions. The British embassy in Paris is using its premises to launch the new Rover model this year. I agree with the hon. Gentleman that that is an extremely important use for our overseas estate.

Sir Teddy Taylor: Would my right hon. Friend be willing to carry out a special inquiry into the failure of his Department and other agencies to match exports to the European Community with imports? Will he bear it very much in mind that this month we have broken the barrier of the £1 billion deficit since our membership? Is not that a chronic failure which is doing great damage to the British economy and to jobs and prosperity?

Mr. Goodlad: The export services to which I referred have made an enormous contribution to ensuring that our exports to the European Community have been as healthy as they have.

Yugoslavia

5. Mr. Hutton: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement about the implementation of Security Council resolution 808 on a war crimes tribunal for the former Yugoslavia.

Mr. Hurd: United Nations Security Council resolution 827, which was adopted unanimously on 25 May, gave effect to the earlier decision in the resolution referred to in the question—808—to establish an international tribunal for former Yugoslavia. The latest resolution asks the Secretary-General to make practical arrangements for the effective functioning of the tribunal as soon as possible. We support that.

Mr. Hutton: What further practical measures will the Government take to support the work of the war crimes tribunal? In particular, might any person convicted of war crimes by the tribunal eventually be detained in British gaols? Will the right hon Gentleman also confirm that the jurisdiction of the war crimes tribunal will apply to everyone within the territories of the former Yugoslavia, including the military and civilian leaders of all the warring groups in that country?

Mr. Hurd: The answer to the last question is yes, and the answer to the second question about British prisons is that I do not believe that we are likely to make such an offer. However, we shall support the Secretary-General in establishing the three chambers of the tribunal and working out where they should sit, which I hope and think will be in The Hague. We shall also give him general support.

Mr. William Powell: I thank my right hon. Friend for the support that the British Government have given to resolution 827 and to the measures that preceded it, which have led to the establishment of the tribunal. Is he aware that the nature of the evidence that could be presented against any potential defendant is likely to be driven by witnesses rather than by a paper chase through the archives and that it is therefore essential for a special prosecutor to be established as quickly as possible, so that the evidence that could be presented to a court is not lost through further delay? Will my right hon. Friend support the Secretary-General if he chooses to accept the advice given to him by nearly every member of the United Nations and recommends Professor Cherif Bassiouni as the special prosecutor? My right hon. Friend will recall that I took Professor Bassiouni to see my right hon. and learned Friend the Minister of State at the Foreign Office a fortnight ago.

Mr. Hurd: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his expert interest in the matter. I will pursue his point about the individual, and I agree that it is necessary to establish a special prosecutor as soon as possible. Meanwhile, as my hon. Friend certainly knows, there is already a commission of experts siting evidence, and that will continue at least until a special prosecutor is established.

Mr. Winnick: Does the Foreign Secretary accept that if, despite what he has told the House, those who have been responsible for the terrible crimes against humanity in former Yugoslavia are not brought to justice, that will encourage the continuation of such crimes and atrocities time and again? Does he also accept that the framework established at Nuremburg after the second world war is a good framework within which to try people held responsible for such crimes against humanity?

Mr. Hurd: We now have a new framework, and it is for the Secretary-General to fill in the details. That will not be easy for him, and the House should not underestimate the difficulties, but the reason for the exercise is that which the hon. Gentleman stated in the first part of his question.

Middle East

6. Sir Ivan Lawrence: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what progress has been made in the search for a peace settlement in the middle east.

Mr. Hurd: Another round of bilateral negotiations between the parties is beginning in Washington this week. There were some encouraging signs at the end of the last round in May that the Israelis and Palestinians were beginning to discuss detail and substance. We continue to urge all parties to work for further progress.

Sir Ivan Lawrence: Does my right hon. Friend not agree that the Arab states are holding up the search for peace by refusing to accede to his request at the Group of Seven conference in London that they stop the iniquitous Arab trade boycott? As the Government's attitude was that if there were a consensus for Community legislation, we should not oppose that and, as France, Holland and Germany have now initiated legislation against the boycott, will my right hon. Friend kindly consider taking more active steps to stop companies such as ICI cravenly obeying the boycott?

Mr. Hurd: I do not think that the experience of national legislation in other countries suggests that it has a powerful effect. It is largely declaratory and is difficult to enforce, so our course is the right one. Rather than legislating in this country, we seek to urge the Arabs to wind up the boycott. There has been some progress in the Gulf countries in that respect, as my hon. Friend knows —not enough progress, but the Kuwaitis, for example, have reportedly announced the abandonment of the application of the boycott to third countries. We will pursue the matter. The boycott is not the only obstacle to peace, but it is one.

Mr. Ernie Ross: I am sure that the Secretary of State would agree that the greatest obstacle to peace at the moment is the weight of the occupation on the Palestinian population now locked up in Gaza and the west bank as a result of decisions by the Israeli Government. It does not really help to talk about a trade boycott when the producers in Gaza and the west bank cannot sell what they produce in their factories or on their land. If the hon. and learned Member for Burton (Sir I. Lawrence) really wanted to help, he would urge that those barriers, and some of the other repressive measures currently "enjoyed" by—or rather, pressed on—the Palestinians, be lifted. That would be a significant boost to the peace talks.

Mr. Hurd: I sometimes think that it would be an excellent thing if people such as the hon. Member for Dundee, West (Mr. Ross), who favour the Palestinian cause, would occasionally condemn the boycott, and people such as my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Burton, who usually put questions from the other point of view, would urge the Israelis to do something to ease the burdens of the occupation. If the partisans—or rather, as that is a pejorative word, the advocates—of each cause occasionally used their influence and talents to urge better action on those whom they generally support, we might make more progress. Both those steps are needed.

Mr. John Marshall: Does my right hon. Friend agree that two of the barriers to peace in the middle east are the refusal of Arab states to recognise Israel and the refusal of the Arab captors to release Israeli hostages who have been held for many years, such as Ron Arad?

Mr. Hurd: That is another fair point, but it needs to be balanced by the handling of the deportee question by the Israeli Government. The Arab countries that are still technically at war with Israel are not far off negotiating a change, but I doubt whether they will conclude peace with Israel until there is a settlement between the Israelis and the Palestinians. That is the most difficult aspect of those negotiations, but it can be helped by confidence-building measures, such as an end to the Arab boycott and the easing of the conditions of occupation.

Dr. John Cunningham: The Foreign Secretary is right to urge people to play the role of forming a bridge in the difficult negotiations for peace in the middle east, Israel and the occupied territories. I certainly support him in that appeal. Since Britain has a somewhat peripheral role in those matters, may I urge the right hon. Gentleman to make it clear to the United States of America that it, too, should be evenhanded in the conduct of the current peace talks in Washington? Is not it rather depressing that the talks have recommenced on the basis of bilateral discussions rather than all the parties being around the table together? Has the right hon. Gentleman received any approaches from the Israeli Government or the Palestinians, either directly or through the European Community, for Europe to play a part in the economic reconstruction and rehabilitation of the occupied territories; if so, what response has been made? If the right hon. Gentleman has had such an approach, will he seek an initiative of that nature?

Mr. Hurd: We take a part, through the Community, in the multilateral side of the negotiations, which is precisely concerned with matters such as water and economic development.

On the right hon. Gentleman's first point, there have to be bilateral negotiations between Arab countries and Israel, between Palestine and Israel and so forth. We had a good run through the subject with the American Secretary of State in Luxembourg last week and I believe that the United States Administration are pressing ahead with the negotiations in the right way.

Mr. Clappison: My right hon. Friend is absolutely right in his insistence on the need for evenhandedness, but does he agree that evenhandedness has not been achieved under the Arab boycott, because at the 1991 conference the issue of the boycott was linked to the issue of Israel freezing settlements? Although Israel has made progress on that, substantial equivalent progress has not been made on the Arab side.

Mr. Hurd: There has been progress in ending settlements. My hon. Friend chose his word rightly—it is progress, not an end to the building of settlements, which are still going up in some places. We believe that that should be ended and the occupation eased. Equally, we shall continue to press hard for an ending of the Arab boycott.

Cuba

7. Mr. Pickthall: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement about British relations with Cuba.

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. David Heathcoat-Amory): Relations with Cuba are correct.

Mr. Pickthall: The Under-Secretary of State was good enough to give me an encouraging answer to a written question on the subject on 27 April, at column 363, in which he said that the American boycott of trade with Cuba would not have any practical effect on British emergency aid to Cuba. Will the Government take that a step further? They will know that the combination of severe storms and the American blockade is causing severe distress in Cuba. They may not know that Cuban schools and colleges are pleading with Britain for books in English and for other educational aids. Will the Government use their good offices to pressurise the American Government to lift what the hon. and learned Member for Burton (Sir I. Lawrence) called an iniquitous trade boycott?

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: We gave some emergency aid to Cuba earlier this year following the storms and the delivery of that aid was not hindered in any practical way by the United States embargo. The Cuban economy is on the verge of ruin not because of the American embargo but because of 30 years of imposed state communism.

Mr. Oppenheim: My hon. Friend must accept that that is not good enough. The Government must strive to establish and maintain more open and fruitful relations with countries such as Cuba and North Korea, so that more people may be made aware of the glowing achievements of those remaining—although admittedly beleaguered—beacons of socialism and central planning. Would not that at least make more people aware that, although free market systems may not be perfect, they are a hell of a lot less imperfect than the central planning and socialism in countries such as Cuba?

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: My hon. Friend makes a fair point. Cuba provides a laboratory example of a socialist state gone wrong. We maintain diplomatic and trading links with Cuba, but our relations can improve only if the Cubans hold free and fair elections and respect human rights.

Western Sahara

8. Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made to the UN concerning the preparations for a referendum on the future of Western Sahara.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: We maintain regular contact with the United Nations Secretary-General through our permanent representative concerning the implementation of the UN settlement plan.

Mr. Corbyn: Is the Minister aware that, for a long time, the Sahrawi people have been denied the right to live peacefully on their own land? Methods employed by the Moroccan Government in attempting to impose an electorate in advance of a UN-sponsored referendum would guarantee an outcome favourable to King Hassan. Is not it time for this country and others to stand up in support of UN resolutions 658 and 690 to ensure that the Sahrawi people get a free and unfettered voice in a referendum and not one dominated by the Moroccan military? Failure to do so will lead to a reopening of hostilities, a terrible loss of life and a further blow to the prestige of the UN. Will the Government act to ensure that those people have a free voice?

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: We very much wish to see the referendum take place. As the hon. Gentleman knows, the UN Secretary-General has just visited Morocco and Western Sahara and we are awaiting his report which is expected in the next few weeks. We believe that he will address the resolution of some of the problems of representation in the referendum. I expect that the Government will be supporting the Secretary-General when we have read the terms of his report.

Sir David Steel: Does the Minister agree that there have at least been some tentative signs of compromise between the Polisario and the Moroccan Government? Should not we, as a permanent member of the United Nations Security Council, encourage that and, for that reason, will the Foreign Office lift the ban on Ministers meeting the Polisario? We were late to do so in the cases of the African National Congress and the Palestine Liberation Organisation—let us not be too late again.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: The way forward is to support the Secretary-General. The Polisario and the Moroccan representative will be in Vienna during the world human rights conference and will be meeting the Secretary-General. Our best contact with the Polisario is in that way rather than by ministerial contact, because we shall be supporting the Secretary-General's recommendations.

Mr. Gill: Why are the Government in favour of a referendum in Africa but not in Great Britain?

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: My hon. Friend knows full well that the situation in the Western Sahara is compeletely different. It involves the resolution of an ancient problem in which we wish to see the representation of people who have no Parliament.

Kashmir

9. Mr. Canavan: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent discussions he has had about the situation in Kashmir; and if he will make a statement.

13. Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions he has had with the Indian Government on the present position in Kashmir; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs most recently discussed Kashmir with the Indian Vice-President on 25 May during his visit to London.

Mr. Canavan: More than 20,000 Kashmiris have been killed and thousands more imprisoned and tortured by Indian forces over the past three years. Will the Government use their influence, particularly through the Commonwealth and the United Nations, to try to get the Indian and Pakistani Governments to reach an agreement whereby more respect is given to the human rights of the people of Kashmir? That agreement could also give the Kashmiri people the right to self-determination, leading possibly to the establishment of an independent state of Kashmir if that is what the people want.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: I can certainly agree that the resolution of that ancient and difficult problem must require dialogue between India and the Pakistan Government—that we urge. We wish to be as helpful as we can. We have certainly made it absolutely clear to the Indians that we are concerned about human rights. In fact, the Indians have initiated legislation to set up an independent human rights commission. But the way forward must be by dialogue between the two factions.

Mr. Cox: The Minister referred to a meeting. What was the response of the Indian Minister to allowing an all-party group of hon. Members to visit the occupied area of Kashmir? In view of the point made by my right hon. Friend the Member for Copeland (Mr. Cunningham), will the Minister give an indication of what progress the Prime Minister is making? In a letter to me in April, he clearly indicated that he would welcome Kashmir being on the agenda of the Commonwealth Heads of Government conference in Cyprus later this year, because Pakistan and India would be at that conference.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: As for visiting Kashmir, the hon. Gentleman must take up his case with the Indian high commissioner. For my part, I believe that it is helpful that there should be visits to that part of the world. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister raised the problems of Kashmir with the Indian Prime Minister in January and with the Indian Vice-President when he visited Britain in May. My right hon. Friend made his views quite clear on both occasions and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and I do so as well.

Sir John Wheeler: My hon. Friend will know that there is great concern among hon. Members about human rights in Indian-held Kashmir. Will he confirm that the solution to that long-standing problem must arise from negotiations between the two countries concerned, India and Pakistan, under the Simla agreement? Will he continue to bring to the attention of those countries, in particular India, our concern about human rights and the fact that the United Kingdom will be available to help both countries should they so wish such assistance?

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: Should both countries seek our support, we will always be willing and ready to give it. An important point that should be made when discussing the human rights problem in Kashmir is that the criticism that is expressed in the House is often mirrored—indeed initiated—by criticism in the Indian Parliament, from the Indian press and, of course, from Indian human rights organisations, all of which express their concern as well.

Mr. Waller: Will my hon. Friend confirm that the Simla agreement which India and Pakistan signed involves a commitment to start talking about Kashmir, which unfortunately at present the Indian Government appear to be unwilling to commit themselves to doing? Will my hon. Friend use every opportunity to reiterate to the Indian Government that it is unreasonable to exclude from Jammu and Kashmir independent observers such as British Members of Parliament and representatives of Amnesty International and that, short of such acceptance of independent visitors, India's reputation for human rights must be subject to the deepest scrutiny?

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: My hon. Friend has expressed his opinion. Obviously, contact between the Indian Prime Minister and the Pakistan Prime Minister is highly desirable. They last met at the non-aligned summit in Dhaka in April this year and I hope that they will have future meetings.

Mr. Madden: Will the Minister press the Indian Government to publish the names of the 52,000 people held in India, including Kashmir, without trial? Will he also advise his counterparts at the Home Office that, in view of India's appalling human rights record and the numbers held in detention without trial, now is not the time to invite the British House of Commons to pass orders approving the extradition treaty between Britain and India?

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: I am surprised that the hon. Gentleman is suggesting that we should not have proper arrangements for the extradition of terrorist offenders. There will be the usual safeguards in the extradition treaty provisions which are presented to the House of Commons and the House of Lords. The person in question will have to be brought before Bow Street magistrates court. The court must be satisfied that he will not be prejudiced because of his political opinions. The Home Secretary makes the final decision, which is subject to judicial review. Therefore, there is a great deal of protection for anyone who is brought into the proceedings.

Bosnia

10. Lady Olga Maitland: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions he has had with Mr. Slobodan Milosevic regarding Bosnia.

Mr. Hurd: I have had no discussion with President Milosevic on Bosnia since the London conference in August 1992. However, we ensure that he is kept fully abreast of our views.

Lady Olga Maitland: Will my right hon. Friend join me in condemning the vicious and brutal attack ordered by Mr. Milosevic on the Serbian opposition leader, Mr. Vuk Draskovic, during the anti-Government demonstrations in Belgrade? Is he aware that there is serious concern about the health of Mr. Draskovic, who is now in prison? He has suffered a broken jaw and a broken arm and has serious head injuries and he can neither walk nor speak. I urge my right hon. Friend to seek his immediate release. Does my right hon. Friend agree that that is another example of the loathsome character of Mr. Milosevic, who seeks to promote ethnic cleansing in Bosnia, and another example of a fascist dictator?

Mr. Hurd: The Prime Minister, responding to the sort of anxiety expressed by my hon. Friend, sent a strong message to President Milosevic impressing on him the need for the release of Mr. Draskovic and his wife and for them to be given full access to visitors and medical treatment in the meantime. My hon. Friend is right—this is a cruel step backwards in the wrong direction so far as Serbia is concerned.

Mr. Faulds: In any future conversations with this leading war criminal Milosevic, what will the right hon. Gentleman suggest as to the practicality of the restoration of the territorial integrity of Bosnia, which has clearly been abandoned in the Washington agreement to which he shamefully put his name and that of this country?

Mr. Hurd: The hon. Gentleman cannot have read the agreement as it specifically refers to the need for Serb withdrawal from the territories that they have seized.

Sir Anthony Durant: In view of the increasingly dangerous situation in Bosnia, will my right hon. Friend ensure that British troops are withdrawn if circumstances become so impossible that they are unable to carry on with their humanitarian aid?

Mr. Hurd: Yes. At the moment, our troops, as well as French, Spanish and other troops in different parts of Bosnia, are helping to keep people alive in two ways: by escorting convoys which continue to deliver supplies and, by their presence, averting the sort of massacre that would probably follow if they were withdrawn. So long as that is true and there is no undue risk to them, they should stay. But my hon. Friend is right—if the situation deteriorated further to the point at which we and others felt that the risk had become undue, they would have to be withdrawn. The steps that the Ministry of Defence announced last week to the House were formulated in that context.

Dr. John Cunningham: Is not the Washington agreement on Bosnia deeply flawed? Did not it give, intentionally or otherwise, a clear signal to the Serbs that their aggression would be rewarded with extra territory? Has not President Milosevic been emboldened by continuing weakness on the part of the European Community and did not that result in the imprisonment and torture of Mr. Draskovic and his wife Danica? Is not it time for the European Community and our other allies to say once and for all that we will take whatever action is required to ensure that the decisions of the Security Council of the United Nations and the Community are upheld in Bosnia?

Mr. Hurd: The advice "Something must be done" is the least useful that can be given in these circumstances. The right hon. Gentleman paraphrased that advice and made it a bit longer, but that is really what he said. The hon. Member for Warley, East (Mr. Faulds) alleged that the Washington statement accepted Serb aggression. I pointed out that that was not so. The pressures for reversing that aggression are political, economic and financial. Those who believe that it would be right to send our troops and other troops to enforce a military solution should say so, not take refuge in the sort of rhetoric which is an obstacle to reality.

NATO Information Budget

11. Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the current United Kingdom contribution to the NATO information budget; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The information budget of the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation for this year amounts to about £4 million, of which the United Kingdom contributes 18 per cent.—currently about £750,000.

Mr. Greenway: Does my hon. Friend agree that it is clear that, despite the ending of the cold war, NATO has a continuing, perhaps increasing, role? What is being done to explain that role more widely?

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: I agree that NATO is a successful collective security pact and we shall not throw it away in what is still a dangerous world. Its role is changing following the end of the cold war. It is developing a new role and it is important that it should explain that role to the public, not just in this country, but in the former Warsaw pact countries, which are keen that the stability that we have enjoyed in western Europe under NATO should be extended to them.

Mr. Cryer: Was not NATO established because of an alleged threat from the east, led by the Soviet Union? Now that that threat has disappeared, even among Tory imaginations, is not it time that we abandoned the massive expenditure on NATO and worked towards its break-up to equate with the ending of the Warsaw pact? Surely that would be a step towards peace. To maintain NATO on the ridiculous presumption that there is some danger somewhere is a waste of money and the maintenance of a useless and outdated empire.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: That threat to western Europe was real, even if the dinosaurs on the Labour Benches never recognised it. As I said in my first response, NATO's role is changing and there are opportunities for NATO troops to help with peacekeeping operations. We have seen NATO planes enforcing the no-fly zone in Bosnia. Just because the cold war has ended does not mean that NATO's role is less important.

Subsidiarity

12. Mr. Fabricant: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what plans he has to consider legislation passed since 1986 for possible amendment or repeal on the grounds of subsidiarity and unsuitability for the United Kingdom, after the Brussels European Council of December 1993.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: We are discussing with the Commission and member states action to ensure that subsidiarity is made to work in practice and that legislation is amended or repealed where necessary. The Commission has been instructed to present the outcome of its review on the subject at Brussels in December.

Mr. Fabricant: Will my hon. Friend undertake to double and redouble his efforts to apply subsidiarity not only prospectively but retrospectively after the Brussels summit? If he finds difficulty in applying the principle retrospectively because there is no mechanism to do so, will my hon. Friend work with his European colleagues to try to find such a mechanism?

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: As a matter of law, the subsidiarity clause in the Maastricht treaty is not retrospective—the House respects that principle in its own legislation. But the Edinburgh Council agreed that the Commission should examine existing legislation with a view to amending or repealing it if it conflicted with the principle of subsidiarity or minimum interference, as it should perhaps be called. As a Government, we are looking at the European statute book with the same end in mind.

Mr. Barnes: If the Government like what the European Community is doing they say that it is in line with the principle of subsidiarity. If they dislike what is being done they claim that it contravenes the principle of subsidiarity and that matters should be determined at national level. Therefore, the principle means anything that anybody wants it to. Would not it be better to have greater control over the activities of the Council of Ministers, which is supposed to decide whether subsidiary operates? It would help the House if the voting records of the Council of Ministers were systematically printed in Hansard when reports are made of Council meetings. In response to me, the Prime Minister said that that would be done, but it is not being done. Can we ensure that all Departments act on that issue in future? In fact, there are never any votes taken in Council meetings because, even when matters are to be decided by qualified majority voting, they are always passed on the nod.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The principle of subsidiarity applies to all the institutions of the EC—not just to the Commission and the Parliament, but to the Council of Ministers. Under Maastricht, it will be a legally binding principle, ultimately enforceable at law. But in order to make it a binding principle we first need to ratify the treaty. I should be grateful if the hon. Gentleman would assist us with that process.

Mr. Dykes: Is my hon. Friend aware that we welcome his cautious approach as outlined in response to the original question? As the 1986 legislation was mostly to do with the implementation of the single market, based on majority voting, and pursued for the most part by this Government, the question of subsidiarity did not arise as much as people might now think. Does he agree that the amount of legislation coming from the Commission is in any case much less than hitherto?

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Even before the treaty has been ratified the Commission is respecting the principle of subsidiarity. That has led to a noticeable reduction in the number of instruments that it proposes. But we are also anxious to look back at existing legislation because, despite what my hon. Friend says, there have been some breaches of the principle in that legislation and we wish to amend or appeal it as appropriate.

Mr. George Robertson: May I take this opportunity of welcoming the new Minister to the Dispatch Box? He is the 24th Foreign Office Minister whom I have sat opposite, so I advise him not to get too comfortable or he will go the same way as the rest of them did.

Does not the distinct smell of deceit and hypocrisy come from the Government when they talk about subsidiarity, openness and transparency? What they champion is usually the precise opposite of what they practise. For instance, why, last week, did the new Minister go along with the deliberate decision by the Council of Ministers not to publish voting figures for Council meetings? That was not only in breach of what my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, North-East (Mr. Barnes) was told in a parliamentary answer, but in direct breach of what the Danish people were told. This new Minister actually proposed that the European ombudsman should not have access to correspondence between the Council of Ministers and the European Commission, thereby undermining the principle of openness.

Is not it a fact that the Minister, who was the Deputy Chief Whip, is taking into Europe the same old bad habits of that secret society, the Tory Whips Office, when what the people of Europe want is an open, accountable Community?

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his kind welcome. I was indeed privileged to be in the Whips Office for the past year, where I tried to rescue the Maastricht treaty from the political manoeuvrings of the hon. Gentleman—culminating in that heroic abstention on Third Reading.

I entirely reject the idea that the Government take the view that proceedings should be anything less than open and helpful. The hon. Gentleman entirely misunderstands what happened last week in Luxembourg. We said, and we received support from all other member states, that the powers of the future European ombudsman should, in this respect, be the same as those of our own ombudsman—powers which work well in respect of access to secret and confidential documents.

It was a matter of great regret that the European Parliament used that excuse not to agree to extend the subsidiarity principle to its own proceedings.

Macedonia

14. Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on relations between the United Kingdom and the republic of Macedonia.

Mr. Hurd: We gave full support to the admission of the former Yugoslav republic of Macedonia to the United Nations on 8 April, thereby implicitly recognising the country as an independent foreign state. We now have a British presence in Skopje. I visited the country on 4 June and held talks with President Gligorov and acting Foreign Minister Crvenkovski.

Mr. Lidington: I thank my right hon. Friend for that reply. Will he join me in welcoming the reported decision by the United States to deploy American troops on the frontiers between Macedonia and her neighbours to try to prevent border incursions? Does he agree that it might be a good idea if one or two European countries that have declined to contribute their troops to the humanitarian effort in Bosnia and have instead chosen to carp from the sidelines considered following that American example?

Mr. Hurd: The Americans were following the European example in this respect. A Nordic battalion—Swedes, Norwegians and, I think, Finns and Danes—is already established in Macedonia. I hope that the mandates of both the Scandinavians and the Americans now joining can be interpreted or enlarged in such a way that they will be able to help the Macedonians to enforce sanctions. There is no doubt that the main breach of sanctions is now taking place through Macedonia. For the reasons that have already been discussed, it is extremely important that the economic and financial pressures on Serbia should be made effective.

Mr. Skinner: Will the Foreign Secretary, in his discussions with all the people concerned with these matters, remind them that they had better not take a blind bit of notice of what the Liberal Democrats and their leader say on the subject? Three months ago the leader of the Liberal Democrats wanted to bomb the hell out of Serbia and to send in more troops, yet, to a thin House last Friday morning, he said that the troops should be pulled out.

Mr. Hurd: I have read in Hansard the hon. Gentleman's remarks about what the leader of the Liberal Democratic party said last Friday and I agree with them. Will he please continue to monitor the right hon. Gentleman?

Mr. Churchill: While we must all hope that the bloodshed in Bosnia will not spill over into Macedonia, may I ask my right hon. Friend whether Her Majesty's Government will ensure that we do not see in Macedonia a repetition of the declaration of safe havens which has been so disastrous in the case of Bosnia, where there was no evident United Nations determination to deploy forces to make areas safe? Have not these safe havens been just a cruel deception, which has undermined the authority of the United Nations?

Mr. Hurd: Safe havens are an attempt to save people's lives. We started with humanitarian convoys. Then we moved on, despite considerable scepticism. Some European countries provided troops to escort the convoys and enable them to get through. We are seeking to move to the stage of making places safe, but that depends on a Security Council resolution—there is such a resolution—on a degree of local agreement and on the provision of more troops. What is necessary cannot be done without more troops. We are doing our bit, as are the French. Success relies on more countries coming forward in response to the Secretary-General's appeal and some countries are coming forward. Some Scandinavian countries are responding and the Secretary-General is now putting the list together. The greater the number of troops that can be brought in, the safer the areas will become and the more likely it will be that some reality will emerge from the rhetoric of which my hon. Friend complains.

Mr. Connarty: Does the Secretary of State realise how ironic it is that he should be talking about Macedonia in the same terms as about Bosnia? We recognise Bosnia. Is not everyone worried that when Croatia and Serbia have carved up Bosnia, they will turn to other targets? The shame that we shall have to wade through will be similar to what we have done in Bosnia and what is happening in Croatia. In fact, we may find ourselves throwing paper at the antagonists, as the right hon. Gentleman says has been done in the case of the Washington agreement. We should be talking about putting together a peace-making force to guarantee Macedonia's boarders. At the moment, all that we have is a few troops from a few countries.

Mr. Hurd: The position in Macedonia is different. The hon. Gentleman will agree that the great majority—about 90 per cent.—of those fighting in Bosnia are Bosnians. They are helped and encouraged from outside, particularly from Serbia. There is no substantial Serb minority in Macedonia.

However, the hon. Gentleman is the only one I have heard who is in favour of sending a military expedition into Bosnia to impose a solution. I respect the honesty of his views, although I do not share them.

Hong Kong

15. Mr. Waterson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what plans he has to visit Hong Kong to discuss Sino-British relations; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Goodlad: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs has at present no plans to do so, but I visited Hong Kong from 29 May to 1 June. Talks are continuing between Britain and China on electoral arrangements in Hong Kong. We are working for an early and successful conclusion in time for us to hold elections in Hong Kong in 1994 and 1995 which are fair, open and acceptable to the people of Hong Kong.

Mr. Waterson: Does my right hon. Friend agree that pushing ahead with the new airport in Hong Kong is crucial to maintaining confidence for the future there, especially among the commercial community? Can he give some hope of progress in the relatively near future in the discussions with the Chinese authorities about the financing arrangements for that airport?

Mr. Goodlad: My hon. Friend is correct: everybody agrees that Hong Kong needs a new airport if it is to remain an international trade and financial centre. We have done our best to take account of Chinese problems with financing arrangements and further discussions on those arrangements are taking place. I hope that they will lead to an agreement. Our view remains that if the problems were dealt with on their merits they could be quickly solved and that would certainly be a great boost to confidence. In the meantime, we are maintaining momentum on the airport to avoid expensive cost increases and slippages.

Ms Hoey: Does the Minister envisage any circumstances in which the Government might renege on the 1997 agreement to withdraw from Hong Kong?

Mr. Goodlad: No.

Points of Order

3.30 pm

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. A few weeks ago, during the debate on the White Paper about the coal industry, you along with the rest of us heard the President of the Board of Trade and others speak about saving so many pits. We wanted to save all 31, and the Minister said that they would save a few. The news has now reached us that one of the pits that the President of the Board of Trade said would be saved, not shut—Rufford, in the east midlands—is due for closure this weekend.

Have you, Madam Speaker, at any time received from the President of the Board of Trade an application to make a statement to the House so that we can ensure we have not been hoodwinked by the President—because it looks very much like it?

Madam Speaker: If any Minister had sought to make a statement today, it would have appeared on the Annunciator and we would all know about it.

Mr. David Wilshire (Spelthorne): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. It arises from my request to you earlier today for a private notice question——

Madam Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman should understand that once I have made a decision he cannot raise the issue with me.

Mr. Wilshire: I was about to say that I am not seeking to challenge that.

Madam Speaker: Order. Is the hon. Gentleman raising a point of order for me?

Mr. Wilshire: I am, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: In that case I must hear it.

Mr. Wilshire: I seek your advice and help in protecting the interests of my constituents, and I do so as a result of a matter that I discovered subsequent to my request to you this morning.

I now realise that on 9 June the Department of Transport published air accident report No. 3/93, briefed the press upon it and gave copies to the press. The report reveals matters of grave importance to my constituents. It shows that a pilot suffered structural damage to his aircraft but failed to declare an emergency although there was one. He asked leave to land at Heathrow airport, in my constituency, but was asked to go to Stansted. He assumed that that request was made because he would overfly——

Madam Speaker: Order. I cannot interest myself in the argument. The hon. Gentleman must put a clear point of order. Does the matter affect our Standing Orders or procedures?

Mr. Wilshire: Yes, it does, Madam Deputy Speaker, but in order to show you why——

Madam Speaker: Order. I am being demoted.

Mr. Wilshire: I apologise, Madam Speaker. As you will appreciate, I do not often raise points of order, so I hope that you will allow a minimum amount of latitude.

The facts that I have given are essential to an understanding that my constituents, who suffered from the crash at Staines, are desperately worried.

I am able to tell you all this, Madam Speaker, only because of the media. I made inquiries and discovered that no local Member of Parliament was told by the Department of Transport and that no copy of the report has been deposited in the House. Is this something that you can look into to ensure that such matters are reported to the House?

Madam Speaker: It is a matter for the hon. Gentleman himself. As he knows, there are various procedures by which he can seek the information that he requires. He can seek to ask questions or apply for an Adjournment debate. Perhaps on reflection he will explore one of those avenues with a view to obtaining the information that he wants.

Mr. Ian Taylor (Esher): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. Have you had a request from the Home Secretary to come to the House to make a statement about his announcement, which most Conservative Members welcome, to the media concerning the introduction of the expandable side-handled police baton?

Madam Speaker: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply I gave a few moments ago.

BILL PRESENTED

Civil Rights (Disabled Persons) (Northern Ireland)

Mr. Alfred Morris, supported by Mr. James Molyneaux, Rev. Martin Smyth, Sir James Kilfedder, Dr. Joe Hendron, Rev. Ian Paisley, Mr. William Ross, Mr. Ken Maginnis, Mr. Eddie McGrady, Rev. William McCrea, Mr. Roy Beggs and Mr. Clifford Forsythe, presented a Bill to prohibit, in Northern Ireland, discrimination against disabled people on the ground of their disability; and for connected purposes: And the same was read the First time,; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday 2 July 1993, and to be printed. [Bill 210.]

Funding of Political Parties

3.34 pm

Mr. John Spellar (Warley, West): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to regulate the funding of political parties, and for connected purposes.

Let me make it clear that it is not about state funding for political parties; it is principally about regulating outside donations.

The Bill has three main aims: first, to prohibit donations by foreign nationals not normally resident in this country, and by overseas companies and overseas Governments; secondly, to ensure the recording and publication of donations above a certain limit, probably about £1,000; thirdly, to require political parties to publish income and expenditure accounts, in the same way as companies and trade unions do.

I am sure that such measures would be welcomed, not only by the Opposition but by many Conservatives, particularly those who support the Charter movement and who are demanding openness in their own party. I hope that the chairman of the Conservative party will be able to enlighten the Home Affairs Committee about many of these matters later today.

The House passed a resolution as far back as December 1949 that "political parties, and all other organisations having political action as one of their aims, should publish annually full and adequate statements of their accounts."

Perhaps 40 years is enough time for even the Tory party to catch up.

Why is party funding, particularly funding of the Conservative party, such a relevant issue today? After all, the brewers have been involved in Tory politics for centuries; even today their influence is fairly substantial. Various shadowy organisations, such as British United Industrialists, have been funnelling money into Tory coffers for years. It is nearly 50 years since the so-called River companies were set up as a secret conduit for funds for the Tory party which it wanted to keep hidden from public gaze.

It has also been clear for many years, to put it delicately, that there has been a strong statistical link between donations from companies and the chances of their bosses getting knighthoods and peerages. I am sure that that is a matter of coincidence. It has also been a long-running scandal that the Conservative party does not publish proper accounts, even for its own members.

Recent events—particularly the case of Mr. Asil Nadir—have made this a major and burning public issue. We are talking about some very big money. Donations to the central Tory party came to an estimated £7·5 million in 1989, £7·9 million in 1990, £15·8 million in 1991, and a whopping £20·7 million in 1992. Donations from constituency associations and published donations in company accounts came to only a small percentage of this. So where is the rest coming from? It has become increasingly clear that it comes from extremely wealthy individuals, both at home and abroad.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): Such as Asil Nadir?

Mr. Spellar: I am not sure whether Asil Nadir should be regarded as a domestic or overseas donor in this context. We have an estimate of his donation, admitted by the Tory party, of £400,000. The press has reported figures ranging up to £1·5 million. It has also been reported that moneys were being accepted from him when it was clear that his business was in a shaky state. We do not know whether the money came out of his own pocket or from his company without even being legally reported. I am sure that his creditors will be most interested in knowing that. We hope that the chairman of the Conservative party will shed some light on the matter.

British pension funds—and that means, in real terms, ordinary British pensioners—lost some £2 billion when Polly Peck crashed. We know that Asil Nadir received considerable support. What the public want to know about Asil Nadir and others is, what did they pay and what did they get for it? We know what Asil Nadir got. He did not get his knighthood, but he got seven Tory Members of Parliament, including Ministers, to press his case.

What did the others get and what did they pay? What of some of the other dubious donors whose names have been linked with Tory funding?

Mr. David Evans (Welwyn Hatfield): What about Robert Maxwell?

Mr. Spellar: I am very pleased to hear that the Bill has all-party support. It shows that there is a great demand for it and it is extremely helpful to know that it is widely supported, even from such a dubious source.

What about Mr. Gerald Ronson, who was briefly a guest of Her Majesty's Government, who is alleged to have made donations through companies, possibly in the Virgin Islands? Jack Lyons was convicted of fraud and stripped of his knighthood and Nazmu Virani is now facing fraud charges regarding false loans from BCCI.

It is said that one of the benefits to donors was a tax break for foreign business men who are given tax exemptions equalled only in Switzerland, the Channel Islands and Luxembourg. How much is that costing the taxpayer? Is it not ironic that, when the Secretary of State for Social Security, the mad axeman of the Government, is prepared to savage the welfare state, the Government are forgoing substantial tax income from people who already have more money than they need? It is even reported that the Prime Minister hosted a fund-raising dinner for some of them.

One alleged beneficiary is John Latsis, who was extremely friendly with the Greek colonels. Another is Mr. Li Ka Shing, a Hong Kong billionaire who is well connected in Beijing. He is alleged to have given about half a million pounds.

It is ironic that the Tories made so much fuss about money going from Moscow to the Communist party. It seems that Communist-connected money is acceptable from Beijing but not from Moscow. It is also said that the Prime Minister dropped off for a special dinner in Hong Kong. We want to know the facts, and so do the public.

Why should overseas plutocrats take such an interest in our affairs to the tune of an estimated £7 million in 1991-92 alone? It is not just a question of foreign business men; it is believed that foreign Governments are also involved. The Governments of Brunei, Malaysia and Saudi Arabia have all been mentioned in articles. Is the British Government's foreign policy up for sale? What is the truth and how many others are there? The public have a right to know.

[Mr. Spellar]

The United States have sensibly banned foreign donations and we should follow that example. It is an outrage that the Tory party should be wrapped up in such secrecy and be dependent on excessively large donations or loans from those who are not prepared to be publicly identified.

More than 100 years ago, in 1883, Lord Randolph Churchill told the Tory party conference in Birmingham:

"When you allow secret expenditure, you will certainly have corrupt expenditure."

It is equally absurd that the Government are not prepared to provide proper accounts showing where the money goes and the level of their debts. It is only when we get a revelation like the spending on the legal bill of the right hon. Member for Kingston upon Thames (Mr. Lamont) that the facts come out. The response of the Tory donors was drastic: half a million pounds was the estimate from the current vice-chairman of the Tory party.

Perhaps that is why the Government are so reticent, but, as Professor Keith Ewing said in evidence to the Home Affairs Select Committee,

"Those who have nothing to hide have nothing to fear".

The Select Committee may come up with other measures. All I am hoping to do is to enable light to be shed on the dark and sleazy world of Tory political finance which has been hidden from the public gaze for too long.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. John Spellar, Mrs. Barbara Roche, Mr. Mike O'Brien, Mr. David Winnick, Ms Angela Eagle, Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours, Mr. Andrew Mackinlay and Mr. Gordon McMaster.

FUNDING OF POLITICAL PARTIES

Mr. John Spellar accordingly presented a Bill to regulate the funding of political parties: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday 2 July, and to be printed. [Bill 211.]

Mr. Bruce Grocott (The Wrekin): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. You will have noticed that my hon. Friend's ten-minute Bill had overwhelming and unanimous support from the House; there was no opposition to it. One or two Conservative Members made noises, which is all that some of them seem capable of doing, but no voices were raised in objection to the Bill. It clearly has the unanimous support of the House, and I am sure that it has strong support in the country.

May I have your advice, please, Madam Speaker? Given the unanimous support for the Bill, are there any swift procedures whereby it can be enacted? It is clearly what the House wants and what the country needs.

Madam Speaker: There is no easy way to success in this House. I am afraid that it is uphill all the way.

Orders of the Day

Trade Union Reform and Employment Rights Bill

Lords amendments further considered.
Lords amendments Nos. 9 to 23 agreed to.

Clause 22

RIGHT TO MATERNITY LEAVE AND RIGHT TO RETURN TO WORK

Lords amendment: No. 24, in page 40, leave out lines 40 to 44.

3.45 pm

The Minister of State, Department of Employment (Mr. Michael Forsyth): I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Madam Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to consider Lords amendments Nos. 25 and 26.

Mr. Forsyth: The amendments fulfil an undertaking given by my noble Friend Viscount Ullswater to Lord Mottistone in Committee in another place. Lord Mottistone had raised a particular concern of employers about a woman who comes back from maternity leave early, without telling her employer of her intentions. Employers have pointed out that if they are unable to plan for that eventuality, the person whom they have taken on to replace the employee during her maternity leave will still be in post. The employer will be liable to give the replacement at least a week's notice and will end up having to pay for two people to do one job—the woman and her replacement.

I do not expect that such a situation will arise often. Most women will probably choose to take their full 14 weeks' statutory entitlement and those who do not will, in the main, be in touch with their employer anyway and will want to let him or her know their date of return so that preparations can be made for it. Only a very small minority of employees are likely to behave otherwise. However, the Government agree with employers that it would not be reasonable for them to be put to trouble and expense by such thoughtless behaviour.

The main amendment therefore provides that, in the rare case where a woman seeks to arrive back at work early without giving her employer a week's warning, he or she will be able to send her away again to continue her maternity leave until the seven days have expired—or until the end of the statutory period of leave, if that is earlier. That will enable the temporary replacement to be given the proper week's notice to which he or she is entitled, at the end of which the woman on maternity leave can return to work.

The other amendments in the group are mainly consequential and ensure that employees are able to choose whichever is the more favourable of their contractual or statutory rights in any particular aspect. The provisions ensure that the position is equivalent—in respect of the new right to maternity leave—to the current situation regarding maternity absence.

I commend the amendments to the House.

Ms Joyce Quin (Gateshead, East): I have listened carefully to the Minister. We are disappointed that the maternity provisions of the Bill have come back largely unchanged from the other place and that we shall consider only this rather modest amendment. We are therefore left with a highly unsatisfactory package of measures covering pregnant women at work and women who wish to return to work after having a baby. It is a pity that the new intake at the Department of Employment has not been prepared, even at this late stage, to take a fresh, positive look at the maternity provisions in the Bill.

The new Secretary of State is in his place. His reputation was referred to yesterday. He is also reputed to be a pro-European. It seems a great shame that, the day after being appointed to his new post, he should find himself in a minority of one in the European Community —seeming to embark on a route that would not endear him to his European colleagues, with whom we thought that he would work closely and have a great deal in common.

I am also disappointed that our amendments to Lords amendment No. 25 were not selected and were deemed to be technically incorrect; they would have given us a chance to vote on improvements to a very unsatisfactory situation.

The Minister explained that the amendment stemmed from a suggestion by one of his noble Friends who felt that it would help employers, although the suggestion does not seem to have been researched in any depth. I was reminded of a comment made yesterday by my hon. Friend the Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden (Mr. Galbraith) when winding up the debate. He said that the minute that there seemed to be any conflict between the interests of employer and employee, the Government immediately jumped in without further examination and decided that the employer must be right in all circumstances. My hon. Friend said that that seemed to be some law of nature for the Government. I would go further and say that it saddens me that the Government always seem to be on the side of the bad employer rather than the good one. It is a great pity that they seem to react in a knee-jerk manner.

Good employers already give better maternity benefits than those in the Bill, which is a weak translation of the relevant European Community directive. Only bad employers wish to deny employees rights and are felt to be normal and natural elsewhere. It is they who cause us difficulties in that regard. Such employers exploit the good will of their work force. That seems to be why the amendment was introduced.

The Minister seemed to feel that not many women, employees or firms would be affected by the amendment, but how widely has he consulted? He has not had much time to consult about the amendment and the wisdom of altering the situation, adding greater complexity to an already complex set of arrangements which govern maternity provision.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The hon. Lady is usually extremely generous in her comments. However, is it not a little churlish to complain that no further amendments have come from the other place when, on Report, at her request and behest, we accepted two important amendments extending maternity rights? Does it not add insult to injury for her to complain that we did not consult fully before making amendments when she made no such complaints while urging the Government on Report to accept the changes in respect of entitlement to choose between sick leave and maternity leave, for example?

Ms Quin: I am sorry if the Minister feels that I am being churlish, but having looked at the report of the proceedings of the Bill in another place I was impressed by the number and quality of the amendments put forward, in particular by Baroness Lockwood and Baroness Turner. It is those amendments that I am disappointed the Government have not seen fit to accept.

I welcome the fact that in Committee the Government accepted some of the Opposition's suggestions, but to a certain extent consultation was not necessary as all members of the Committee had received wide representation from many people about the particular matter that the Government decided to take on board.

The Minister can correct me if I am wrong, but there does not seem to have been wide consultation or a wide measure of representation on this amendment. It seems to have resulted from a comment made in the other place, to which the Minister referred. Apart from that, I know of no other representations that were made. Perhaps the Minister will enlighten us if there were a large number of representations. The fact that he remains silent suggests that he has not been written to by a large number of firms on this issue.

In many ways the amendment is rather difficult to object to in detail, but we wish to vote against it as it is a symptom of the Government's willingness to see only one side of an argument and to introduce a further element of complexity which makes an already difficult position a great deal worse.

The Minister commented vaguely on the number of firms and individuals likely to be affected. It is a pity that he is unable to give further information. Certain women who are not well off may feel a compulsion to return to work even before 14 weeks, despite that being inadequate maternity leave. I have seen no figures on the number of women who might want to do that.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The hon. Lady is being extremely unfair on the Government. She suggests that we have been one-sided in respect of our response to representations on the amendment from the Confederation of British Industry. Equally, the CBI made representations that were not favourable to the amendment that the hon. Lady tabled at an earlier stage in the Bill's consideration, to give women the right to an extra four weeks' absence where they have a doctor's certificate indicating sickness arising from their pregnancy.

It is wrong of the hon. Lady to suggest that we have considered only one side of the argument. In this case, we responded to reasonable concerns expressed by business. I explained that it would be unlikely for notice not to be given, because most people will be courteous and have an arrangement with their employer, to ensure that such a thing would be done anyway.

Ms Quin: I accept that the Minister listened to the CBI's point of view, but responded to a different one— although I do not believe that a particular point of view one way or the other was overwhelmingly held by employers.

The Government were dragged kicking and screaming into accepting the terms of the EC directive. They did not positively vote in favour of it, but attempted to weaken it at many stages in its progress through the Community. When the Minister and I recently crossed swords in a European Standing Committee, the hon. Gentleman seemed to suggest that the Community should not bother itself with the whole range of social issues. He said that most robustly, and is now nodding his head, even though those social issues, as many members of the Committee forcefully pointed out, do not stem from the Maastricht treaty but from even further back than the treaty of Rome —to the treaty setting up the European Coal and Steel Community, when there was an obvious detailed and firm commitment to a social dimension in European institutions.

The Government's overall record on implementing that particular directive is far from distinguished. In nearly all cases, the Government have tended to back a narrow-minded employer's point of view.

The health and safety of the baby is paramount, and the amendment—which relates to the 14 weeks' maternity leave, which we feel is too short—encourages a system that is not in the interests of many mothers or their babies. Although it may be true that some employers like to receive notice if new mothers intend to return to work early, many employers disagree with the Government's overall view and would prefer to see longer rather than shorter maternity leave. They take that view in fairness to the employee and in terms of the ease of finding a replacement for the absent employee.

The shorter the period of maternity leave, the more difficult it can often be for an employer to obtain a replacement. A strong argument can be made for 18 weeks, plus the period of the right to return to work which many subject to employment protection currently enjoy but which the women who particularly concern us, at the end of the scale, do not enjoy. They are important points which the Government should bear in mind.

Underlying the amendment is the argument that the Government have used many times. They do not want extra costs or administrative burdens to be placed on business. Behind that is the wider argument, which the Government persist in pursuing despite evidence to the contrary, that employment protection measures destroy jobs. That is the over-simplified view with which we have had to contend many times during our debates. In dealing with the argument about costs in another place, Viscount Ullswater did not provide detailed figures of how the costs break down in this and related matters.

I beg the Government to reconsider the question of costs. I recently came across an interesting publication produced by Business in the Community and the Institute of Personnel Management. It is entitled "Corporate Culture and Caring" and talks of what it calls the business case for family-friendly provision. Pages 59 and 62 show clearly that for many companies it is cheaper to give women generous maternity leave rather than to encourage women to leave their jobs or even to sack those who do not have employment protection because companies then have to bear the costs associated with starting and training a replacement. In the example cited, the company was saving about £250,000 by giving its employees generous maternity provision and generous help with child care and by following other family-friendly policies. I urge the Government to study the publication because a respectable case can be made for stating that employers can save money by offering proper employment protection, especially for women leaving work to have a baby.

The Government's costings were not very well received in another place. Indeed, they have been challenged there in the report of the Committee that scrutinises European legislation. It was found that the costs referred to by the Government could be offset by other considerations.

Although the amendment in itself is not substantial, it is nevertheless a symptom of the way in which the Government approach the issue. They have missed the opportunity provided by the Bill to give a fair deal to pregnant women and women who wish to return to work after having a baby. They have also, tragically, missed the opportunity to bring our standards up to those of many other countries in the European Community.

The Government seem to regard European legislation as a ceiling rather than a floor. In fact, it is meant to be only a floor of protection, and it is up to individual countries to provide extra protection if they wish. Unfortunately, the Government want to get away with the minimum, whereas we believe that they should go for the maximum in terms of benefits and employment rights for working women, which is the fair deal that they deserve.

Ms Angela Eagle (Wallasey): This part of the Bill, which confers a number of extremely limited new rights on employees protected by law, reveals the Government at their most schizophrenic. The Minister of State in particular and the Government in general believe that any statutory protection for people at work is somehow a burden on business, merely a cost and something which should be reduced to the absolute minimum. Now, however, they are biting their tongue while introducing legislation to give minimum new rights to people who previously did not have them. In this case, it is to pregnant women who do not qualify for the existing right to maternity leave because they have not been working in the same job for long enough.

What is happening? As has already been said, I believe that the Government have been forced by European directives against their will to introduce rights with which they do not agree. They have therefore tried to introduce them as reluctantly as possible, in the most complex possible way, so that although women will be allowed to take them up, in practical terms it will be extremely difficult to claim them. The maternity provisions in the Bill provide a prime example of the Government in that schizophrenic state.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: I hate to ruin the hon. Lady's theory, but may I draw her attention to the fact that all Conservative Members stood on a manifesto commitment to introduce those rights? The notion that we were forced to do so by the European Community is absurd.

Secondly, were it not for the British presidency the combination of the antics of the European Parliament and those of the Italians would have prevented the directive from coming into force at all. It was thanks to the efforts of my right hon. Friend the former Secretary of State, now the Minister for Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, in her role as president of the Social Affairs Council, that we were able to secure the directive, and the rights that accrue from it, within the Community.

Ms Eagle: I am touched that the Government seem so concerned about their manifesto commitments, although they have spent the past few months reneging on most of them in the Budget—but I do not want to go into that.

Mr. Frank Dobson (Holborn and St. Pancras): My hon. Friend may agree that if there were any praise to be allocated for managing to get the directive through the European Community, it should go to Christine Crawley, the Member of the European Parliament for Birmingham, East, who moved heaven and earth in the EC to ensure that the directive got through, against the usual obnoxious and ludicrous obstruction by the British Government.

Ms Eagle: I agree with my hon. Friend. The Minister will not be surprised to know that that is also my interpretation of the shenanigans that went on in Europe while the maternity directive was going through the procedures there. Simply examining the record proves that the Government consistently opposed the directive, watered it down and delayed it as much as they could. In the end they could not find it in their heart to vote for it, so they abstained. That makes the case that they are reluctant converts to putting any legal protection for employees on to the statute book.

Two minor amendments have come from the House of Lords and, ironically, they put obligations on employees rather than on employers. That, too, illustrates the Government's priorities. One of the new provisions is that a woman has to give seven days' notice if she intends to return early. Nobody could strongly disagree with that, but it is disappointing that the Government have not seen fit to use the Lords stage of the Bill to clarify further some of the practical difficulties concerning the length of maternity leave proposed, which is 14 weeks.

Many women start their maternity leave with 11 weeks of their pregnancy to go. That leaves them a mere three weeks after giving birth not only to get the child home and start caring for it but to recover and then to think about the practicalities of going back to work and making provision for the care of such a young baby. Even that assumes that women are so mechanical that the date of conception can be precisely pinpointed and that the date of birth will be precisely nine months after conception, so that it will all fit neatly into the 14 weeks. Any mother, and any doctor, will tell us that there is no precise science and that the dates are simply estimates.

We discussed in Committee the fact that the absurd situation could arise, albeit in only a few cases, when the 14 weeks have passed and the baby has still not been born. We dealt with that problem to some extent in Committee, but, according to Maternity Alliance, 48 per cent. of women still take their maternity leave at a time that they think is about 11 weeks before the birth. That leaves them only three weeks to deal with all the practicalities that arise afterwards.

The trouble stems not from the fact that women may suddenly descend on their employers without warning and cause practical problems, but that 14 weeks is too short a time and presents practical difficulties, both to the woman and the child, which may affect the child's health. I would have preferred the Lords to consider that, rather than trying to impose more duties on employees.

There are all kinds of reasons why a woman who has given birth may not be in a position to return to work and leave the baby at home well and settled in a mere three weeks. For example, 5 to 7 per cent. of live births in Britain are premature. Depending on how premature the babies are, they may need special care and they may have to stay in hospital, which causes practical problems for new mothers ensuring that their children are okay and that they can visit them. All those possible problems militate against a mother trying to return to work before the baby is thriving and settled.

One per cent. of babies are extremely premature and that can lead to months of hospital treatment before the baby is allowed home. The existing law and the proposed change in the law says nothing about what a mother in such a situation is meant to do when contemplating returning to work. As premature births occur in a small percentage of cases, the Lords amendment should have considered the practical problems that a minority of women must face having given birth prematurely, with the problems that arise thereafter.

Ten per cent. of newborn babies have problems requiring special or intensive care, which can last for several weeks. It means that not only are those mothers unable to return to work early but they are not even in a position to return to work after their 14 weeks' maternity leave. Those mothers then have the choice of giving up their jobs or trying to negotiate an unpaid period of leave. Just when mothers are incurring all kinds of costs after having a baby, they must contemplate taking unpaid leave and losing their earning power altogether.

With multiple births—as a twin, I speak with some feeling, and 30 in every 1,000 live births are now triplets or more—birth weights are lower and it takes longer for those children to reach the stage when they are stable and thriving. There are also practical problems suddenly facing a mother who, with many young children, has the organisational task of getting her home into some sort of equilibrium so that she can contemplate returning to work.

Caesarean deliveries require a longer period of recuperation for the mother than for the baby. Again there are only three weeks in which the new mother is meant to have sorted out all the practical difficulties and found herself back at work. The problem is not the employer's of having a woman decide that she is going to return to work early and giving a week's notice. The problems are all on the side of the mother and baby. Why have the Government decided to move Lords amendment No. 24, after one comment in the Lords on that relatively trivial matter, and to ignore serious, practical problems that occur day in, day out for new mothers?

Other issues such as the health of baby must be considered. It is thought that 14 weeks is inadequate to establish breast-feeding—as encouraged by the Government and especially the Department of Health. The number of the mothers who breast-feed is declining, which is a health threat to new babies. It should have been in the Government's mind to ensure that, before having to return to work, a mother was able to establish adequate breast-feeding arrangements for her new baby so that she could protect its health to the best possible extent.

The timetable for the immunisation of babies is more suited to the old system of maternity benefit than the new 14-week rule. The Department of Employment seems to have given little consideration to these matters, despite the fact that the Department of Health is extremely concerned about them.

[Ms Eagle]

I should have liked the Lords amendments to give some recognition of those factors, yet once again the other place has not seen fit to make amendments to deal with such practical problems.

The Government are concerned about what they call "costs to business", but seemingly are not concerned about practical measures to ensure the health of mothers and babies and therefore the next generation.

4.15 pm

Lords amendment No. 25, rather than attempting to tackle the complex nature of the old system, new statutory provision and extra provisions that employers may make in some cases for the female work force, merely says that women can take the best provision that is available to them. Why on earth does not it simplify and consolidate maternity provision so that employers and mothers-to-be could simply work out the entitlement from a leaflet and plan for the birth of the baby?

Instead, we have three complex and convoluted systems working in tandem. Nobody is sure how they work together or what provisions a mother may be entitled to. The Lords amendment says that she can have the system that is best for her. Lords amendments Nos. 24 and 25 address the wrong problems. They are too obsessed with disbenefits to the employer rather than practical help to the mother.

Maternity leave should be seen as a right and not as a cost. If the Government were committed to sensible maternity provision of which Britain could be proud they would have considered it in that light rather than being so churlish about the new rights that they have introduced. Maternity leave is vital to ensure reasonable equal opportunities. It is a starting point for dealing with the many other matters necessary to ensure that women can take their rightful place in the economic life of the nation and in society in general.

There is a practical and moral case for women to be given provision that they and employers understand and that can be triggered easily. For those reasons, the Lords amendments address the wrong issues. They are too modest and they do not solve the serious problems that have resulted from the Government's seeming unwillingness to provide a simple, easy system of maternity provision that women can look forward to receiving.

Mr. Richard Burden (Birmingham, Northfield): I was staggered by the Minister of State's sedentary remark that the British Government saved the pregnant women at work directive. We have spent many hours discussing that, in Committee and in the Chamber, but clearly it has not sunk in with the Minister of State. Therefore, let us again examine how the British Government allegedly saved the directive.

When the directive was first proposed by the Commission, it suggested that any woman working since the beginning of her pregnancy, whether full or part-time, would be eligible for a minimum maternity leave entitlement of 14 weeks on full pay, with the flexibility of further time on 80 per cent. of pay.

I should like to ask the Minister of State whether the Government now support that. If he was in the Chamber, he would be able to give me an answer, but I shall return to it when he comes back.

The directive would apply to all companies, irrespective of size. Do the Government now support that? There would be two weeks' compulsory rest on full pay before the birth. Is the Minister now saying that the Government support that? Women would not lose pay for ante-natal appointments during working time. I understand that the Government support that principle—they just did not want it in the Bill because they said that it was self-evident, despite the fact that several industrial tribunal and other cases have shown that the matter is far from simple in practice. Periods of sickness during pregnancy could not be deducted from maternity leave. The Government have a rather ambiguous position on that matter, and I would like them to clarify it.

All work-related rights would be maintained during pregnancy. Dismissals linked to pregnancy would be outlawed. Employers would be required to improve conditions at work and find alternative jobs or an improved environment for pregnant and breast-feeding women should that be necessary. There must be a real alternative to night work for pregnant women, for at least eight weeks before the birth. That was the original draft directive introduced in 1990.

The final directive was approved two years later. It took two years, because the original proposals were watered down and blocked. The state that had more to do with that blocking process than any other was Britain. If the Minister is saying that the directive was saved by the Government, he has an obligation to say whether the draft directive containing real improvements for working women is now acceptable to the Government. If it is not, his statement that the Government saved the directive is no more than fluff.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Wallasey (Ms Eagle) said, if anyone saved that directive and is responsible for ensuring that some modest improvements have been adopted in European and now also in British law, it is probably Christine Crawley, the MEP for Birmingham, East. Organisations such as Maternity Alliance, the National Association of Citizens Advice Bureaux and the Equal Opportunities Commission should be thanked for the good work they have done. We have nothing for which to thank the Government. They have given every concession with a bad grace, and have had to be pushed and shoved into doing so.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: I am sure that Miss Crawley is a perfectly splendid person, but will the hon. Gentleman explain what role she played in ending the difficulties resulting from a conflict with the European Parliament? I had the impression that my right hon. Friend the then Secretary of State was responsible for bringing that to a conclusion. I would be more than fascinated if the hon. Gentleman could explain the role played by Miss Crawley in that.

Mr. Burden: Christine Crawley was the chair of the Committee on Women's Rights at the European Parliament. That Committee, more than any other body, was responsible for bringing the various parties together to ensure that the views expressed by the British Government and others did not wreck the directive. That ensured a successful outcome of sorts.

If the Minister is saying that the Government were in favour of that directive, why did they object to the specific provisions suggested by the European Commission and the European Parliament? Why was it that, in the final vote during a Fisheries meeting, Britain could not even bring itself to vote for the directive, but only abstained? It is odd to claim credit for a piece of legislation by saying that one abstained when it came up for a vote. That is an astonishing statement.

The amendment has been tabled by the Government because, without it, the Bill would be inconvenient. It would not be particularly inconvenient for women, but it would be inconvenient for employers, because a woman could return to work early after having a baby and not give notice. Taken in isolation, that point might be reasonable. But of course the legislation does not exist in isolation; it exists in the round.

If we want to ensure that the legislation is as convenient as possible for all concerned—mothers and employers—would it not be rather more useful for the Government to listen to the advice that they received from the Maternity Alliance, Opposition Members and all kinds of experts who suggested that the way that the legislation could be most simplified and made most effective and most convenient would be to extend the period of minimum maternity leave to 18 weeks—indeed, to extend it to the levels that were envisaged in the European directive in the first place?

If the Government consider that the welfare of the mother and the baby is important, let me give them some examples. Some have already been given by my hon. Friends. Under the Bill, even though there is some statutory protection for a woman from coming back to work before she is ready because of illness, there is very little or no protection if the baby is ill. Extending the period of statutory maternity leave in the way that we have been urging would not overcome that problem, but it would help. The Government have refused to help in that way.

We have already heard that the Government—indeed many Governments—encourage breast feeding, yet a woman will be required to go back to work perhaps just three weeks after she has had a baby. How on earth does that fit with a Government who claim to encourage breast feeding? The timing of the vaccination and inoculation programme that is recommended for babies these days just does not fit with the insistence that women should go back to work after just 14 weeks.

It has been proved that the chances of finding a child minder in the vital early weeks after birth are much more difficult. That position would be improved if the Government had seen fit to increase the period to 18 weeks. Those are real conveniences that the Government could have offered to employers and women, but they have not done so. Why not? They say that it is because of cost.

Cost has been mentioned time and again in respect of this aspect of the Bill. It is time that the point was answered. Ministers have thrown out figures and mentioned an alleged cost of £200 million if the maternity leave period is extended to 18 weeks. They have never stated the reasons or the basis for that calculation, but they have said that it would cost about £200 million and that it would be a burden on employers' costs. Two points arise.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: I am not aware that the Government have ever said that. We have estimated the cost of the additional four weeks at £50 million. But £200 million is a big number and £50 million is also a big number, particularly when employers are obviously fighting to maintain employment and improve employment prospects for those who are unemployed.

Mr. Burden: I am grateful for that intervention. I find it interesting that the figure has apparently been revised downwards. I do not have to hand the Hansard reference showing where the £200 million comes from, but the reference exists. If the figure is now said to be £50 million and that it is a big cost, in terms of how much money the Minister and I have, it is a lot of money.

I would not say that £50 million, even if the amount were that much, was a great deal of money for a Government to spend to ensure that working women had decent maternity rights. When we compare £50 million with the £1 billion that was lost in one day in order to maintain the fig leaf over the Chancellor's economic policies, it does not seem a great deal.

Ms Quin: Some information which I did not have available during our earlier deliberations on this subject reinforces my hon. Friend's point. A letter from the Federation of Small Businesses to the previous Secretary of State for Employment states very clearly:

"From the point of view of small businesses, this increase"— that is, the extension from 14 weeks to 18 weeks—

"would make little difference and we would have no objection to the proposed amendment."

The federation says that costs are incurred at an earlier stage and can stay in place for an extra four weeks without any problem at all, and that extending the leave to 18 weeks would simplify the system and make it easier for small employers who find the present set-up, like the set-up proposed in the Bill, a real headache.

4.30 pm

Mr. Burden: My hon. Friend makes an exceptionally valid point. Ministers manage to talk at two levels when they refer to the costs involved. They are not always over-specific about who they expect to stand which cost. They say that the cost will be a burden on employers. However, if the state was prepared to extend the period of statutory paid maternity leave to 18 weeks, the cost would not fall on employers—it would fall on us as a society. But is it too much to expect society to give working women the same sort of rights that women in other countries get?

My hon. Friend made an especially valid point about the cost to employers. If a woman is on maternity leave and an employer appoints a temporary replacement, costs have been incurred, and increasing the period to 18 weeks would make virtually no difference. Indeed, it may be that employers' costs are reduced in the medium and longer term because the consequence of having inadequate maternity leave and not seriously addressing the issue of a baby being ill or the mother not being ready to come back to work, and the problems of breast feeding and finding a child minder, is often to force working women to leave their jobs. The result is that the employer must pay the cost of advertising, finding a replacement and so on. It would be much better if decent maternity leave was given in the first place.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: I apologise for interrupting the hon. Gentleman again. I suspect that the figure that he has in mind of £200 million probably relates to the compliance cost assessment of between £100 million and £250 million that we produced, a copy of which is in the Library. If he is right about no costs being involved, and if the hon. Member for Gateshead, East (Ms Quin) is right about the assessment of the Federation of Small Businesses that there is no cost in extending the period from 14 weeks to 18 weeks, there is nothing to prevent them from doing so. They are free to extend it. Employers can agree that the leave will be longer if they so wish. That is a contractual matter between employers and employees.

If the hon. Gentleman is right about all the advantages to business, we do not need to pass legislation to compel employers to do what he says is in their economic interests. However, our assessment is that it would add a cost of £50 million, which would create difficulties for employment in the future, especially for women.

Mr. Burden: It is precisely because enlightened employers understand that decent maternity leave provisions are in their interests, as well as in the interests of the mother, that so many of them offer maternity leave provisions that are well above the statutory minimum. The importance of having a statutory minimum is not to force enlightened or forward-looking employers to do what they see is in their interests and in the interests of the mother.

The importance of having a statutory minimum is to ensure that there is protection against bad employers, short-sighted employers or employers who have a narrow view of working women's rights, the interests of their enterprise and how they should operate in a civilised society, just as the importance of having wages councils has always been to ensure that pay does not fall below a minimum level.

The ridiculous thing about the Government's approach to this matter and the argument by the Minister, which underlies their proposal to abolish wages councils, will not make much difference as far as good employers are concerned. However, it will ensure that bad employers and bad employment practices are given statutory sanction. That is the tragedy of the Government's approach to employment legislation.

The amendment was not introduced when the matter was discussed in this place, but it was felt to be so important that it was introduced in another place. It was felt that, if the worst came to the worst and an unreasonable mother gave no notice to her employers but simply returned to work earlier than expected and demanded her work back—I cannot imagine many women doing that—the employer might have to bear an extra cost for a few days. That possibility is seen as so significant that it requires not only an amendment in another place but a debate here today.

Does it not reveal that the Government have an odd set of priorities when that possibility is seen as significant, but a mother's rights to decent child care, to breast-feed her baby for a reasonable period and to have a decent period of maternity leave are not seen to be important? It is not considered important to introduce legislation to ensure that bad employers are encouraged to become good employers. It seems that the Government, as so often, have their priorities wrong.

The statements that have been made about why it is unnecessary to legislate reveal the attitude that was displayed during the debates in Europe. I am pleased with the legislation as far as it goes. It is a small step forward, but does not go far enough. Instead of introducing one-sided amendments that benefit only the employer, it would be better if, for once, the Government started listening to working women, and introduced amendments to benefit them and guarantee decent maternity rights in this country.

Mr. Andrew Miller (Ellesmere Port and Neston): I am surprised to see that a Conservative Member wants to speak at this late stage in our debate. I was beginning to think that no Conservative Members held a view on the important issues raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Gateshead, East (Ms Quin) and others. As my hon. Friend said, in yesterday's debate reference was continually made to the employer's need and rights. I hope that the Government will relax their guard a little and talk about the interests of the child. If they do not, they will go down as being the Government who favoured bosses before babies. I hope that that does not prove to be the case. Children should be given the highest priority.

Throughout the debates, both in Committee and in the other place, the Opposition have sought to improve on the Government's position. Some interesting exchanges have suggested that the Government are still in a rut and apparently listen more patiently to employers' organisations than organisations representing and supporting women of child-bearing age. That is an extraordinary position.

My hon. Friend the Member for Wallasey (Ms Eagle) referred, with the benefit of some personal knowledge, to the problems associated with multiple births. Knowing her sister as I do, I must say that if—or should I say when—she joins us in this place, it will present you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, with an enormous problem. I cannot tell the two women apart and I look forward to seeing the Speaker being foxed over that.

Mr. Alex Carlile (Montgomery): What is a collection of eagles called?

Mr. Miller: I am not sure.

My hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Northfield (Mr. Burden) mentioned an important aspect of the debate—the availability of child care for parents of young babies. It is undoubtedly extremely difficult to find child care for young babies. A recent Equal Opportunities Commission report states that fewer than 10 per cent. of children between birth and the age of four have places in non-family child care. Recent Government child care regulations require one worker for every three babies in day nurseries and other collective child care arrangements. Although that is welcome as a measure to improve the quality of care, it restricts the number of places for babies in some nurseries.

I hope, therefore, that the Government will have fresh thoughts as we see how the legislation proceeds. Thirty-six per cent. of mothers returning to full-time work rely heavily on child minders for care, but many child minders are reluctant to care for children under the age of six months. The National Childminding Association has commented that the nature of the care required for young babies is particularly intensive. That is likely to reduce the number of minders willing to look after them. Caring for a small baby can make it impossible for a child minder to look after any other child and can reduce her income significantly. The 53 per cent. of working mothers who rely on relatives for care may also find them unwilling to care for babies who are as young as three weeks.

The Select Committee on Health recently commented on the EC directive on the protection of pregnant women at work—a subject on which we have just heard an interesting exchange between the Minister of State and my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Northfield. The Committee says in its second report that the United Kingdom Government have "laid itself open to the accusation that it is only interested in the effects the Directive would have on employers and on the Treasury."

That underlines my point about the Government putting bosses before babies. Perhaps the Minister will try to refute that and adopt a more flexible approach to the legislation.

The maternity provisions of the Bill fail to give sufficient priority to the needs of the child. The legislation is wholly unsatisfactory, and I hope that the Government will give it another careful look.

Mr. Hartley Booth (Finchley): The speeches by the hon. Members for Birmingham, Northfield (Mr. Burden) and for Ellesmere Port and Neston (Mr. Miller) were classic examples of the Opposition's casual approach to placing burdens on business. They seem to discuss the issue as if it could be divided into two separate, unrelated boxes. They seem to think that the burden on the employer is wholly unrelated to the situation of the mother and the child. The fact is that placing too many burdens on employers jeopardises chances of employment as well as the position of mother and child. The two issues are linked at every stage.

Ms Eagle: That was precisely the argument used before a Labour Government passed the equal pay legislation. It was said that, if women were granted equal pay, it would represent an extra cost and would militate against women being employed. Since then, there has, of course, been a huge growth in the employment of women.

4.45 pm

Mr. Booth: I prefer to stick to the point in hand. I maintain that the Opposition treat burdens on employers casually. Their attempts to sidetrack me from the issue do not detract from the point that I am trying to make.

Our 14-week statutory period has been pooh-poohed by the Opposition, but Germany, Ireland and the two countries of the Iberian peninsula all have similar periods. It is a perfectly respectable period, and children and mothers can deal with it. It is accepted as a compromise.

I support Lord Ullswater's amendment. It was his proposal on 6 May that led to the suggestion that employers should be protected from mothers who come back at no notice to reclaim their jobs. This sensible amendment merely attempts to give employers seven days——

Mr. Burden: The hon. Gentleman will be reassured to learn that I do not intend to take up his phrase about protecting employers from mothers. I would, however, like to ask him about his international comparisons. I am sure that he would agree that it is important to compare like with like. Is he, for instance, aware that Germany gives 14 weeks on 100 per cent. of salary and Ireland gives 14 weeks on 70 per cent. of salary? One of the criticisms of the legislation is that it guarantees nothing about pay. Does the hon. Gentleman agree that that is a major omission from the Bill?

Mr. Booth: Pay is a matter for the DSS. I was only comparing the periods involved, and I do not want to widen the debate to other issues.

I support the Lords amendment because I think that we should prevent more burdens from being placed on employers. It would seem sensible of the Government to support that idea. That does not turn our party into a party that is against children or mothers—a ridiculous suggestion. The amendment prevents an additional burden from being imposed and allows for the smooth running of the workplace. Sudden events in the workplace cause friction and a great deal of trouble.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: We have had an interesting debate. When my hon. Friend the Member for Finchley (Mr. Booth) said that we should remove burdens, I thought that he was referring to the hon. Member for Birmingham, Northfield (Mr. Burden). Having heard his speech, I can see why my hon. Friend was provoked to adopt such an undemocratic view.

I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Finchley about the importance of striking a balance between employment rights and costs. Compared with our European partners, we in Britain can be proud of the much higher proportion of our labour force that is in employment and the larger percentage of women who work. Apart from Denmark, which has about the same number of women at work, we have the highest proportion in Europe. In common with Denmark, we have a deregulated labour market. We may have different views about social provision, but we take a similar approach in respect of regulation in the labour market.

The socialist paradises that Opposition Members draw to our attention seem to find it difficult to provide employment opportunities for as large a proportion of their work forces—and especially for women—as we in Britain are able to provide. In the debates that are now taking place in the Social Affairs Council and elsewhere, it is evident that our European partners are coming to recognise the importance of regulation in the destruction of job opportunities—a recognition that is singularly absent from the contributions of Opposition Members.

Hon. Members cannot say, on the one hand, that they wish to see more opportunities for women to work and thereby contribute to our economy and, on the other hand, that they are prepared for whatever burdens on business are involved in the employment of those women. What they propose would deprive women of opportunity, just as has happened in Europe. It is no coincidence that the countries cited as examples to be followed have not been able to achieve the employment and job opportunities that Britain has achieved.

Ms. Quin: The Minister may have given the wrong impression about Denmark, which has a Government whose views have much more in common with those of the Labour party than with those of the British Government. The current Danish presidency of the European Community particularly wants progress to be made on many of the social directives that the British Government say will put additional burdens on business; thus, it is hardly right for the Minister to claim Denmark as an ally.

Mr. Forsyth: I was not claiming Denmark as an ally; I was merely making the point that the Danish labour market is not regulated to the extent that the hon. Lady advocates. If she is saying that the Danish Government are about to embark on that course, I make a prediction: Denmark will not be alongside Britain at the top of the league in terms of the provision of employment opportunities for people of both sexes. The policies that Opposition Members advocate would destroy jobs—a fact that is becoming increasingly understood throughout the Community.

Ms Eagle: Does the Minister agree that, in almost all cases one can think of, men too are responsible for the birth of children? A woman' capacity to give birth should not be regarded as some kind of extra cost that she takes into the workplace—a cost that makes firms disinclined to employ her. Reasonable maternity provision should be associated with extended paternity provision; in that way, the costs could be shared between the genders, within the family, and employers would not be encouraged to regard the woman as a walking womb that imposes extra costs.

Mr. Forsyth: I agree with the hon. Lady on her biological points, but not on her labour market points. She must understand that it is not discriminatory to say that we must be careful about the costs that are imposed on employers. The hon. Lady's solution would involve more costs through the provision of paternity leave, but those costs would have to be borne by employers. Employers make their money by selling goods and services. If their goods and services are no longer competitively priced, employment opportunities are destroyed. There is a balance to be struck.

In suggesting that the Government are putting business before babies, the hon. Member for Ellesmere Port and Neston (Mr. Miller) ruined the quite good reputation that I thought he was building up following his service on the Standing Committee, where he seemed to be a thoughtful person who added a great deal to our debates. His description of a measure that provides a right to 14 weeks' maternity leave, with entitlement to all the normal benefits of contracts of employment, apart from wages or salary, as well as comprehensive protection against dismissal or unfair selection for redundancy on maternity-related grounds and new rights for women who have to be suspended from work on maternity-related health and safety grounds, is absurd. To say that this is putting bosses before babies is so ridiculous that I can only imagine that the hon. Gentleman does not really think it but put it in a press release to his local newspaper—or perhaps there is some other, equally fatuous, reason for his coming out with such nonsense.

Mr. Miller: I am grateful to the Minister for giving me an idea. I have not yet put this in a press release, but I think I shall now do so.

If the Government had listened more carefully to the advice of many professional organisation—particularly the Maternity Alliance—they could have gone much further without imposing any significant additional costs on employers. My hon. Friend the Member for Gateshead, East (Ms Quin) made the point in the context of the Federation of Small Businesses. Against that background, the Minister's remarks are churlish.

Mr. Forsyth: I should not be at all concerned if the hon. Gentleman were to issue such a silly press release. It might help to achieve the result that we should have had at the polls last year—the election of Mr. Andrew Pearce. A few more daft statements of that type will see the hon. Gentleman on his way out of the House.

Mr. Burden: I should like to press the Minister on the issue of costs. I shall try to avoid using the word "burden", but I may not succeed. The hon. Gentleman prayed Denmark in aid with regard to regulation. He probably knows that Denmark offers 28 weeks' maternity leave on 90 per cent. of salary. If the Minister regards that as a deregulated market, his view is different from mine. If he wishes to avoid the imposition of an excessive "burden" —I have used the word—on businesses but accepts the need to ensure decent maternity rights, he must accept also that the state should ensure decent levels of statutory provision. Would not that be better than cutting provision for working women?

Mr. Forsyth: The hon. Gentleman is getting frightfully muddled. He is confusing regulation of the labour market with benefits. We are not dicussing benefits, which are a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Security. What the hon. Gentleman has said about the provision of welfare services in Denmark is quite right. That is why Denmark has very high levels of taxation.

I was not making the point that Denmark is an ally; I was simply pointing out something that Opposition Members do not seem to recognise—that, comparatively speaking, a very high proportion of our population are in work. Let hon. Members consider countries—such as Spain, whose unemployment percentage is almost twice ours—that have embraced the minimum wage and all the other social protection policies so beloved of Opposition Members.

Of course Conservatives are committed to the provision of a fair deal for employees, but they are not prepared to accept advice that would put people on the dole. If people were unemployed, they would not have the benefit of the legislation that we have brought before the House over the past 14 years.

The hon. Members for Northfield and for Wallasey (Ms Eagle) said some very odd things. The hon. Lady said that no one could disagree with seven days' notice, yet the hon. Member for Gateshead began her speech by telling us that Opposition Members would vote against the amendment. As the hon. Lady has said that she could not possibly disagree with that, I expect to see her vote with the Government in the Division Lobby. The hon. Member for Northfield said that he did not imagine that anyone would not give notice; presumably he will be in the Division Lobby with us as well.

Ms Eagle: If the Minister had listened more carefully to the overall thrust of my remarks, he would not be quoting half-sentences out of context and he might have picked up that I said that the amendment dealt with a fairly trivial matter that happened on only a few occasions. Other matters affecting the health of mothers and babies are more serious and much more common, but the Government have seen fit not to deal with those. The thrust of my speech was that we should spend more time addressing the real issues rather than spend time on relatively trivial matters.

Mr. Forsyth: The hon. Lady has not added to what I have said. She said that the matter was trivial and that no one could disagree with seven days' notice. Now she says that she will vote against what she agrees is a reasonable provision because it is not something else. That is an extraordinary basis on which to vote down a perfectly sensible amendment.

Ms Eagle: It is tactical.

Mr. Forsyth: The hon. Lady says that it is tactical. Her constituents will be astonished if they find that her voting record on amendments or other legislation is based not on what is in them but on what she thinks should be in them. That is absurd. If that is the hon. Lady's best argument to justify her speeches, she had better get herself a new research assistant.

5 pm

Mr. Burden: I shall intervene before the Minister gets too carried away by what he perceives to be Opposition contradictions. In Committee, Conservative Members voted against amendments to ensure that women had clear rights not to be subjected to action by employers if they sought time off for ante-natal care and relaxation classes. Those hon. Members said that that happens anyway, but there is clear evidence from tribunal decisions that it does not. Conservative Members are throwing stones from glass houses.

Mr. Forsyth: I did not entirely understand the hon. Gentleman's point. My assessment of what he said is that he could not imagine that anyone would not give notice and that he would support the amendment.

Mr. Burden: I said that I could not imagine many women not giving notice. I then gave the hypothetical situation of a woman who does not give notice to her employer but returns unannounced to work, demanding her job from that moment. The net cost of that to the employer would be a few days' pay while the temporary employee was still there. I contrasted the Government's concern for the cost of that few days' pay with the extent to which they are prepared to amend the Bill to show a lack of concern for women who are denied access to decent child care, are unable to breast-feed their babies for long enough and face all the other problems associated with the fact that there is no maternity leave of 18 weeks.

Mr. Forsyth: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his explanation. He disagrees with the Government about the extent to which the protection should be extended. However, if he votes against the amendment, he will look ridiculous, because the amendment says that there should be seven days' notice. The hon. Gentleman gaily writes off a week's pay for a temporary worker as it if were of little consequence. That betrays the fact that he has never had to run a company or a small business and does not realise that such sums are often the difference between profit and loss. They also make a difference to growth of employment and employment opportunities. As we say in Scotland, "Many a mickle maks a muckle." The hon. Gentleman should be more careful with other people's money.

Ms Quin: I should not like the Minister to misunderstand our reason for voting against the amendment. As I have explained, the amendment adds a rule, an extra complexity, to an already complex system. From the beginning, we have argued for a comprehensive overhaul and simplification of the system of maternity leave. We are using the amendment as an example of the complexities that we have argued against all along.

The Minister has done little to justify the amendment. He has not said how many people will be affected by it, nor has he spoken about the number of people who were consulted before the amendment was tabled. If he could give us more information about that and say that he will look at the overall system of maternity leave with a view to making it much more simple, along the lines that we have suggested, that would be something else.

Mr. Forsyth: I am grateful to the hon. Lady for contradicting her hon. Friend the Member for Wallasey, who said that no one could disagree with seven days' notice. She was clearly wrong, because the hon. Member for Gateshead, East obviously disagrees with it. She says that it unnecessarily complicates the legislation. Following a commitment to the hon. Member for Gateshead, East, we tabled an amendment on Report to give women the choice of sick leave rather than maternity leave if they were absent between the 11th and the sixth week of the expected week of childbirth.

Again at the hon. Lady's request, I tabled an amendment to provide four weeks' extra protection against maternity-related dismissal in cases where a medically certified sickness prevents women from returning to work at the end of maternity leave. The hon. Lady did not urge me not to do that on the ground that it complicated the provisions, as it does. However, it is not a question of whether it complicates the provisions. We want a system that is workable. The legislation may be complex, but the position of the employer and the employee will be perfectly straightforward.

The hon. Member for Gateshead, East seems to apply one argument when it suits her and another when it suits people who are making representations. When the hon. Lady pressed me to table the amendments, she did not urge me to rush out and consult everybody. She wanted me to agree in Committee to consider the matter and table amendments at an early stage. She urged us to make those amendments in respect of the additional month after the end of the period that would be available for someone who was suffering from pregnancy-related sickness.

The CBI and others expressed reservations about those amendments. I have tabled a perfectly reasonable amendment, and the hon. Lady's colleagues have said that no one could disagree with it. However, because it has come from the CBI and is subject to exactly the same process as her amendments, she criticises us for not conducting proper consultation.

We are a listening Government. We listened to the arguments and tabled amendments in the light of discussions at every stage. The amendments will result in substantial extra benefits for women who become pregnant while they are still at work. Opposition Members cannot bring themselves to acknowledge that it is a good measure and fulfils the Government's manifesto commitment.

The hon. Members for Northfield and for Wallasey said that the Government had abstained on the vote on the European directive. We abstained because we thought that it was being issued on an inappropriate treaty base. It is extraordinary that Opposition Members should question our enthusiasm for the directive as adopted because we abstained on the issue of the treaty base. My right hon.

[Mr. Forsyth]

Friend the then Secretary of State for Employment moved heaven and earth in the presidency to conclude the Council's deliberations following the intervention of the European Parliament. That Parliament tried to overturn an agreed position by the Council of Ministers, thus risking the destruction of the directive itself. It was thanks to the Government's efforts in the presidency that the directive was brought into force. Opposition Members suggested that the Labour party in the European Parliament carried the day; in fact, it was the European Parliament, and the conflict that arose between it and the Council of Ministers, that put the directive at risk.

Ms Eagle: The Minister has just explained why the Government chose to abstain, although they really agreed with all the directive's provisions. Was that a tactical decision?

Mr. Forsyth: If the hon. Lady follows such matters closely, she will know that we abstained on the working time directive. As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State made clear, we did not accept the treaty base, and we shall be challenging the directive in the European Court. When we believe that the treaty base is wrong, we shall abstain. The hon. Lady clearly does not pay careful attention to these matters.

The position on the EC pregnant workers directive was made clear. A common position text was agreed in December last year; it was originally produced by the Dutch presidency, because the Commission's original proposal was unacceptable to the great majority of member states. The treaty base, which we challenged, provided for qualified majority voting, not unanimity, and the United Kingdom was never in a position to threaten a veto—if that is what the hon. Member for Wallasey was implying. Ultimately, the United Kingdom secured agreement through its presidency; that is why the directive applies throughout Europe. The legislation is before the House because we had made a manifesto commitment to present such measures. We have been as good as our manifesto commitment and we were elected to implement it.

Mr. Burden: Can we be clear about the nature of the disagreements that we are discussing?

Mr. Deputh Speaker (Mr. Michael Morris): Order. Not unless they are related to the amendment.

Mr. Burden: I am sure that they are, Mr. Deputy Speaker, on the ground that the Minister has been referring to them himself——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I was about to call the Minister to order.

Mr. Forsyth: I apologise, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I was misled by Opposition Members, who made scurrilous remarks about the Government while you were not in the Chair, and thus unable to remind them of the matter under discussion. I hasten to add that I am making no criticism of Madam Speaker.

Rather than proceeding further with my speech, I invite the House to endorse the amendment. It is perfectly reasonable, as Opposition Members have said. I look forward to seeing the hon. Members for Northfield and for Wallasey in the Aye Lobby.

Question put and agreed to.

Lords amendment: No. 25, in page 42, line 40, at end insert—

.—(1) An employee who intends to return to work earlier than the end of her maternity leave period shall give to her employer not less than seven days notice of the date on which she intends to return.

(2) If an employee returns to work as mentioned in subsection (1) without notifying her employer of her intention to do so or without giving him the notice required by that subsection her employer shall be entitled to postpone her return to a date such as will secure, subject to subsection (3), that he has seven days notice of her return.

(3) An employer is not entitled under subsection (2) to postpone an employee's return to work to a date after the end of her maternity leave period.

(4) If an employee who has been notified under subsection (2) that she is not to return to work before the date specified by her employer does return to work before that date the employer shall be under no contractual obligation to pay her remuneration until the date specified by him as the date on which she may return.")—[Mr. Michael Forsyth.]

Motion made, and Question put, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment:—

Lords amendments Nos. 26 to 28 agreed to.

New Clause

Lords amendment: No. 29—Entitlement to itemised pay settlement—

(". After section 146(4) of the 1978 Act (provisions disapplied in relation to employment below minimum number of hours weekly) there shall be inserted—

"(4A) Subject to subsection (4B), subsection (4) shall have effect as respects section 8 subject to the following modifications, namely—

(a) the substitution of a reference to eight hours weekly for the reference to sixteen hours weekly, and

(b) the omission of the words "Subject to subsection (5), (6) and (7)",

(4B) Subsection (4A) shall not apply in relation to employment if, at the relevant date, the number of employees employed by the employer, added to the number employed by any associated employer, is less than twenty.

(4C) For the purposes of subsection (4B) "relevant date" means the date on which any payment of wages or salary is made to an employee in respect of which he would, apart from subsection (4B), have the right to an itemised pay statement."")

Read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Morris): With this it will be convenient also to discuss Lords amendment No. 41.

Ms Quin: I beg to move, as an amendment to the Lords amendment, amendment (a) leave out subsection (4B).

This is an important amendment and we will seek to divide the House on it, as it seeks to establish an important right for many part-time workers who will not otherwise be covered by the welcome concession by the Government.

The amendment concerns the right of employees to receive an itemised pay statement. Many of us feel that that is a basic right for all people in employment. However, until the Government agree to amend the Bill, employees who work for between eight hours and 16 hours a week have to work for the same employer for five years before they have the right to an itemised pay statement. We find it quite amazing that some people have to work for one employer for that length of time before they can enjoy what most of us would consider a basic and necessary right.

We are glad that, in order to respond to concerns expressed by hon. Members on both sides of the House, the Government have agreed to extend the right to an itemised pay statement to many part-time workers who work for between eight and 16 hours per week. The Lords amendment excludes part-time workers working between eight and 16 hours in firms with fewer than 20 employees. We feel strongly that that rather large derogation from the new rule is unjustified, so we have tabled our amendment to do away with it.

The arguments advanced by the Minister in the other place in favour of the amendment were similar to those that I would put forward in favour of our amendment, which extends that right even further. In the other place, the Minister said that employees should have the right to know how their pay is made up, with which I am sure my hon. Friends agree strongly. But we do not see why that right should be denied to workers in firms with fewer than 20 employees.

5.30 pm

Mr. Alex Carlile: Does the hon. Lady agree that the majority of difficult contractual disputes between employers and employees arise in smaller firms, particularly those with half a dozen to a dozen employees, where the hours of work may not be fully noted and where the conditions may not be fully recorded because they vary from time to time? Does she further agree that the Lords amendment will remove a necessary protection from a large number of workers if the figure is as high as 20?

Ms Quin: I agree with the points made by the hon. and learned Gentleman, to which I shall come later. The evidence available to us suggests that what the hon. and learned Gentleman says is right and that the greatest difficulties have arisen for workers in small firms who have wanted itemised pay statements but have been unable to obtain them.

Unfortunately, there is much evidence that the denial of itemised pay statements to employees is part and parcel of an attempt by employers criminally to defraud the Treasury by not registering employees properly for national insurance purposes. Therefore, they have been happy to deny their employees this right. Unless employees caught in that situation have written evidence of deductions from their pay, they might even be thought to be colluding with the employer in such frauds and malpractices. That is another important reason why we want to extend the right to an itemised pay statement as widely as possible.

There is no doubt that having the right to an itemised pay statement would simplify the process of resolving disputes over pay and deductions which can arise, causing problems for employers and employees. In addition, the right to an itemised pay statement can be crucial to an employee's attempt to gain benefits to which he is entitled. Without such written proof in the form of an itemised pay statement, an employee may have great difficulty in proving his entitlement to benefits which may enable him to make ends meet. We are talking not about something theoretical, but about something that is of immense practical help to people if the system is made to work properly.

It is also important for employees to have written proof of their pay—and conditions—if they transfer to another employer who asks for such information. I should also mention the value of such a system to the Child Support Agency that the Government have set up. There again, a person may need proof of his or her financial situation in the form of an itemised pay statement in order to support his or her case.

It is odd that the Government should be so keen to ensure that the check-off arrangement should be spelt out in seemingly endless detail, as they clearly were in the early parts of the Bill, but are not prepared to allow every employee the basic right to an itemised pay statement. Surely, if the Government are so keen on allowing employees to see what deductions are made for trade union subscriptions, they should also be keen for employers to show employees the state of their pay and the full range of deductions.

Those are important matters, to which, to be fair to the Government, the Minister in another place referred, but, having made those important points, he agreed, surprisingly, to deny so many people the right to an itemised pay statement.

The Government have come out with some curious arguments for not wishing to extend that right to all people, even in small companies. The argument about costs has been put forward, but I do not know whether the Government will be able to persuade us today any more easily than the Minister in the other place was able to persuade the Members there. He singularly failed to convince them of what he was saying about costs. The cost of giving employees an itemised statement may be slight. The Minister in the other place agreed that various standard proformas were available, making it easy for employers to complete such requirement.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: During the discussion on the previous set of amendments, the hon. Lady criticised me for bringing forward an amendment without having consulted widely. Does she not think that it would be right for the Government, having consulted on this matter, to take account of the representations that we have received from organisations such as the Forum of Private Business?

Ms Quin: I hope that the Minister will consider the information and evidence available to him from all quarters. We have received interesting information from the National Association of Citizens Advice Bureaux and organisations such as the Fawcett Society. They have talked to employers in some detail in order to try to work out the costs involved.

They concluded that many employers can produce itemised pay statements without any difficulty whatever, that they can be absorbed into existing administrative costs and that the booklets of proforma statements, which can be easily completed, would make that an easy job for small businesses. I hope that the Minister will address that evidence, as well as other representations made to him. I can only go on the representations that have been made to us, which have all been in favour of extending that right to many, if not all, employees.

It is not only Opposition Members who are concerned about that issue. In Committee, the hon. Member for Tiverton (Mrs. Browning) spoke first about extending that right to part-time workers—those who work between eight and 16 hours per week. We agreed strongly with the points that she made, and it was partly as a result of her representations that the Government tabled this amendment. However, I am not sure that the hon. Lady would support the Minister in this derogation for companies with fewer than 20 employees.

Mr. Michael Forsyth indicated assent.

Ms Quin: The Minister is nodding. In that case I am disappointed with the hon. Lady, because it goes against many of the arguments that she advanced in Committee, where she spoke of the individuals about whom we are concerned in this amendment—those working in small companies that may exploit them by not giving them this information.

I well remember the Minister in Committee making one of his revealing jokes. He said that there seemed to be cross-party agreement about the amendment, which probably meant that it was wrong. That tells us something about the Minister's attitude. I urge him to take into consideration the comments made not only from this side of the House but by Conservative Members in Committee, as well as the wealth of opinion from the Fawcett Society and the National Association of Citizens Advice Bureaux, to which I pay tribute for its work on that issue.

I refer also to the views of organisations such as the townswomen's guilds, the National Federation of Women's Institutes and the United Kingdom Federation of Business and Professional Women, which all support the argument that we are advancing today. Those organisations carry considerable weight, not least in Conservative constituencies. The Minister ought to take that into account, consult those organisations, and learn their views. They feel strongly that many employees are being denied a basic right that most people would consider normal and natural in a civilised society.

I referred to evidence collected by various organisations that some employers who are trying to defraud the authorities deny employees the right to an itemised pay statement. NACAB states that many employers do not issue employees with itemised pay statements, and that there is often doubt whether the employer is paying tax and national insurance contributions on behalf of the employee.

A CAB in Essex reported that employees at one establishment were paid in cash, and handed back an amount to cover their tax and national insurance—but had no evidence whether those moneys were being passed on to the appropriate authorities. No itemised pay statement was issued, and the employer "turned nasty" when asked for one. The CAB's client found another job and asked for her P45. Instead of receiving an updated P45, that which she had originally given the first employer was returned to her—which seems to prove that that employer was trying to defraud the system and to avoid the regulations covering both employers and employees.

A CAB in Warwickshire reported a client whose wages were paid partly by cheque and partly in cash, to enable the employer to default on national insurance and PAYE. The bureau explained that, as the client lived in a tied cottage, she was very reluctant to complain, because obviously not only her job but also her home was at risk.

A CAB in Shropshire commented:

"It is often only when employees leave their employment that they discover that their employer has not been deducting or paying over PAYE, income tax and national insurance contributions."

It is extremely important for the right to an itemised pay statement to be widely available, so that attempted fraud can be overcome.

The right hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile) mentioned the number of people who might be affected. The Government are excluding many by the derogation that the amendment introduces. Figures supplied by the Library suggest that 7 million employees work in businesses having fewer than 20 employees—about 31 per cent. of all those in work. A number work for only between eight and 16 hours a week. I do not have Government figures, but I believe that hundreds of thousands of workers would be affected by the Government's proposal. I should be grateful for any figures that the Minister can give.

I understand that about 780,000 people work more than eight hours but fewer than 16 hours a week in companies employing fewer than 20 people. That substantial figure represents the number who will fall foul of the Government's amendment. We ask the Minister to consider those 780,000 people and their right to an itemised pay statement.

5.45 pm

The Minister may argue that there is nothing to stop employers issuing itemised pay statements. That is true, but we are concerned about employers who do not observe that practice. If many firms are already able to issue such statements, we see no reason why others should not be able similarly to comply.

We are concerned also about employees who work fewer than eight hours a week. Although we have not tabled an amendment on that specific issue, it touches on the Government amendment under consideration. We see no justification for the eight-hour cut-off limit. In Committee, the Minister said that it would be inconvenient for employers to issue pay statements to those who only work two or three hours a week, but I ask the Minister to view the matter from the employee's point of view.

An employee may work fewer than eight hours in one job but additional hours in another job. He or she may need to prove total entitlement to certain benefits, want to transfer to another employer, or meet all the other possible scenarios that I mentioned earlier.

Many people in Britain today work in unsatisfactory part-time jobs. Sometimes, they have two or three such jobs—and may ultimately find it difficult to claim pension or other entitlements if they are unable to prove that they have worked as many hours as they have.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The hon. Lady suggests that anyone in Britain who employs a cleaning lady, gardener, or someone else to do the odd job should be required—regardless of the amount of time worked—to produce an itemised pay statement as a matter of law. Is that her proposal?

Ms Quin: Employees, no matter in what capacity they work, should receive an itemised pay statement if they want one. Under the Government's rules, they will have no such entitlement. The Government do not understand the difficulties confronting many people in Britain today who have been casualised by Government employment policies. They work week in, week out in unsatisfactory conditions of employment, and then discover that the hours worked count for very little in respect of their benefits and pension rights, and that there is little to which to look forward in the future. They are therefore twice handicapped.

I beg the Minister to examine more carefully than he seems prepared to do some of the dire working conditions that obtain in Britain today, of which the denial of an itemised pay statement is part and parcel. It may seem a small part, but it is an important element in an unsatisfactory equation.

By removing the derogation for firms employing 20 or fewer employees and the time limit, the Minister will take a small but significant step towards improving the lot of part-time and temporary workers.

We are concerned that part-time workers appear to have such a bad deal. In order to be entitled to many employment rights, they have to work for one employer for five years, which, in effect, denies about two thirds of part-time workers any employment rights at all. It is an absolute scandal.

Other European countries do not make the same rigid distinctions between full-time and part-time workers; nor do they distinguish between different types of part-time work. For example, they do not distinguish between part-time work lasting 16 hours or eight hours, a distinction which is so unfavourable for many part-time workers in Britain.

The Government should consider far more seriously extending full-time employment rights to part-time workers. They sometimes accuse us of being anti part-time workers. We are not, but we are anti part-time work in appalling conditions. We want part-time work to be a tremendous opportunity for women and men, but unfortunately it is not: it is merely a way of exploiting them and giving them fewer employment rights than their full-time counterparts. We are not opposed to part-time work—we are very much in favour of it—but we do not want it to be used to penalise people for the rest of their working lives, which is what appears to be happening under the system approved by the Government.

I refer the Minister of State to the excellent report produced some time ago by the Committee which considers European legislation in another place. It is a very good report, which pours cold water on the Government's claims about the extra costs incurred in extending many employment rights to part-time workers. If the Minister studies the information in detail, he will see that a very impressive case was made for extending such rights to part-time workers.

Indeed, a survey referred to in the Committee's report showed that less than 1 per cent. of firms which were contacted quoted poorer employment rights as the reason for employing part-time workers. Generally, there seemed to be a great lack of conviction in the Government's case that extending even basic rights to part-time workers would cost the earth. The evidence for the Government's argument is patchy, but the evidence that British part-time workers are getting a poor deal is not patchy but overwhelming.

I urge the Minister to do what he has often said he favours, and encourage quality part-time work by accepting the ideas that we have proposed in all the debates. As a modest beginning, he could welcome the amendment and thus allow those who want an itemised pay statement to have it. It is a basic right, which should no longer be denied.

Mr. Alex Carlile: My comments relate to the 20-employee limit. I am surprised that the Government have chosen such a high figure. It is almost inconceivable that an employer who has 19, 15 or even a dozen employees could remain in business if he was incapable of filling in a small form setting out the items that comprise an employee's pay. It does not require sophisticated machinery, a chartered accountant or a qualified bookkeeper to do so; it requires only a duplicate pad on which the employer's bookkeeper—who is often not qualified—jots down for the benefit of the employee the number of hours worked, the hourly rate for the work, any overtime, and any other items which make up his pay. If an employer is not capable of carrying out such rudimentary book work, it is unlikely that he will stay in business very long.

As I am sure the Government have learnt in the past three years in particular, it is often small firms which go bankrupt or into liquidation because they are incapable of completing their books properly. The resulting debt is often crippling for the victims. All hon. Members are aware of small businesses in their constituencies whose proprietors have faced bankruptcy or near-bankruptcy because of the inefficiency of other small firms and organisations purchasing from them.

I would suggest that modest bookkeeping requirements, including the provision of itemised pay statements, help towards the necessary measure of efficiency. I do not suggest that the requirement should be placed on the very smallest employers, those employing two, three, or perhaps fewer than half a dozen employees. In that respect, I take a slightly different view from the Labour party, but an employer who employs more than half a dozen people can be regarded as significant in an employment market where such a large proportion of working people are employed in small firms.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: I hear what the hon. and learned Gentleman is saying: He agrees with the Government that there should be an exemption for small firms, but says that it should apply to those employing six rather than 20 people. The Liberal party has not tabled an amendment to reflect that view. I should have thought that, if the hon. and learned Gentleman believed that the figure should be six rather than 20, he would have been able to make a case for that idea and tabled an amendment. What does he expect the Government to do in response to his representations, given the fact that we have reached this stage in our consideration of the Bill?

Mr. Carlile: I do not harbour the illusion that the hon. Gentleman would have urged his right hon. and hon. Friends to vote for such an amendment had I tabled it. It is for the Government to make the regulations. They are well aware of representations that have been made. [Interruption.] If the Minister will listen for a moment, I repeat that the Government are well aware of the all-party representations made on this issue in Committee.

As we have been reminded, it was the hon. Member for Tiverton (Mrs. Browning), who is sitting behind the Minister, who urged on the Committee—indeed, who assisted Labour Members in urging on the Committee—an amendment that was incorporated in part in Lords amendment No. 29. It is somewhat surprising that the hon. Lady now seems to accept that the 20-employee limit is appropriate. When the Government fix an appropriate level, they should act in the interests of both employers and employees.

In an intervention, the Minister of State mentioned the Forum of Private Business. I have considerable regard for that organisation, which provides useful information to hon. Members, enabling us to keep abreast of the requirements and concerns of small employers in particular. However, the organisation is not always right. Of course, the way in which it collects its material is founded on the sending of questionnaires for which it devises the questions.

Mr. Michael Forsyth rose——

Mr. Carlile: I shall give way in a moment.

As a result, the information provided by the questionnaires may not always be entirely reliable in considering such issues. Does the Minister still want me to give way?

Mr. Forsyth: I will just say that there were no Liberal representatives on the Committee, but, had the hon. and learned Gentleman had the pleasure of serving on it, as many hon. Members present today did, he would know that we listened to the Opposition's arguments and accepted many amendments.

Mr. Miller: Many?

Mr. Forsyth: Many. My point is that at no stage have the Liberals tabled an amendment suggesting that six rather than 20 would be the appropriate limit. I am rather surprised to hear the hon. and learned Gentleman talk down the importance of representations made by the Forum of Private Business, but we had similar representations from the Confederation of British Industry.

Mr. Carlile: I was telling the Minister that it is surprising to hear that the hon. Member for Tiverton, who in Committee apparently asked for something rather more extensive, now seems to accept the rather grudging 20-employee limit. That point was entirely fairly made.

Mr. Forsyth rose——

Mr. Carlile: I shall not give way to the Minister again, because we do not want a ping-pong debate.

I regret that the Government have not dealt with the amendment in the spirit that I understood from reading the Committee debate—I did not have the advantage of serving on the Committee—was the basis on which the Minister responded to that debate. In response to his claim that I tried to talk down the Forum of Private Business, I add that I did the precise opposite. I was at pains to point out that the information that that organisation provided was helpful. Nevertheless, it is not always right, and in my view it was not right on that occasion.

There is another practical aspect of the 20-employee limit that the Government should consider seriously. Disputes that arise about terms and conditions of employment often relate to hours worked, and especially to whether national insurance contributions should have been paid, or whether the full tax due under the PAYE arrangements has been paid. As the Minister intervened in my speech, I should be grateful if he would take the trouble to listen for the next two or three minutes. I was addressing a comment to him in the hope that he might respond to it when he replies to the debate.

As the Minister knows, the disputes that arise between employers and employees relate to a contract between the two parties. An employee is often at a considerable disadvantage if he has no documentary evidence of the terms and conditions of his employment, and especially of the hours worked in a particular week or other period. If an employer chooses to act dishonestly—he may well choose to do so if the issue is whether national insurance contributions or tax should have been paid—he can enter false particulars in his records at the time when the dispute arises. I am afraid that my experience over more than 20 years as a practitioner in the courts is that, unfortunately, that is just the sort of thing that happens from time to time. Of course, most employers are completely honest, but the employers with whom employees have the greatest difficulty are often those who are not.

When, for example, an employee comes to his Member of Parliament and says that he is in dispute with his former employer, who should have paid national insurance contributions, the first thing that the conscientious Member of Parliament asks to see is documentary evidence of the employment. If the employee is not entitled to an itemised pay statement, even when he has been working as many as 16 hours a week, he is at a disadvantage. This can lead to a contest between the oral evidence of the employee and the not always entirely accurate or honest written evidence of the employer. Such disputes take up much time. They come before small claims courts regularly and take up the time of citizens advice bureaux. It is notable that the National Association of Citizens Advice Bureaux takes precisely the same view as I.

Why are the Government not prepared to impose on businesses that are not the smallest the relatively minor requirement to provide a weekly or monthly statement of particulars for employees? It is not asking much. I ask the Minister to explain the reasoning behind the views expressed by the CBI to which he referred. We have not heard the reasoning in the debate so far and there cannot be many CBI members who either could or would wish to take advantage of the distinction that the Government, with the arbitrary cut-off limit of 20 employees, seek to draw between large and small businesses.

If the Minister is unwilling to change his mind, I ask him at least to give the House an assurance. My request is supported by the National Association of Citizens Advice Bureaux, which is concerned about the issue. Will he ensure that his Department monitors the operation of the 20-employee limit? I understand that it could be altered by statutory regulations, so primary legislation would not be needed. If the Minister were prepared to monitor the operation of the limit, and if the Government found that abuse was taking place, it would be possible to introduce regulations to reduce the limit. I hope that the Minister will find that to be a reasonable approach.

Mr. Gyles Brandreth (City of Chester): I rise briefly to encourage the House to support the Lords amendments and to resist the blandishments of the hon. Member for Gateshead, East (Ms Quin). I should declare two interests, one as a trade unionist—I am a member of Equity, enjoying what the union kindly describes as "honourable withdrawal", which I trust will continue for a full three decades—and the other as someone who is unwittingly currently taking part in an experiment on the 48-hour week, as it is 36 hours since we who serve on the Standing Committee on the Finance Bill last saw our beds.

I urge the House to support Lords amendment No. 29, because everything in it is good sense. Clearly, it reflects a recognition of the changes in the labour market—both the considerable increase in the number of women in the labour market in recent years and the great increase in part-time workers. Incidentally, I look forward to studying the book by the hon. Member for Peckham (Ms Harman), as I am sure it is full of interesting information on that very topic.

The nub of the disagreement between the two sides of the House involves the 20-employee limit. The essence of what I wish to share with the House is what I have heard from employers in my constituency—yes, they are members of the Forum of Private Business. I sometimes think that Opposition Members have had little experience of running small businesses. There is no doubt that small businesses are the source of growth. Larger businesses grow from smaller businesses.

Mr. Miller: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman intends to tell us about his experience as a small business man. Does he provide itemised pay statements for the employees in the small businesses with which he has been involved?

Mr. Brandreth: Yes, indeed. That is a marvellous example of good practice, and we want to encourage it. That is why the requirement is in the Bill. But we want to get the balance right. We do not want to impose compulsorily on small businesses—[HON. MEMBERS: "Why not?"] We want to encourage good practice. No doubt, in the fulness of time, more and more small businesses will provide itemised pay statements, but they do not wish to have their hands tied. This is all about getting the balance right. People asked for a listening Government and they have got one. We listen to the small businesses and we say, "We want to do this; it is good practice. But we also want to enable you to conduct your business in the way that you think best."

Mr. Frank Field (Birkenhead): I have been listening to the hon. Gentleman. Is there not a real weakness in his argument, in that it relies on good practice on a voluntary basis? Presumably he, as a small business man, provides itemised pay slips because he is a good business person, he has nothing to fear and he pays his national insurance contributions as he should. The worry about the voluntary system is that those who do not provide the information are those who most need to do so. Surely that is where, in any civilised society, the law has some part to play.

Mr. Brandreth: The whole idea is to extend good practice. That is what Conservative Members want, but Labour Members have made it clear that they would like workers who work fewer than eight hours to be included. The hon. Member for Ellesmere Port and Neston (Mr. Miller) is nodding enthusiastically at the prospect of somebody working for one or two hours a week and being entitled to an itemised pay statement. That is because Labour Members are the friends of bureaucracy and regulation and want to increase the burden. We want to encourage good practice and, at the same time, allow small businesses to work and to grow. This is a small piece of legislation, but it is vital and I thoroughly commend it to the House.

Mr. Frank Field: I want to support the argument advanced by my hon. Friend the Member for Gateshead, East (Ms Quin) and in so doing to add two further lines of argument.

I want to develop the line that the hon. Member for City of Chester (Mr. Brandreth) has just taken, in which he accused Labour Members of paying no attention to what is happening in the labour market. The changes that my hon. Friend the Member for Gateshead, East advanced were based on what is happening in that market. An increasing number of people are active in the Labour party —the labour market, rather; thank God the two are not comparable, or the economy would be totally down the drain—and are part of what is called the flexible labour market. If we are not to store up trouble for those people and huge bills for taxpayers later, it is important that we ensure that minimum services are given and contributions are both paid and recorded.

The argument advanced by my hon. Friend the Member for Gateshead, East—that we should be concerned about both the cut-off point for employers with fewer than 20 employees and the hours cut-off point—is crucial. When we look back on our working lives, let alone those of our grandchildren, we will be amazed at the number of people who at some time worked for a few hours and at other times worked hours more like what we would call a full-time week. If, during those working lives, we are to build up contributions to the national insurance fund and, more important, as time goes by, to universalise private pension arrangements, we should ensure that all employees are safely linked in to building up wealth, from which they can draw on later in their lives.

I hope that our argument, and the amendments that we have tabled, are seen as part of a broader argument for changes in, for example, national insurance contributions. At the moment, the labour market is rigged. As Mrs. Thatcher once said, however, "You can't buck the market." If employers' national insurance contributions are not required below £56 a week, we cannot be surprised when there is a massive extension in part-time jobs.

I hope that Labour Members will increasingly call for employers' contributions to start at the first pound of earnings—not because we want to increase the amount of money raised by national insurance contributions, but because it is important to have a level playing field, whereby employers and employees can work out how many hours of work are offered and how many hours people want to work, rather than have a financial incentive that gears job creation to part-time jobs.

If we take seriously the argument of the hon. Member for City of Chester—that we should be concerned with developments in the labour market—we will see him in our Lobby tonight. Changes in the labour market and an increase in the number of what are called "flexible workers" make our argument carry that much more force and leave the Government in some difficulty trying to defend their position.

If the Government genuinely believe in not rigging markets and in level playing fields, workers' rights should begin with the first hour of earnings. The standards that the hon. Member for City of Chester applies in his own business will, we hope, be applied by all employers. The bad employers would apply those standards because the law compels them to do so and the good employers—who, we hope, are the vast majority—would have no difficulty in fulfilling that requirement because they already do so.

That is one of the arguments that I wish to advance. The other is about minimum standards. The Government have knocked away minimum standards in our society. We have seen that with the mutilation and abolition of wages councils and the abolition of the fair wages resolution and of security for people against being unfairly sacked. If I were speaking to members of the Tory party, they would have no difficulty in understanding my argument, but in the past 15 years a group of 19th-century liberals have climbed aboard the Tory party, thrown the crew overboard and steered the ship in a completely different direction.

There must be minimum standards. The body politic and the economic arrangements of a society are like the complicated human body, which needs checks and balances; throwing them away results in some very distorted positions and gross exploitation of the weakest members of the labour market. I hope that, as we think about the next election, when we recognise that we are living in an economy governed by a social market, to which we have no fundamental alternative, we make a case against the unacceptable faces of a social market economy as run by this Government.

Guaranteeing minimum standards for people at the bottom of the pile is one feature. Therefore, I very much support the arguments that were advanced by my hon. Friend the Member for Gateshead, East. In so doing, I merely wish to correct the record, because in some debates on the Bill it has been suggested that I am against minimum wage proposals. That is untrue. I have cautioned my party about the employment consequences of a minimum wage—of setting it at an absurd level in the early stages—and about the need for it to be very low, for it to be offset by reductions in national insurance contributions, and to link it to an industrial strategy for training and investment to increase productivity. I have not made a stand against a minimum wage, but have cautioned as to how we implement it.

If Labour is successfully to challenge the unacceptable faces of a social market economy, it must come out very clearly in favour of laying down minimum standards, not in a way that kills the goose that lays the golden egg but with the confidence of a party that knows that all these questions are matters of balance and feels that it has that balance correct. Tonight, we can take one small step against the unacceptable faces that have driven wage rates down to less than £2 for workers in the Birkenhead jobcentre. That is not acceptable. We want counter-measures to tackle that.

As we approach a much more flexible economy, it is crucial that employers do not get their employees on the cheap—that employers do not deny them their rights to have their national insurance contributions paid and to become part of a universalise provision of private pensions. We must ensure that those contributions are paid, because if we do not, and if the Government get their way, that failure will put that much extra cost on taxpayers and welfare in the future.

I hope that the Labour party increasingly accepts a reform of welfare which sees the budget being reduced because we have been so successful in knitting people into jobs and into wealth that comes from work and from owning wealth. If that happened, there would be less need for people to draw on what we have traditionally thought of as the welfare state. If that is to be our approach, the House will oppose the Government today. They are moving away from that situation and are increasingly putting the costs back on the employees, and especially those who are least able to bear that cost.

I welcome the decision of my hon. Friend the Member for Gateshead, East to divide the House. We will divide the House tonight on an aspect of the unacceptable faces of the social market economy. Those unacceptable faces are now the big divide between the two major parties in the Chamber.

Mr. Thomas Graham (Renfrew, West and Inverclyde): The Government's attitude never ceases to amaze me. I find it incredible that we are talking about people as if they were a motor car that was being repaired. Many hon. Members will have had their car fixed and then checked the bill. The bill is itemised, so that the customer can see how much he is being charged per hour for the fitter and the electrician and how much for oil and for the parts. It is not difficult. We live in a high-tech world where computers are an everyday thing, and where schoolkids probably know more about computers than any hon. Member.

Has any young person been asked how he feels about the proposal? The Government seem to have asked the Confederation of British Industry and the Federation of Small Businesses. I do not know one young person under the age of 20 who has been approached by the Government and asked about the abolition of anything that relates to young people. They have been taken out of the wage councils and have lost some of their rights to protection. There is now a suggestion that they will not get even an itemised wages slip. That is quite incredible.

Despite the problems that the country faces, the Government are spending time supporting a Lords amendment such as this. I find that lamentable. Young people in my constituency want the right to get a job, to get training and to get a full education that will take them into a decent arena of work. Perhaps the Minister would agree with me. I know plenty of young people who would like the Minister's job, and would probably do a far better job than he does. In fact, I guarantee that nearly every 20-year-old in my constituency could do a far better job in coming forward with employment rights to suit the needs and requirements of young people than the Minister.

I am trying to use my English accent rather than my Glasgow accent so that the Minister will understand. The nitpicking of the Government is unbelievable. The Bill is about trade union reform and employment rights, and we are saying to young folk under 20 that they will not get their rights. The Government want employers not to bother telling their young employees what their deductions are. They do not want to tell the young people what they are earning. Those young people may be working for eight, 10 or 16 hours and they will not be told what they have earned.

We heard from the Government how many part-time workers are contributing to the country's economy. Are we going to treat them like a lump of stone to be shoved about, or are we going to treat them like human beings? I resent the Government treating our people like cannon fodder to be blown about and to be treated in such a fashion. The House is not talking about animals; it is talking about people. Surely our people have the right to be treated in a dignified fashion. If they work for an hour, they are entitled to know what their wages are for that hour. They are entitled to get a pay slip.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Normally, the hon. Gentleman and I get on extremely well in debates such as this. Could I draw to his attention the fact that we are discussing a Government amendment which, precisely as he asks, gives people the right to an itemised pay statement? The Opposition amendment seeks to amend our amendment to remove the limit that has been set to exclude small employers. That is the issue. I should not want the hon. Gentleman to be put in a position where Conservative Members might decide that his job could be better done by a 20-year-old as well.

Mr. Graham: I am convinced that literally hundreds of thousands of young people under the age of 20 could do a far superior job. I am here to give the House the benefit of my experience in a way that is fitting, given that my constituents sent me to this place.

Could the Minister say why the matter has been discussed with employers only? Why has it not been discussed with young people? The Government never discuss anthing with the young people of this country, and they are treated like cannon fodder. In a war such as there was in the Gulf, it would not be long before the young people were in the front line and lying down and dying for this country. The Government would demand that they go to war.

Why do not the Government recognise the right of young people to an itemised wage bill? Why should not young people see a breakdown of their pay? I know of plenty of duff employers. I know of some savage employers who have gone bankrupt and out of business. Some are hiding in Cyprus or Spain and did not pay any tax for their employees. I know some kids who are waiting for their holiday pay. I know people who have waited years for their holiday pay because they did not get it from a bum, bad employer. I have a list of those companies as long as my arm. We can supply the Minister with the list if he wants us to.

I am sick and tired of the House debating the subject of young people without any real consideration for their thoughts. We are turning out some of the biggest bunch of old fogeys in the western world. Unfortunately, when I sit in the House, I realise that I am an old fogey along with other hon. Members. I have two young sons who do not miss me. When I come home, they ask: "When is the House going to get its act together? Why are there thousands and thousands of their pals on the dole who cannot get work and who want to work? Why are not the young people getting a proper education or proper training?"

I challenged the Minister on the question of training credits for young people. I was told that there were thousands of training credits in my area. Last night, I asked an executive of Scottish Enterprise how many folk were getting the credits. The answer was none. There were six getting credits in Dunbarton and others elsewhere in Scotland. The point is that I got bum information, which was neither suitable nor acceptable to my constituents. If the Minister can get that wrong, he can get the amendment wrong, too.

The other day I got a telephone bill from British Telecom. Have hon. Members seen it? There is an itemised bill—no problem. The customer sees that he has spent 64p here and 54p there, or talked for a minute here and one and a half minutes there. The customer can find out whether his wife has overdone the phone bill—my wife usually says that I have overdone it. If a customer goes to the grocers, or shops at Asda or Tesco, there is an itemised bill. Has the Minister ever been shopping? I go with the wife. The bill shows a pint of milk and a loaf of bread. It tells the customer that he has bought those things and gives him the price of them. There is no problem at all.

Yet the Government tell us that they are helping small business by not giving employees an itemised wages slip. Their heads are in a tin—they are off their nut. That is not the kind of progress that we need. Let us have genuine discussions about employment rights, and no nonsense wasting the time of the House.

6.30 pm

Mr. Michael Clapham (Barnsley, West and Penistone): The statutory right to an itemised pay slip is fundamental. It is something that a worker should expect when he takes employment, no matter how many hours he works. The amendment will not extend that statutory right to tens of thousands of vulnerable people.

Many, if not all, of those workers will be women who have been forced into part-time employment because of economic circumstances. They have had to take a few hours work to earn a little more money to support the family, to buy a little more for the table and to buy clothes for the children, because, generally, one person in the partnership is out of work.

In these days of mass unemployment, when jobs are hard to come by, many part-time workers will be young people who have been unable to find full-time work and have had to take the first part-time job that comes along.

The people who framed the amendment have little idea how many people might be affected. I said that tens of thousands of people will be affected. My hon. Friend the Member for Gateshead, East (Ms Quin) mentioned 780,000 people.

This morning, in its submission to the Trade and Industry Select Committee, the Federation of Small Businesses said there are as many as 4 million self-employed small business men and 1 million small limited companies. It said that about 97 per cent. of small businesses employ fewer than 20 people, and 91 per cent. employ fewer than 10 people. A great many of those employees will be part-time. If we multiply that figure by 10, we will not be far short of the figure that my hon. Friend the Member for Gateshead, East used—that is, 780,000.

Ms Quin: The 780,000 which my hon. Friend rightly quoted includes those in companies which employ fewer than 20 people who work more than eight hours but fewer than 16 hours. If we take into account those who work fewer than eight hours, we have a figure of 1·25 million. My hon. Friend is absolutely right; a very large number of people are affected.

Mr. Clapham: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for pointing that out. We are talking of more than 1 million workers being affected.

Under this Government, small businesses have been treated rather shabbily. In 1992, for example, the failure rate was almost 63,000. Many employees will have claims against the small businesses that have folded. Those employees will be able to prosecute their claims, because they will have evidence that they were employed, evidence of the hours they worked, and evidence of how much they earned. Without an itemised pay slip, it is unlikely that an employee will be able to prosecute a claim.

The amendment gives a nod and a wink to employers not to keep records. The Government should make it clear that records are necessary and should be kept by small businesses. The Lords amendment is a retrograde step; I ask the House to vote against it and to support the amendment tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Gateshead, East.

Ms Ann Coffey (Stockport): No doubt the Minister will respond to our amendment by arguing that the small additional costs that might be incurred by itemising pay slips for employees in firms of fewer than 20 employees will be the straw that breaks the camel's back for some small firms, and will drive them into bankruptcy. The Minister might be interested to hear what representatives of industry, including small businesses and the Confederation of British Industry, have told the Trade and Industry Select Committee about ways of improving the competitiveness and productivity of British industry, so that the hon. Gentleman can be assured that the emphasis on cost is the least of industry's problems and that he can therefore support our amendment.

Among the problems that have been identified, particularly by small business, are the way that VAT is collected; the attitude of the banks; difficulties in obtaining loans; the tax system, and particularly how it affects small businesses; the lack of an overall structure; infrastructure, including education; and the difficulty with training and transport. This morning, the representatives who attended the Select Committee did not touch upon any costs relating to labour. That has not been identified to us as a major problem, although representatives went on at length about some of the factors that I have drawn to the Minister's attention.

It is becoming clear that the countries that do better than us and have more productive industries than ours —for example, Japan and Germany—have a fundamentally different attitude to their employees. That is reflected in employment and trade union rights and the bargaining process in respect of wage settlements. The reason for those countries' higher productivity is that their work forces have been managed properly and involved in firms' decisions. They feel that they have a long-term future and are therefore willing to work harder for their companies. That has led to higher productivity and higher-quality goods.

That point is not difficult to understand. The Minister knows that anybody who is managed well will respond more favourably. I am sure that the Ministers whom the Prime Minister treats well behave much better than the Ministers whom he does not treat well. That is a fact of life; it is plain common sense. Indeed, this morning, the CBI acknowledged that there has been a problem with the lack of management skills in industry, and that we must involve people more. Only by doing so can we use the talents and skills of our people and stop the desperate malaise in British industry. I draw that to the Minister's attention because the issue of itemised pay slips, although small in itself, is important in recognising employees' rights.

A Conservative Member talked about the odd job of a cleaning lady. It is not an odd job at all. Without women doing those jobs, the country would collapse. The problem is that no value is placed on that work. Itemised pay slips for those workers is a way of giving the message that they are important. It is up to the Government to show leadership. If the Government do not show leadership by saying that people and their jobs are important, we cannot expect the management of British industry to give that message. The Government have a chance to give that message by supporting our amendment. Cost did not prevent the Government from asking local authorities to send out itemised poll tax bills to all residents. Local authorities are a service industry. The Government asked local authorities to do that because they thought that it was right and proper that taxpayers should be aware of what they were being asked to pay.

Mr. Forsyth: The hon. Lady is making the same mistake as the hon. Member for Renfrew, West and Inverclyde (Mr. Graham). As a result of our amendment, large employers will, for the first time, be required to give itemised pay statements to employees who work a small number of hours. What is at issue is small businesses, so an analogy with itemised statements being required by large employers such as local authorities is not a fair one.

Ms Coffey: The Minister should recall that, at the beginning of my speech, I anticipated his argument about extending that right to firms with less than 20 employees. I anticipated that his argument would relate to cost. I have not misunderstood the amendment. My point is that, if something is right and the Government think that it is right, regardless of the cost—for example, to send itemised poll tax bills to all residents in a borough—the argument about cost is not one that the Minister can use at all because the issue is about rights. I see that the Minister now understands.

Millions of pounds have been spent on sending out glossy brochures about the citizens charter and aspects of the health service. That has cost the service industries money, but the Government did that because they thought that it was right. My point is that, if it is right to send itemised pay slips to employees, it is right to send them to all employees.

The Government have a fundamental problem in distinguishing rights from costs. There is a great strength of feeling in the United Kingdom that the contribution that people make is not valued and their rights are balanced by the Government time and time again on factors relating to cost. The contribution that people make is important, and they should not be denied basic rights simply because of the cost.

Mr. Miller: When my hon. Friend the Member for Gateshead, East (Ms Quin) was speaking, I noticed that the Government Whip had his handkerchief out. I thought that he was bursting into tears at the thought of having to provide an itemised pay statement for his valet, or whatever.

The crux of the argument is the question: why should any worker not be entitled to an itemised pay statement? The Government bluntly said that it would be too costly. Indeed, in Committee on 14 January, the Minister of State suffered from the needle being stuck more than once, because he repeated himself three times in columns 435-36 when referring to the additional cost imposed on employers.

The hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile) made an important point that followed the theme adopted by my hon. Friend the Member for Gateshead, East (Ms Quin) in terms of legal cases. My hon. Friend referred to the evidence submitted by the National Association of Citizens Advice Bureaux. The hon. and learned Member for Montgomery referred to a number of legal cases in his professional background that stemmed from companies with a small number of employees.

Last night, I advised the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food on an issue that affects her responsibility, which spills into this debate. It is ironic that she held the position of Secretary of State for Employment previously. It is a great pity that the Minister has chosen to ignore the evidence provided to the Committee by NACAB.

In a document sent to me today, NACAB says that evidence shows that itemised pay slips can save a lot of time later if disputes arise. That is exactly along the lines of the point made by the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery. For example, if an employee thinks that an employer has not paid the correct amount, made an illegal deduction from his pay or not been paying tax, it is the experience of the NACAB that some employers clearly flout their obligations under the law by not deducting pay-as-you-earn tax and national insurance contributions. Other employers may make the deductions but not pay the money to the Inland Revenue.

In both cases, that is revenue lost to the Exchequer and deficient national insurance contribution records affect future benefit entitlements. The National Audit Office reported that there was large-scale under-collection of national insurance contributions.

If those issues are not ones in which the Government should be interested, given the perilous state of the nation's finances, I do not know what are. It is ironic that the Government should choose to ignore that, from the Treasury point of view and that of individual citizens who are affected by some of the examples to which my hon. Friend the Member for Gateshead, East referred.

There are many other examples. A citizens advice bureau in South Wales reports a client who is employed by a nursing home. Her contract states that, if her pay exceeds the lower limit for national insurance contributions, she may receive store gift vouchers, which are exempt from national insurance. That is illegal. I am not entirely sure that having a pay statement would mitigate that, but it would go a long way to helping the employee to argue her legal rights if the matter went to court.

A citizens advice bureau in Devon reports a client who was paid £23 a night to work in a residential care home, despite being told that she would be paid £24 a night. When she complained, she was told that it was to keep her payments below the national insurance level. She insisted on full payment, and her next wage packet had £6·50 deducted for national insurance contributions. As her wage was below the level for national insurance contributions, the deductions were clearly wrong. If she had had documentary proof of that in the form of an itemised pay statement, she would have been in a strong position to challenge her employer in court.

I shall give the Government some advice about the way in which to encourage small businesses to think positively about this matter, and I shall do so in two ways. One way to encourage small businesses is by the use of modern technology—I say this as someone who has some knowledge of the subject.

It is interesting that the training and enterprise council in my area has sent out 10,000 attractively produced glossy leaflets showing its successes and activities. I do not criticise the TEC for many of the activities in which it has engaged, but, I criticise the use of money to produce the glossy literature. That money could have been used to train small employers in how better to utilise modern technology in their industries to ensure that such simple things can be provided as a matter of course.

Any company worth its salt keeps records. It is more efficient to keep records on a computer database than to do so manually. The Secretary of State will know Chester, Ellesmere Port and Warrington TEC—CEWTEC—and will doubtless praise many of its activities, but I am sure that he will agree that it could direct some resources towards helping to train small businesses in how to improve their record-keeping, administration and efficiency. Part of that process could be to encourage small businesses, many of which use computers, to utilise facilities that are available at minimal cost to provide statements to their employees.

Mr. Roy Beggs (Antrim, East): From his experience, can the hon. Gentleman say how long it would take to prepare an itemised statement?

Mr. Miller: I shall stick to the point that I was making about computerised information, and will refer to manual records later.

A good employer will collate the relevant computerised data, and it would take seconds to produce an itemised statement. If an employer has a well organised database, the stroke of a handful of keys will be all that is necessary to produce the statement. The process can be as quick as that in a well run business—and we are all in favour of encouraging such businesses.

The same arguments can be applied to the question whether there should be an upper limit of 20. The hon. Member for Tiverton (Mrs. Browning) made an important contribution in Committee, and I congratulate her on being positive. I hope that she does not back off one jot from the sentence, which is on record, in which she said:

"As the trend is towards part-time work, especially for women, it is important that everyone who has deductions from pay, and who in future may have to prove them either to the Inland Revenue or to the Benefits Agency, has written proof of those deductions."—[Official Report, Standing Committee F, 14 January 1993; c. 434.]

I absolutely agree—"everyone" must mean everyone in a company, irrespective of size. I hope that the hon. Member for Tiverton will support us in the Division Lobby. Why should there be an arbitrary limit on the number of employees in a company?

To return to the issue raised by the hon. Member for Antrim, East (Mr. Beggs), even if a very small company cannot justify the few hundred pounds' investment in a personal computer that could be used for other activities, the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile) has supplied the ideal solution. A proforma duplicate pad could be used to provide the basic information.

An employer—no matter what size his business—must keep books in some form or another, so to produce information on a carbonised pad would not take any effort. It would require the employer to produce information in an honest, open and accountable way to all those involved—not just the employees, but all the public agencies. Even if the technology in a company extended only to a ballpoint pen, the employer would have the facilities at his disposal to provide the information required.

It is against that background that I believe that the Government have slipped up badly. They had an opportunity to make a major advance and have failed to take it. Therefore, I support my hon. Friend the Member for Gateshead, East in opposing the Lords amendment.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: We have had an interesting debate and learnt that the official Opposition policy is to start a paper chase the length and breadth of Britain. Every cleaning lady and part-time handyman will be given a piece of paper by their employers, whether they want it or not.

The Opposition have been thoroughly ungrateful today in the face of the Government's reasonable and responsible response to considered arguments.

Mr. Dennis Turner (Wolverhampton, South-East): Not true.

Mr. Forsyth: The hon. Gentleman says from a sedentary position that that is not true. I listened to my hon. Friend the Member for Tiverton (Mrs. Browning) —I am delighted that she has agreed to become my Parliamentary Private Secretary today. It was in no small part due to the part that she played in Committee that my right hon. Friend and I felt that she would be a splendid addition to the Department. My hon. Friend the Member for Tiverton took the initiative in Committee. The hon. Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden (Mr. Galbraith) supported the arguments advanced by my hon. Friend.

The hon. Member for Ellesmere Port and Neston (Mr. Miller) is not distinguishing himself today—he is no gentleman. He quoted my hon. Friend the Member for Tiverton selectively. He did not quote column 436, where she said in response to my comments:

"I am encouraged by my hon. Friend's comments".

My comments in respect of the amendment were:

"Once again, we are discussing an additional cost being imposed on employers. I am not certain what the costs or the implications would be. We have had no opportunity to discuss the idea with any of the organisations which represent small businesses, which would be affected by the proposal. If my hon. Friend will withdraw the amendment, we can pursue her idea with outside groups which take an interest in these matters, and reach a conclusion."—[Official Report, Standing Committee F, 14 January 1993; c. 436.]

That is precisely what we did—we consulted.

Earlier, I was criticised for not consulting. On that occasion we consulted and found that the Confederation of British Industry, the Forum of Private Business and other organisations wanted a cut-off for small firms. That was why we introduced the amendment to improve the law by giving new rights to employees who work a small number of hours. We limited the legislation in terms of the impact on business and introduced it in such a way that any change to the limit can be made by secondary legislation should any Government decide to do so in the future.

That policy marks an advance, and to be faced with Opposition criticism that we have not done enough in a sector where we have done a great deal as a result of discussions in Committee—and done so in double quick time—is harsh.

Mr. Frank Field: I am grateful to the Minister for giving way, and particularly for reminding us that the Government are a listening Government. We applaud the Minister for talking to the CBI and representatives of small businesses before reaching a decision. However, how many low-paid, part-time workers in his constituency did he speak to before coming up with his formula?

Mr. Forsyth: The conversations that I have had with low-paid workers in my constituency showed that receiving itemised pay statements was not at the top of their agenda, where they listed more basic items such as how to improve their employment prospects, deal with housing problems and other such issues. One of the ways of solving such problems is to increase this country's wealth-creating capacity. We shall not achieve that by tying up businesses in red tape, as the hon. Gentleman well knows.

Mr. David Hanson (Delyn): Did the Minister consult his colleagues in the Department of Social Security and in the Benefits Agency? I am worried that many people who will not now have itemised pay slips will not qualify for means-tested benefits and other benefits administered by the Department. What did the DSS have to say about his proposals?

Mr. Forsyth: People in the tax system will get their P60s, which provide the information. There is nothing to prevent employers, the vast majority of whom follow best practices in this matter, from providing the information for people whose incomes fall below that. Just for once, the hon. Gentleman should bring himself to welcome a Government proposal and to acknowledge that the position of people employed by firms with more than 20 employees working a small number of hours has been greatly improved. As my hon. Friend the Member for Chester (Mr. Brandreth) said, there must be a balance between the benefits and the costs of the bureaucracy imposed on small businesses.

The hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile) said that not many members of the CBI have fewer than 20 employees. He should remember that these small firms are the future large employer members of the CBI, and if they have to spend every waking hour filling in forms and sending out bits of paper, they will never become the larger firms that will provide the jobs of the future.

Mr. Graham: I am not knocking the Government for talking to the CBI—I thought that the Government were in the closet with the CBI all the time, anyway—but I do take issue with the Government over how many employees they may have consulted. Have they spoken to trade unions or youth organisations about their decision? We seem to hear a lot from the Government about small employers, but not much about employees. How will this measure help them?

Mr. Forsyth: I listened carefully to the hon. Gentleman's speech. He said that computers are all around us and that high technology is a fact of life. I suggest that he go and talk to those who own the newsagents, corner shops and small firms in his constituency and ask them to show him their computers which will produce itemised pay statements. He will find that there, as elsewhere in the country, employers with small numbers of employees are struggling under numerous burdens, and they would not thank this House for adding to those burdens at a time when they are working hard to create wealth and to survive in difficult trading conditions.

Mr. Peter L. Pike (Burnley) rose——

Mr. Forsyth: I do not think that the hon. Gentleman has been listening long to our proceedings.

The hon. Member for Stockport (Ms Coffey), who is not now in her place, asked me to bear in mind the importance of competitiveness. She spoke about the evidence given by the CBI and others to the Trade and Industry Select Committee. She at least listens to the voice of business. She said that competitiveness was important and that we ought to learn from Japan, where there was a fundamentally different attitude to employees. I could not agree with her more. The difference between Japan and Europe is that Japanese non-wage labour costs are exactly half those of Europe. Opposition Members should stop coming up with bright ideas to add to the non-wage costs of our employers—especially small employers.

The hon. and learned Member for Montgomery wanted me to give an assurance that we would monitor the progress of the legislation. The Government monitor every piece of legislation. I only regret that the hon. and learned Gentleman did not give us credit for having made an advance——

Mr. Alex Carlile: Does the Minister mean to say that he has evidence that in Japan pay slips are not given to employees who work part time in industry? I suggest that the vast majority of Japanese employers give computerised pay slips to part-time employees who work less than 16 hours.

Mr. Forsyth: I knew that the Liberals made up their policies as they go along; I did not realise that they did the same when it comes to arguments of this kind. I repeat: the non-wage labour costs of Japan are half those of the European Community, thus giving it a competitive advantage. If the hon. and learned Gentleman and his colleagues had had their way, British non-wage costs would be a good deal higher, as they would have made us sign up to the social chapter and all the other nonsense which will make it much more difficult for Europe to compete with the Japanese and others.

Lords amendments Nos. 29 and 41 represent an advance. I ask the House to support them and to reject the Opposition amendment.

Question put, That the amendment to the Lords amendment be made:—

New clause

Lords amendment: No. 30—Dismissal on ground of assertion to statutory right—

(".—(1) After section 60 of the 1978 Act (as substituted by section 23 of this Act), there shall be inserted—

"DISMISSAL ON GROUNDS OF ASSERTION OF STATUTORY RIGHT

60A.—(1) The dismissal of an employee by an employer shall be regarded for the purposes of this Part as having been unfair if the reason for it (or, if more than one, the principal reason) was that the employee—

(a) brought proceedings against the employer to enforce a right of his which is a relevant statutory right; or

(b) alleged that the employer had infringed a right of his which is a relevant statutory right.

(2) It is immaterial for the purposes of subsection (1) whether the employee has the right or not and whether it has been infringed or not, but, for that subsection to apply, the claim to the right and that it has been infringed must be made in good faith.

(3) It shall be sufficient for subsection (1) to apply that the employee, without specifying the right, made it reasonably clear to the employer what the right claimed to have been infringed was.

(4) The following statutory rights are relevant for the purposes of this section, namely—

(a) any right conferred by—

(i) this Act, or

(ii) the Wages Act 1986,

for which the remedy for its infringement is by way of a complaint or reference to an industrial tribunal;

(b) the right conferred by section 49 (minimum notice);

(c) the rights conferred by the following provisions of the Trade Union and Labour Relations (Consoldiation) Act 1992, namely, sections 68, 86, 146, 168, 169 and 170 (deductions from pay, union activities and time off)."

(2) In section 59 of the 1978 Act (dismissal on ground of redundancy), in subsection (2) (inserted by section 23(2) of this Act), after the word "(e)" there shall be inserted the words "or 60A(1) (read with (2) and (3))".

(3) In section 64 of the 1978 Act (qualifying period for right not to be unfairly dismissed), in subsection (4) (inserted by section 23(3) of this Act), after the word "(e)" there shall be inserted the words "or 60A(1) (read with (2) and (3))".")

Mr. Michael Forsyth: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Geoffrey Lofthouse): With this it will be convenient to consider Lords amendments Nos. 42, 59, 60 and 64.

Mr. Forsyth: Government amendment No. 30, with which are grouped the associated minor and technical amendments, is an important addition to the Bill's provisions, making a further significant enhancement to employees' individual rights.

The new clause was first introduced by the Government in Committee in another place to fulfil a commitment that I gave, I think from memory, to the hon. Members for Strathkelvin and Bearsden (Mr. Galbraith) and for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson). We had undertaken to introduce a measure giving employees, regardless of their length of service or hours of work, protection against being unfairly dismissed for seeking to enforce the right to a written statement of main employment particulars. We had also said that we would consider the extent to which similar protection might be extended to employees seeking to enforce other statutory employment rights.

We concluded that the new provision should be comprehensive, applying in respect of all statutory employment protection rights. The rights in question are: all rights conferred by either the Employment Protection (Consolidation) Act 1978 or the Wages Act 1986 for which the remedy for infringement is by way of a complaint or a reference to an industrial tribunal; the right to a minimum period of notice; and all the rights which an employee may exercise against his or her employer under the Trade Union and Labour Relations (Consolidation) Act 1992.

The protection will apply where the employee's dismissal was on the ground that he or she had brought proceedings against the employer to enforce one of these rights and also where it was on the ground that he or she had alleged that the employer had infringed such a right. The protection will also apply where the employee was selected for redundancy on the same grounds.

It will be unnecessary for the employee actually to have made detailed reference to the right in question, as long as he or she made it reasonably clear to the employer what that right was. It will also be immaterial whether the employee had actually qualified for the right and whether the right had been infringed, provided that he or she had acted in good faith in seeking to assert it. I am sure that the Opposition will agree that that is watertight.

As I am sure all hon. Members will agree, dismissal of an employee for seeking in good faith to enforce his or her statutory employment protection rights is wholly unjustifiable. I am confident that few employers would ever contemplate acting in such an irresponsible manner. However, the new clause, which will make all such dismissals automatically unfair, will provide comprehensive new protection for individual employees against any misguided employer who might act in this way.

Mr. Sam Galbraith (Strathkelvin and Bearsden): I welcome this generous amendment, which more than fulfils the commitments given by the Minister in Committee. We are pleased that the amendment does not merely place a duty on the employee to show that his rights were impeded. Irrespective of whether it was later shown that he did not have a right to ask for information because of a technical problem, the important issue is that the employee acted in good faith. It is good that, for once, in the Bill the benefit of the doubt is given to the employee.

The measure does not deal with whether an industrial tribunal can order reinstatement or award compensation. However, I should be ruled out of order if I started to discuss that and the Minister would think I was being churlish. In any case we discussed the matter in Committee.

New clause

Lords amendment: No. 31—Application of 1978 Act to service in armed forces—

(".—(1) In section 138 of the 1978 Act (application of Act to Crown employment) for subsection (3) (service in the armed forces excepted) there shall be substituted—

"(3) This section applies to service as a member of the naval, military or air forces of the Crown but only in accordance with section 138A and it applies also to employment by any association established for the purposes of Part VI of the Reserve Forces Act 1980."

(2) After section 138, there shall be inserted—

"Application of Act to armed forces.

138A.—(1) The provisions of this Act which apply, by virtue of section 138, to service as a member of the naval, military or air forces of the crown are—

Part I;
in Part II, sections 19 to 22 and 31A;
Part III;
in Part IV, section 53;
Part V, except sections 57A and 80;
Part VIII; and this Part.

(2) Her Majesty may, by Order in Council,—

(a) amend subsection (1) above by making additions to, or omissions from, the provisions for the time being specified in that subsection by an Order under this subsection; and

(b) make any provision apply to service as a member of the naval, military or air forces of the Crown subject to such exceptions and modifications as may be specified in the Order.

(3) Subject to subsection (5) below, modifications made under subsection (2) above may include provision precluding the making of a complaint or reference to any industrial tribunal unless the person aggrieved has availed himself of the service procedures for the redress of complaints applicable to him.

(4) Where modifications include the provision authorised by subsection (3) above the Order in Council shall also include provision designed to secure that the service procedures for the redress of complaints result in a determination, or what is to be treated under the Order as a determination, in sufficient time to enable a complaint or reference to be made to an industrial tribunal.

(5) No provision shall be made by virtue of subsection (3) above which has the effect of substituting, for any period specified as the normal period for a complaint or reference on any matter to an industrial tribunal, a period longer than six months.

(6) No recommendation shall be made to Her Majesty to make an Order in Council under subsection (2) above unless a draft of the Order has been laid before Parliament and approved by a resolution of each House of Parliament.

(7) In this section—

"the normal period for a complaint or reference", in relation to any matter within the jurisdiction of an industrial tribunal, means the period specified in the relevant enactment as the period within which the complaint or reference must be made, disregarding any provision permitting an extension of that period at the discretion of the tribunal; and

"the service procedures for the redress of complaints" means the procedures, excluding those which relate to the making of a report on a complaint to Her Majesty, referred to in sections 180 and 181 of the Army Act 1955, sections 180 and 181 of the Air Force Act 1955 and section 130 of the Naval Discipline Act 1957.'")

Read a Second time.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

I am grateful to the hon. Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden (Mr. Galbraith) for his comments on the previous amendment. I am sure that he and his colleagues will also welcome this new clause, which will considerably improve the rights of members of the armed forces to enjoy employment protection measures equivalent to those that are enjoyed by civilian employees.

It has always been recognised that members of the armed forces are in a special employment position, and that measures applying to civilian employees may well be inappropriate. This is why service in the armed forces has up to now been excluded from coverage by the Employment Protection (Consolidation) Act 1978, by virtue of section 138(3). This subsection provides that subsection (1), which applies many of the Act's provisions to Crown employees, does not apply to those in the armed forces. However, in this day and age, such a blanket exclusion is unnecessary and unjustified. The new clause brings the provisions up to date. It applies to the armed forces almost the same list of provisions as apply to Crown servants.

Nevertheless, it is clear that modifications will need to be made to the provisions to make them compatible with the special considerations that necessarily apply to the services. Therefore, the clause contains powers to enable my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence to make an order providing that internal procedures will need to be exhausted before service men and service women can take a complaint to an industrial tribunal and make any other necessary adaptations.

Mr. Eric Martlew (Carlisle): I have a special responsibility for defence for the Opposition and I welcome this new clause. It has been tabled because of cases of discrimination, especially against pregnant women. I hope that there will be no repeat of the recent case of an RAF sergeant, a skilled technician, who, although she was not dismissed when she had twins, was told that she would not be given housing accommodation and that if she was posted abroad and her children went with her they would not be given education or medical facilities. She was also told that if her children stayed in this country boarding school allowances would not be payable. That was discrimination of the worst kind.

I understand that pressure was one of the reasons for the Government altering the Bill. Another reason is the EC directive, which would probably force the Government to accept contracts of employment. The debate in the other place was short. Will people in the armed forces be allowed a written statement of employment, an itemised pay statement and maternity leave? Will they be given a written statement of reasons for dismissal and will they be allowed the right to claim unfair dismissal and the right to go to an industrial tribunal?

I understand that the clause precludes members of the armed forces from becoming members of a trade union. For that reason, it is important to place on record the rights that the new clause will extend to members of the armed forces. Those rights need to be spelt out in black and white and I hope that the Minister can state the exact meaning of the new clause.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The hon. Gentleman has raised a number of detailed questions. I am grateful to him; I share his concern about, for instance, the rights of women in the armed services who become pregnant.

The hon. Gentleman asked me about certain specific rights. The amendment replaces section 138(3) with a new subsection which will apply to members of the armed forces, relating to the rights specified in new subsection (1) —that is, rights to written statements of the main terms and conditions of employment, as amended to reflect, among other things, the requirement of the EC proof of employment directive. Those terms and conditions are itemised pay statements, the right to be paid when under medical supervision, time off for ante-natal care, maternity rights as amended by the Bill to implement the pregnant workers directive, a written statement of the reason for dismissal, a right not to be unfairly dismissed and resolution of disputes by an industrial tribunal.

7.30 pm

I have said that access to an industrial tribunal will be limited until the internal procedures have been followed —although there is a further safeguard in the form of a six-month time limit. Subsections (2)(a) and (b) of new section 138A provide that the provisions specified in subsection (1) may be added to, removed or modified by Order in Council.

The hon. Member for Carlisle (Mr. Martlew), who probably knows more than I do about the details of arrangements for the armed services, will be aware that their members already receive itemised pay statements. The Ministry of Defence is reviewing the policy that denies married quarters and boarding-school allowances to unmarried parents; I am sure that the hon. Gentleman is pleased about that, as I am.

Peace has broken out in our consideration of these Lords amendments. I commend Lords amendment No. 31 to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause 29

AMENDMENTS OF TRANSFER OF UNDERTAKINGS REGULATIONS

Lords amendment: No. 32, in page 47, line 10, at end insert—

("( ) in Regulation 5 (effect of transfer on contracts of employment, etc)—

(a) in paragraph (1), at the beginning, there shall be inserted the words "Except where objection is made under paragraph (4A) below,";

(b) in paragraph (2) after the words "paragraph (1) above there shall be inserted the words "but subject to paragraph (4A) below,";

(c) after paragraph (4), there shall be inserted—

"(4A) Paragraphs (1) and (2) above shall not operate to transfer his contract of employment and the rights, powers, duties and liabilities under or in connection with it if the employee informs the transferor or the transferee that he objects to becoming employed by the transferee.

(4B) where an employee so objects the transfer of the undertaking or part in which he is employed shall operate so as to terminate his contract of employment with the transferor but he shall not be treated, for any purpose, as having been dismissed by the transferor."; and

(d) in paragraph (5), for the words "Paragraph (1) above is" there shall be substituted the words "Paragraphs (1) and (4A) above are".")

Mr. Galbraith: I beg to move, as an amendment to the Lords amendment, amendment (a), in line 19, leave out

'not be treated, for any purpose' and insert

'be treated, for all purposes'.

I fear that peace broke out for only a short time and that we are about to engage in battle again. The Minister and his hon. Friend do not like that idea at all; it frightens them. We are about to discuss the aspect of the Bill that the Minister and the Government probably hate most—the question of the European acquired rights directive on the transfer of engagement. It is more commonly known as TUPE, or the Transfer of Undertakings (Protection of Employment) Regulations 1991.

The Government have always opposed the directive. They have always tried to cover up its significance and have attempted to fiddle the law in order to do so. When they were caught, instead of saying, "It's a fair cop, guv," their line was, "We never did anything. We did not steal the car; we were just borrowing it. If they wanted it back, they could have had it back at any time—honest, m'lud. We were not trying to mislead the public in any way." According to the Government, their proposals were always intended to apply to competitive tendering. We are now dealing with an amendment to the regulation involved.

The amendment was prompted by a case in the European Court of Justice. It is known as the Kastikas case. I hope that I have pronounced that correctly; I understood the Minister when he said that many a mickle makes a muckle, but my Greek is not quite up to his lowland Scots. [Interruption.] The Minister has just corrected my pronunciation, demonstrating that he has a grasp of Greek as well as lowland Scots. That is splendid. He had a proper Scottish education: if hon. Members are in any doubt about that, let me tell them that he attended Arbroath high school. That good start was followed by a retrograde step, in that the Minister then went to St. Andrews university; but those of us who went to superior Scottish universities appreciate that some folk who cannot get into them will end up at St. Andrews.

The Kastikas case demonstrated that, when an undertaking is transferred from one employer to another, no one employed by the transferor is obliged to have the contract transferred to the employee. That surprised me, and I gather that it surprised many other people. We had always assumed that, in the event of a transfer of engagement, all contracts of employment were transferred. Not so, said the European Court:

"If the Directive . . . allows an employee to remain in employment with a new employer on the same conditions as those agreed with the transferor"—

this is important—

"it cannot be interpreted as obliging the employee to continue his employment relationship with the transferee.

[Mr. Galbraith]

Such an obligation would undermine the fundamental rights of the employee who must be free to choose his employer and cannot be obliged to work for an employer."

That important first part of the Court's judgment established that the individual had a fundamental right not to be compelled to work for an employer and that the contract could therefore not be considered transferable under the directive.

The judgment stated that the provisions

"do not prevent an employee from objecting to the transfer of his contract of employment or of his employment relationship."

The court then dealt with what is effectively the crux of the dispute that we are having today:

"In such cases, it is for the Member States to determine the fate of the contract of employment or of the employment relationship."

The judgment has two essential parts. First, it states that the employee can object: he is under no obligation to transfer. However, what happens to the contract of employment is then a matter for the member state alone. No decision has been made about that, so it is up to the Government to table the necessary amendment. They were given the opportunity to clarify the law, but once again they have chosen not to side with the employee. Most people would have expected them to do so; after all, the employee is at a disadvantage. It is the employer who triggers the change in employment. The amendment, however, gives the advantage to the employer yet again. Whenever they are given the choice, the Government side with the employer.

The Government have said that the employee has the right to object, but if that happens, what was described in the other place as a depth charge or nuclear explosion will be brought into play: the employee will instantly be considered to have been dismissed.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: What is at issue is this: if an employee decides not to transfer to the new employer, he is held to have resigned. The hon. Gentleman is arguing that he should be paid redundancy money. Is he really suggesting that, in the event of a transfer from the public to the private sector, the employee should be able to claim redundancy payment and then reapply for the job the following day? What protection would there be? Is that the evenhanded approach that the hon. Gentleman is advocating?

Mr. Galbraith: The Minister should have thought about that before tabling the amendment. That is the problem of tabling new amendments at short notice.

The amendment raises various issues. What rights should be available to employees? What redundancy rights should there be and what rights should employees have to go to an industrial tribunal? What rights should they have to payment in lieu of notice and should they have the right to be given due notice? We may wish to discuss those issues, but it is clear that none of those rights prevails under the Government's amendment.

Before a transfer is made, an employee has the right to notice of dismissal, payment in lieu of dismissal and all the other associated rights, but if he objects to the transfer all his rights are lost because, under the amendment,

"he shall not be treated, for any purpose, as having been dismissed".

Our amendment seeks to retain the rights that the employee had before the transfer. It would not give the employee the right to be employed for ever by the employer. We are not suggesting that, but simply that the employee should retain the rights that he had before the transfer. The employer can still dismiss the employee, but the employee will have the right to notice, to payment in lieu of notice, to redundancy, and the right to go to an industrial tribunal. The Minister may say that it would not be suitable to retain some of those rights, and we can discuss that, but it is clear that under the Government's amendment employees who do not transfer will have no rights whatsoever.

Mr. Forsyth: I do not want to disturb the hon. Gentleman's train of thought, but the employee does have rights. He has the right to retain his employment and move into employment with the new employer. The hon. Gentleman is suggesting that, if the employee decides not to transfer to the new employer and retain the rights that he has accrued, he should not be treated as if he had resigned and that he should be given redundancy payment. Given that the employee is not being required to lose his job, it is difficult to understand the hon. Gentleman's argument that that would be a legitimate position.

Mr. Galbraith: The Minister has failed to understand that the employee is no longer under any obligation. He should remember that it is the employer who triggers the necessity for the employee to choose whether or not to transfer. If the employer makes that decision—and the European Court recognised that the employee is under no obligation to transfer—what rights should be retained by an employee who chooses not to transfer? Under the Government's proposed amendment, the employee loses all rights; he retains the right not to transfer, but he then has no rights whatsoever. Our amendment seeks to retain some rights for that employee.

Sir Teddy Taylor (Southend, East): It is time to clear up this whole TUPE business, as the truth has not been told. Labour's proposal is ridiculous. The hon. Gentleman is suggesting that someone who is not redundant should be regarded as redundant, that someone who, through the generosity and good will of the European Community is guaranteed the same job with the same pay and the same working arrangements, working in the same place, should be treated as redundant. Surely the Labour party, which has a splendid record of fighting for working people, cannot regard as redundant someone who is not redundant at all.

Mr. Galbraith: I do not agree, although we may wish to discuss that issue. However, other rights apart from the right to redundancy payment are also involved. The right to notice of termination of employment and the right to payment in lieu of notice would also be lost. In other words, an employee would go from having certain rights to having absolutely none at all. We may wish to discuss what rights are available to that individual. Some rights may be inappropriate, but it is clear that, as a result of a change in the working relationship triggered by the employer, absolutely no rights are available to the employee and that cannot be acceptable. That is what we seek to amend.

Mr. Graham: Last night we discussed the fact that some employers were bribing workers not to be members of trade unions. If I were an employer and another company was buying out my company, I would not expect my staff to want to transfer because they would have to accept a reduction in pay. Many people would end up working for employers who were hostile to their fully held union beliefs and would not wish to work for such companies.

7.45 pm

Mr. Galbraith: I thank my hon. Friend, who made his point in his usual inimitable style.

Mr. Clapham: Is my hon. Friend aware that the situation that he describes appertains to the coal industry? If a colliery surface is privatised and sold to a new company, employees previously employed by the British Coal Corporation receive the opportunity of accepting redundancy. They are paid money in lieu of notice and then, if they wish, they are taken on by the new employer.

Mr. Galbraith: These issues certainly merit further discussion. I understand that the Government introduced the measure to deal with the Kastikis case and therefore they probably had less time than usual. However, it raises a number of issues.

Our interpretation is that the amendment removes from the employee every right that he or she has. Perhaps the Minister, who shakes his head, can say whether or not an employee who refuses to transfer still has the right to notice of dismissal and payment in lieu of notice. Finally, when is it considered to be dismissal? Is it when the employee signs an undertaking saying that he does not wish to transfer, or is it when the engagements have been transferred?

Given the opportunity to confer rights on individuals, once again the Government have failed. I understand their hostility to TUPE. I well remember that, in Committee, the Minister used to speak through clenched teeth and explain to his Back Benchers who were up in arms that, no matter what his personal feelings were, he could not alter European law.

It was probably one of the saddest moments in the Minister's political career. It was the bottom, and he has had some pretty low points. For example, he accused the National Federation of Women's Institutes of being a Marxist organisation. These poor women in Stirling, Callander and Doune making jam and buttering scones on behalf of charities were all labelled Marxist subversives. They were shaking in their boots in Callander.

Under the amendment, do employees lose all rights when they refuse to transfer and when are they considered to have made that refusal?

Sir Teddy Taylor (Southend, East): The Opposition's amendment is one of the most ridiculous that I have ever seen. The clear implication of the hard-fought-for right to compensation for redundancy was that someone made redundant was entitled to compensation. We are talking here about a situation in which a new employer takes over a service. If the new employer, through the generosity of the EC, is obliged to offer the same job, without any change in working conditions, even in the room in which he works, without any change in wages, without change in anything, there is no way in which that employee can be declared redundant. The Opposition's amendment is ridiculous because in it they are asking for a special category of redundancy to be given to people who are not redundant at all.

But it is not that which worries me so much as the Government's proposal and the Lords amendment, not because I object to it—it seems quite sensible, particularly the new paragraph (4B)—but because I am concerned about whether the Government are right.

The only point that I want to make, which I hope the Minister will think about, is that when we look back we see that two things have happened. First, the Government have been consistently wrong in their judgments or assessments of the law. Secondly, the most shameful cloak of secrecy has been thrown over the TUPE business. The Government have consistently sought to try to hide the iniquitous policies of the EC, the way in which our freedom is being taken away and the way in which industry, commerce and jobs are being undermined.

That is clear, as we see time and again. Perhaps most obvious is the fact that we are not allowed to table questions on the size of the piles of food in the EC. All kinds of things are being covered up, but on this issue I make two points. First, because of the Government's cloak of secrecy, there has been a deliberate attempt not to tell employers what is happening. Privatised employers feel most upset about the fact that the long infraction proceedings initiated by the European Commission were not made public by the Government, and employers and local authorities went ahead with arrangements, making contracts and offering out services, without being aware that all the time Jacques Delors and his friends were nibbling away at the matter, with serious results.

The second point on which I hope that the Minister will give me some guidance concerns what will happen to the local councils that privatised their services many years ago. Southend is an obvious example. We privatised services, we believe to the benefit of the ratepayers, although that is a question of judgment, and saved money. But whether we were clever or stupid, the Minister will be well aware of the judgment on the Eastbourne case, as a result of which it seems that backdated responsibility will be put on the councils or the employers to pay massive sums of money to the employees concerned. Not only will they have to make redundancy payments to workers who were made redundant at the time of privatisation, but they will have to compensate them for loss of earnings as well.

Eastbourne and Southend sacked all the workers, brought in a new employer who appointed new people, no doubt with better working conditions—in Southend the wages rose over a period—but there were far fewer people doing more work. Now, having done what the Government told them to do, they find that they are faced with horrendous liabilities. What we in Southend would like to know, what Eastbourne would like to know, is who will pay. We are not clear whether the employer or the council will have to pay. We understand that it will be the employer who has to pay, which will put many good employers out of business through no fault of their own. If that happens, it will be serious.

I should like the Minister to give advice, particularly to friends of mine who pop into the House of Commons from Scotland from time to time, on who will be responsible for that and what will happen. The Minister will be well aware from the activities of the clause 26 group—a group of private employers—that they feel let down. They did what was legal and what the Government told them to do. They did a good job and now they find that they are being clobbered retrospectively through no fault of their own.

[Sir Teddy Taylor]

It would be okay if the Government said, "Look, we are terribly sorry, but Jacques Delors has mucked all this up. We don't control the EC. They did it." But the fact is that for two years the Government were being pursued by the EC Commission. They knew it would probably go funny, they did not tell the employers, new contracts were made and a great loss was involved.

Secondly, what the blazes is the Government's advice now? I have seen the advice given by the Secretary of State for the Environment to local authorities. Let me read one sentence of the advice given to that splendid council in a place called Liverpool which sought the advice of the Conservative Government. It was told:

"Mr. Farrell of the TGWU is not incorrect in suggesting that the TUPE will require any future contractor to guarantee the existing wages and conditions of cleaners based at your school." It should not be assumed, however, that the Regulations will apply in this particular case."

What is the Liverpool council meant to do? What are councils throughout the land meant to do when not only are they told that it may be correct but it may be wrong, but they also receive circular letters from the Secretary of State for the Environment with huge newsletters saying that, if they try to shove in TUPE, they could be taken to court under some strange regulation of local government legislation, and the council could be held personally responsible?

We have the crazy situation in which councils are looking for advice, they are given ambiguous replies and then they receive circulars from the Department of the Environment saying that, if they do not get it right, if they do not follow it through, the councillors could be taken to court for letting down the ratepayers.

Thirdly, and terribly importantly, will the Minister give some guidance on what will be the difference on 1 July 1993? On 1 July, which is not far away, something called the EC services directive will apply. The expert officials who follow such things with great delight will be well aware that that says that any contract over £142,000 will have substantial consequences for TUPE and the responsibilities of local authorities. My understanding is that the ambiguous advice given by the Department of the Environment will be overtaken on 1 July 1993 when the EC services directive comes into force. There is not much point sending out circulars when we are getting it all wrong.

I simply make the point that the Government are saying, "Don't worry about this one. We have put it right and we will say that people who are not redundant should not be redundant because that is the way we have interpreted the European directive. We appreciate that the acquired rights directive was passed under a Labour Government, but it was a long time ago and the directive that was passed at that time is wildly different from the present law."

My final point—I hope that the Government will think about this—is that many private firms in Britain face disaster if they are to be sued retrospectively for doing what was legal at the time according to the British courts and the British Government, according to the advice that they had which was legal. They will face bankruptcy and ruin and many workers will be sacked. There is something very wrong in such a situation and something must be done. At the very least, our delightful new Secretary of State for Employment should say that he will meet those people and talk to them.

The whole problem has arisen because of the EC's obsessive desire to be involved in every aspect of law. I accept that the Labour party is delighted that some of the things that it wants——

Mr. Graham: Is the hon. Gentleman saying that people whose jobs were taken over have the right to have their existing wages and conditions transferred with them?

Sir Teddy Taylor: Previously they had no such right. If the service was transferred, there was no guarantee for anyone. The new employer could employ two people to do the jobs of 10. He could pay them half the wages. But, as the hon. Gentleman is well aware, that has all changed because of the delightful EC and the nice Mr. Delors. He said that everyone's job was okay, no one's conditions could be touched, and there must be meaningful consultation with the workers' representatives.

As hon. Members probably know, the EC made four demands of the Government, three of which they accepted without a fight; they simply caved in, which I find astonishing given that the Department of Employment was meant to be tough on the matter. The only issue on which they are having a battle with the EC is that the EC wants workers' representatives to be defined as workers' representatives. The Government say that the only workers' representatives that a Tory Government are willing to accept are registered trade unionists. That will probably lead to a great battle in the European Court.

Perhaps my hon. Friend the Minister will tell me why, when the EC makes four ridiculous demands, the Government accept three of them without a fight and include them in the Bill. The only one that they want to battle against is that which ensures that only registered trade unions will be entitled to discuss the issue on behalf of workers. That is terribly unfair. Will I have to rush up and down the Fenchurch Street line, which is to be privatised, and say to every rail worker, "For goodness sake, rejoin a trade union"?

My hon. Friend the Minister may say that that is silly, because everyone will benefit from the discussions, but the fact remains that the people discussing it will be the registered trade unions. If I were an employee on the Fenchurch Street line, I would want to make sure that the organisation discussing it was one of which I am a member. We have ended up with an appalling situation.

I accept that the main responsibility lies with the EC, which has stretched the acquired rights directive well beyond the bounds intended. I acknowledge that private firms are suffering hugely because of the retrospective element that will arise from the Eastbourne case, and that many face ruin. I accept also that the Government, sadly, have tried to pull a cloak of secrecy over the whole business. Being pro-European, they are trying to push through, with the help of my delightful and hon. Friend the Member for Worcester (Mr. Luff), a Bill that will give even more power and responsibility to the EC, and want to hide the fact that businesses are being ruined and people are losing their jobs because of the acquired rights directive.

No Government like to say, "Give more power to this crowd," when jobs are being lost. [Laughter.] My hon.

Friend the Member for Worcester should not laugh at this. These are real problems. If his local authority has passed any contracts over to private firms, it will now face being chased retrospectively for lots of compensation for all those involved. It is not a laughing matter at all; it is a matter of jobs, cash and private industry.

Hardly anyone knows what is going on. Only the firms which will lose jobs and cash, and which will probably go out of business, know. I ask the Government to tell people what is happening. If the public do not know, how can they possibly prepare for the problems ahead? We appreciate that the Government can do nothing about EC measures other than fight them—and the Government do not want to do that.

Mr. Clapham: The hon. Gentleman used the word "freedom". Does he agree that Labour's amendment would give the individual freedom to decide whether to transfer to his new employer or to accept redundancy and look elsewhere for work?

Sir Teddy Taylor: That freedom has never been challenged by anyone. It is surprising that the hon. Gentleman, as a Labour party member, should say, "Please treat as redundant someone who is not redundant."

Where is the money for redundancy payments to come from but from public and private funds? If someone is offered the same job, working conditions, and everything else, it is difficult to understand why a Labour party member should say, "We will regard that chap as redundant." If I do not like the new foreman of my shipyard, why should I not be allowed to do the same and to change him? Why should I not be able to do the same if the shareholding of my company changes? It is terribly wrong to introduce a new law that says that someone should be treated as redundant when he is not.

Will the Government please hold discussions with the private employers, who are concerned, worried and perplexed? Will they tell people what is happening, because they did not tell them in the past? If they do that, we may enjoy a bonus in a dreadful situation, which will inevitably grow worse with the determinations of the European Court.

Mr. John Hutton (Barrow and Furness): Once again, the House finds itself discussing the Transfer of Undertakings (Protection of Employment) Regulations 1981, which have a convoluted history. The hon. Member for Southend, East (Sir T. Taylor) is correct when he says that there is considerable concern among private employers as to the implications for them of recent decisions of the European Court. That is common ground between right hon. and hon. Members on both sides of the House.

I differ from the hon. Gentleman in that I believe that those difficulties have more to do with the drafting of the regulations than with the interpretation that should be placed on the acquired rights directive. The history of the directive's jurisprudence makes it clear to me—and, I am sure, to other lawyers—that, although the directive itself is simple and transparent, the 1981 Conservative Government introduced the regulations from a position directly contrary to the directive's purpose and intent.

When a series of domestic regulations such as TUPE that supposedly implement the terms of a European directive are portrayed and presented from a different standpoint, sooner or later there will inevitably be conflict. The legal position is clear. In any case of conflict between a Community member state's domestic regulations and the terms of a directive, then—whether the hon. Member for Southend, East likes it or not; clearly he does not, and I respect his views—the directive must take precedence.

That confusion between the implications of the 1981 regulations and the clear intent and purpose of the acquired rights directive is a cause of genuine concern, but many of the difficulties to which the hon. Member for Southend, East referred are the fault and responsibility of the Government, in trying to implement the directive.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned a matter of particular concern in Southend, arising from the implications of privatising its public cleaning department, and the question whether the private contractor who took over that work will now face a serious legal liability. I understand that that might well be the case, but it is equally clear that the Government may have liability for the predicament in which many small employers now find themselves.

In the Frankovitch case at the beginning of the 1990s, it was established in the European Court that a legal liability can be enforced in member states' domestic tribunals, where a member state fails properly to implement the terms of a European directive. In Committee, I put that point to the Attorney-General. He made no attempt to respond, but there is a distinct possibility that the British Government may face substantial legal liability because of their botched attempts to implement the acquired rights directive.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The hon. Gentleman describes the British Government's attempts to implement the acquired rights directive as botched, but those attempts were made by the last Labour Government.

Mr. Hutton: The Minister is being uncharacteristically disingenuous. Although the last Labour Government attempted to introduce the regulations in the House, they made no reference to the notion of a non-commercial venture, which is the source of the difficulties in which the Government now find themselves. That notion was a transparent design to exempt from the acquired rights directive the privatisation programme that was then beginning and the eventual competitive tendering process which left many casualties in its wake. The Minister is wrong to suggest that the difficulties surrounding TUPE 81 are the responsibility or fault of the last Labour Government. He must remember that they did not succeed in bringing any enforceable regulations into effect.

Mr. Forsyth: The hon. Gentleman is right, but the last Labour Government signed up to the acquired rights directive and, in the other place, gave an assurance to the House that the directive's provisions would not have the effect of including private contracting of the kind that concerns my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East in respect of public sector services. That is firmly on record, as the hon. Gentleman knows from our previous, rather lengthy debates on the subject.

Mr. Hutton: We certainly had lengthy debates about the issue, but it is clear from our exchanges tonight that we shall not be able to agree about the import or intent of the acquired rights directive, or about the efforts of the previous Labour Government to introduce them into British domestic law.

I repeat my central allegation against the Government: our predicament, to which the hon. Member for Southend, East drew our attention yet again—I think I am right in saying that he spoke to the regulations when they were introduced in 1981 and made similar points to those which he has made tonight about the implications for private sector contracting—lies exclusively at the door of the Government. They misled many private companies that were interested in tendering for public sector work by telling them they did not have to worry about the implications of the TUPE regulations on the tendering process. It is astonishing, and therefore, I suppose, wholly in character, for the Minister of State to repeat his bogus contention tonight.

We have probably spent enough time dealing with historical issues. I know that they are of concern to the House, but I now direct my attention specifically to Labour's amendment and to the Government amendment tabled in another place by Lord Ullswater only a few weeks ago.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden (Mr. Galbraith) said, the amendments are connected to the recent decision of the European Court of Justice in the Katsikas case. The Government's attempt to respond to that decision is typically extreme: employees will have no rights whatsoever if they choose not to permit their contract of employment to be transferred to the transferee, or the new employer.

The Minister of State and the hon. Member for Southend, East have made some play of the question, why should it be possible for an employee to have any statutory employment rights in those circumstances? The hon. Member for Southend, East described the situation as perverse. He said that it would not be a genuine redundancy so it would be unacceptable and inappropriate for workers in that position to have any employment protection.

However, I point out to both hon. Members that if one casts even a cursory glance at British redundancy law—for example, at section 84 of the Employment Protection (Consolidation) Act 1978—one finds that plenty of examples of what one can best describe as specific redundancy cases are already written into English law. They perhaps do not come within the commonsense definition of the term, but we are dealing with the law and, as any lawyer will tell you, Madam Deputy Speaker, law and common sense do not usually have much connection with each other.

Section 84 gives employees the right to claim a redundancy payment even though they have been offered suitable alternative employment by another employer. As long as an employee reasonably refuses that offer, he or she is entitled to a redundancy payment. There are other examples in British employment law of workers being given a right to claim a redundancy payment. I am thinking in particular of the provisions relating to time off during short-time working. If a worker is laid off or put on short-time working, even if his job still exists he is entitled to claim a redundancy payment from his employer. The precedents are not in favour of the argument made by the hon. Member for Southend, East.

Other discrepancies may be found in the law applying to redundancy, but we could find plenty of examples under British employment law where workers are entitled to claim a redundancy payment even though it appears that, at first glance, a job still exists. I do not think that there is anything illogical or improper in that. If we want confirmation of that, we must consider the purpose of the Katsikas judgment.

My hon. Friend the Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden was correct to say that the Katsikas judgment came as something of a surprise. Most people assumed that employees had no option but to accept the transfer of their contract. With hindsight, and after looking after the terms of the judgment, I am glad that the European Court of Justice decided that that was not so.

The Katsikas judgment was designed specifically to protect employees. It was an attempt not to subvert the import of the acquired rights directive but to enhance it by making it clear that a worker was and should be entitled to decide whether he wants his contract to be transferred to the new employer. I hope that there will be no disagreement between us about that. What is objectionable about an employee having the option of saying that he does not want to work for the new employer? The issue is the right to choose for whom one works.

8.15 pm

In the past, the House abolished slavery and ended enforced, conscripted labour. I am sure that Conservative libertarians will accept that individual employees should have the option to decide whether to work for a particular employer. If they exercise that option for genuine reasons —they may, for example, have an aversion to the management style of an employer—and state that they do not wish their contract to be transferred, there is no reason why they should not also claim a number of the statutory employment rights. There is nothing illogical in that.

We could perhaps have a more structured argument about exactly what rights an employee should have in such a case, but our objection to the Government amendment is that the Government are yet again adopting a blunderbuss approach. In an attempt to resolve the so-called dilemma of the Katsikas case, the Government are trying to take away all employment rights from the employee who decides that he will not have his contract transferred to a new employer. Clearly, other options are open to the Government.

Before the Government tabled the amendment, they should, as Lord Wedderburn suggested, at least have considered giving employees the right to claim notice or money in lieu of notice from their old employer. After all, in a transfer the old employer, or the transferor, brings the contract of employment to an end. That must be so, because he is ceasing to trade in a particular business. There is an end to or rupture in the employment relationship. In any other context, the employee would have the right to claim unfair dismissal, redundancy or at least the bare minimum contractual notice. Why do such rights not pertain in a transfer?

I am perfectly prepared to accept that we are dealing with a marginal case which will not involve many employees. If there was an endemic weakness in the regulations or the acquired rights directive, we would have found more examples of British workers saying that they did not want their contract to be transferred, but it has not happened. I may be wrong, but I cannot recall one case of a British worker arguing that before an industrial tribunal. Although the case may be marginal, it has a potential impact on the working prospects of many people. It is unnecessary and severe of the Government to say that employees in this position should have no rights.

There is a case in law for allowing workers to be able to claim at least some of the employment rights to which they would otherwise be entitled. It is regrettable that the Government have taken the opportunity once again to parade their rather dubious European credentials. I am a strong supporter of Britain's membership of the European Community. We should recognise the fact that our only progressive and socially liberal employment measures in the past 14 years have been due to that membership.

I oppose the Government amendments. It is regrettable that the Government have taken the blunderbuss approach to solving a small problem, but it typifies their objectionable attitude to employment protection.

Mr. Graham: I intend to speak for only a few minutes. The hon. Member for Southend, East (Sir T. Taylor) mentioned a letter. When compulsory competitive tendering was introduced in my area, porters, drivers and others lost £50 a week. We must remember that, although competitive tendering may suit the Government, it does not suit employees. Employees should have the right to decide who their employer should be.

I have worked for various companies. I sold my labour to them and when the employer changed, I had the right to move on. If I worked for a good employer, which I did, who decided to sell his company, he did not sell me along with it. He may have sold his business, but he did not sell Tommy Graham the engineer. Tommy Graham had the right to say that he had helped to make the business go well but he did not want to work for the new employer because he had a terrible record in engineering. I am saying that folk are not slaves that one can wheel and deal with.

Mr. Michael Forsyth indicated assent.

Mr. Graham: I am obliged to see that the Minister is nodding his head in agreement, but some of our trade union legislation is the worst in Europe. It is beginning to look as if the Government wish to treat trade union members as slaves, and second-class people in Europe.

Surely a man or woman who has worked for a local authority or a similar organisation for 20 years has the right to say, "I do not want to go to that employer." That person may have good reasons, such as those that I have already mentioned. The new employer may have a bad industrial record with trade unions and a record of firing people that is second to none. The worker may say, "I would rather take the money and cut, and see if I can get a better job." Surely that is the right of all workers in this country.

Mr. Forsyth: I agree with the observations of the hon. Member for Renfrew, West and Inverclyde (Mr. Graham) on slavery. He is right to say that, if he were employed by someone and the company were sold, the employer had not sold him along with the company. Indeed, that seems to be the principal objection of my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East (Sir T. Taylor) to the acquired rights directive, because where a business is transferred or sold, the employees are transferred, if they wish, and retain all the employment rights, including pay and conditions, whether or not the employer purchasing the company or the employer selling the company wishes that to be so. That is what the acquired rights directive has brought about, by means of the TUPE regulations.

Mr. Graham: The Minister must realise that if someone works for 20 years in a company as an ordinary engineer, plumber, baker, butcher or whatever, he accrues 20 years of redundancy money, and if he is older than 50 he get more. Someone in the situation described by the Minister would be throwing up 20 years' work, and 20 years' accrued redundancy money. Come on, Minister, it is not fair.

Mr. Forsyth: I am not sure whether the hon. Gentleman has completely grasped the idea. If there is a transfer to a new employer, the employee's rights transfer to the new employer. If he chooses not to transfer to the new employer, clearly he has no continuing rights with the old employer. I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East, and I am surprised at the hon. Member for Renfrew, West and Inverclyde, who is usually fairly concerned about value for money. For the Labour party to argue that people should be paid redundancy money because they are not prepared to continue to do the same job on the same terms and conditions is absurd. I do not belief that the amendment can have been tabled with any serious belief that it would be accepted. Indeed, the Labour party put forward no such proposal, but made a rather more moderate proposal, in the other place.

The hon. Member for Barrow and Furness (Mr. Hutton) and I had an exchange in Committee when we were discussing the matter, but clearly I did not get my point across to him. He sought to blame the Government for some of the difficulties that have arisen on the transfer of undertakings regulations and said that we had not handled the implementation of the directive properly. He said that the complaints coming from contractors and others involved in local authority work—I understand the concern of my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East about that matter—were entirely due to the Government's implementation of the directive.

I refer the hon. Gentleman to the debates in the other place on 10 December 1981. It is recorded in columns 1485-86 that the Labour spokesman, Lord McCarthy, said:

"The last Labour Government presented"—

Madam Deputy Speaker (Dame Janet Fookes): Order. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman has not recollected that it is not in order to quote from the other place unless it be from a Minister's statement. I rather think that he was not quoting a Minister.

Mr. Forsyth: I am grateful to you, Madam Deputy Speaker. You are right that I should not quote, so if I may I will tell the hon. Member for Barrow and Furness broadly what Lord McCarthy said. He said, as I recall, that the Labour Government had presented the new Government with a draft regulation and that the approach in the 1978 draft by the Labour Government was different from that of the Conservative Government. The noble Lord said that one of the differences was that the Labour version spelled out clearly that charitable bodi

[Mr. Forsyth]

Government Departments and local authorities would be excluded from the scope of the regulations. My hon. Friend for Southend, East is concerned—

Mr. Galbraith rose—

Mr. Forsyth: In a moment.

My hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East is concerned about the interpretation of the European Court, which has been taken up by the Commission, of the phrase:

"not in the nature of a commercial venture".

That was the phrase that the noble Lord criticised as not having explicitly excluded local authorities from the scope of the regulations.

Mr. Galbraith: I well remember the Minister giving us that explanation in Committee. He will also remember that I said that the Labour spokesman whom he has quoted from memory said those words because no Labour Government, and no Labour Member, could conceive of a situation in which a local authority would wish to contract out its services. That is why it was not necessary to apply the regulations to such a situation. On the same basis, the Shops Act 1950 did not apply to Scotland. It was considered that we were such a religious nation that we would never open our shops on Sundays. We were wrong on that, and the premise behind the Labour Government's belief that it was unnecessary for the regulations to apply to local authorities was wrong, too. We did not support the principle then, and we do not support it now.

Mr. Forsyth: That is a nice theory, but unfortunately it does not stand up. I also seem to recall—of course, I cannot quote exactly the words that the noble Lord used, but no doubt the hon. Gentleman will look up the reference—that Lord McCarthy went on to say that the original draft by the Labour Government would avoid endless arguments about what constituted a commercial venture. In that sense he was right, and prescient about things to come.

Sir Teddy Taylor: It does not matter what the Labour party said or thought in 1981, or what the Minister thought in 1981. Surely we accept that all that is irrelevant. The Europeans have told us what the facts are; what people think does not matter. The Europeans tell us and we have to accept it, right or wrong, whatever was said in 1981. Does the Minister not accept that it is rather silly to be concerned about what Labour said in 1981? That does not matter. Democracy is effectively dead, and Europe will tell us what the facts are.

Mr. Forsyth: On that basis, presumably we are all wasting our time. It matters what the hon. Member for Barrow and Furness said, because I have to reply to him. He was blaming a Conservative Government for having made a mess of the implementation, so it is entirely appropriate for me to explain what view the Labour Government took.

Mr. Hutton rose——

Mr. Forsyth: I was just about to deal with what my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East said, because I thought that it mattered and that I ought to respond to it. Nevertheless, I shall give way to the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Hutton: I am grateful to the Minister for showing his usual courtesy in giving way. Does he not admit that, throughout the 1980s, Conservative Ministers in various Departments, especially the Department of the Environment and the Department of Employment, made a great fuss about the fact that the regulations would not apply to privatisations and competitive tendering, only to be told in the 1990s by the European Court of Justice that they had applied all along?

Mr. Forsyth: No, I do not agree at all. I am surprised that the hon. Gentleman should say that, because he said that he had read the speech that my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East made in 1981. I do not have that in front of me, so I cannot quote it, but I shall rely on my memory. I think that the Minister at the Dispatch Box at that time was my right hon. and now noble Friend Lord Waddington, and that in response to my hon. Friend's speech he made it clear that the TUPE regulations as such would apply to local authorities. My hon. Friend asked the specific question whether privatisation would be within the scope of the regulations, and my right hon. and noble Friend made it clear that it would. The hon. Member for Barrow and Furness looks puzzled. I realise that this explodes his argument, but he can go to the Library and look up the words, by which, no doubt, he will be persuaded.

My hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East asked a number of questions, most of which did not fall within my area of responsibility.

Mr. George Foulkes (Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley): It has never stopped the Minister in the past.

8.30 pm

Mr. Forsyth: The hon. Gentleman may say that, but I become more conservative and more cautious as I grow older.

My hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East expressed some serious concerns that I know are held outside and inside the House. I will ensure that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment notes those points and that my hon. Friend receives a proper reply, especially about local authority competitive tendering and the case in Eastbourne.

My hon. Friend expressed concern about the way in which the law has been changed beyond what was originally intended by a series of judgments by the European Court. I agree that there has been a significant change in the meaning of the law. The Government believe that the acquired rights directive should be amended and we will continue to argue that, because it cannot be in the interest of value for money to restrain the ability to carry out competitive tendering fairly in the interests of the taxpayer.

Sir Teddy Taylor: If the Government are so anxious to fight the battle and to change the directive, why, when they had the infraction proceedings against them, did they cave in on three of the four demands without a battle? It seems astonishing that they had two years of secret discussions and caved in on three of the four demands. I cannot understand why they are fighting the fourth demand at all.

Mr. Forsyth: It is unfair to describe the Government's approach as having been to cave in without a battle. We must consider the infraction proceedings that are being brought and, on the basis of legal advice, take a judgment on the best way forward. My hon. Friend is right to point out that, in one respect, we are continuing to fight our corner, but for obvious reasons I am not going to comment further.

My hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East knows perfectly well that it is not within the power of the House to alter the terms of the acquired rights directive or to pass legislation in conflict with it, without incurring those same infraction proceedings. If he is anxious about the effect of that directive and the extension of the effect of TUPE, I can understand and sympathise, but the way forward is to seek to amend the directive. That is the Government's position, for which we will continue to fight.

My hon. Friend should be in no doubt about our commitment to achieving change or our understanding of the problems that are being caused across the length and breadth of Britain, of which, I am sure, he will continue to remind us.

Sir Teddy Taylor: I promise that I shall not interrupt my hon. Friend again—[Interruption.] I would not do this if it were not serious. On privatisation, is it the view of the Government that retrospective claims against local authorities will be met by local authorities, by the company or, in terms of Frankovitch, by the Government? Local authorities must know, because millions of pounds and lots of jobs with private firms are at stake. Surely the Minister should give some guidance on retrospective cases. Will councils, employers or the Government pay?

Mr. Forsyth: Ministers are expected to do many things, but they are not expected to give instant legal advice on cases where the facts are not before them. I cannot respond in the way that my hon. Friend would wish. The guidance that has been given by my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney-General has made it clear that each case under TUPE must be considered on its own merits. I am sure that no one's case would be helped if Ministers or anyone else were to make casual off-the-cuff remarks about the implications of the legislation.

Lords amendment No. 32 was tabled and agreed on Report in another place and is concerned with an employee who does not wish to transfer to a new employer when the undertaking in which he works is transferred. It was tabled to make the position clear following speculation about the effects in the United Kingdom of what is known as the Katsikas case. I am amazed that the hon. Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden (Mr. Galbraith), having had such a good Scottish education, is not a classical Greek scholar. Mr. Katsikas was a Greek chef in a German restaurant. He refused to continue as a chef when the restaurant was franchised.

Mr. Dobson: A chef in a Greek restaurant in Germany?

Mr. Forsyth: I am delighted that, on this occasion, the hon. Gentleman has a clear grasp of the detail.

The chef argued that he did not want to continue in the same job and the European Court considered whether he had a right not to transfer. The court held that he had that right. It has been suggested that, under existing United Kingdom law, the contract of an individual who refused to transfer to a new employer would remain in force with the old employer, whether the old employer wished that or not. If the old employer declined to maintain the contract of employment, it was suggested that he would be found to have dismissed the employee, who would then be entitled to redundancy or compensation for unfair dismissal.

I am delighted that the Labour party obviously agrees with the Government's assessment that that would not be so, which is why it tabled its rather misguided amendment, which would seek to provide that those who do not wish to transfer to the same job should be paid redundancy money. I do not know whether there is some kind of sabotage programme against competitive tendering in the public sector or some hidden agenda, but I cannot believe that the Labour party tabled this rather absurd amendment on an idle afternoon. Labour Members would like public sector employees whose operations are privatised or transferred to be able to get redundancy payments for refusing to transfer and the following day be re-employed in the same post, with all their conditions maintained. That clearly would be an abuse. It would be indefensible and I urge the House to reject the Labour amendment for that reason.

I hasten to add that the Government do not share the view that the contract of an individual who refused to transfer would remain in force. The advice that we have received is that an individual who refused to have his contract of employment transferred to an employer in this way would have no continuing rights against the old employer.

Nevertheless, because we are a careful and cautious Government, it was apparent that the Katsikas judgment had given some scope for uncertainty about the position of individuals who make use of their right to object to the transfer of their employment contracts, and the Government amendment was made on Report in another place not to change the existing law but simply to put the position beyond doubt. Having listened to my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East, I am even more convinced that we were right to do so. Had the position not been placed beyond doubt, I am sure that, at a future date, some other unfortunate Minister would be berated for not having acted swiftly and decisively. I look forward to receiving my hon. Friend's support—along with that of the rest of my hon. Friends—in the Division Lobby. I trust that my hon. Friends will reject amendment (a) and vote for the Government amendment.

Question put, That the amendment to the Lords amendment be made:—

Lords amendment No. 32 agreed to.

Lords amendment: No. 33, after clause 34, insert the following new clause—Agreements not to take proceedings before industrial tribunal—

(".—(1) In section 140 of the 1978 Act (restrictions on contracting out)—

(a) in subsection (2) (exceptions), after the paragraph (fa) inserted by paragraph 21 of Schedule 7 to this Act, there shall be inserted—

"(fb) to any agreement to refrain from instituting or continuing any proceedings specified in section 133(1) (except (c)) or 134(1) before an industrial tribunal if the conditions regulating compromise agreements under this Act are satisfied in relation to the agreement;";

(b) after subsection (2), there shall be inserted—

"(3) The conditions regulating compromise agreements under this Act are that—

(a) the agreement must be in writing;

(b) the agreement must relate to the particular complaint;

(c) the employee must have received independent legal advice from a qualified lawyer as to the terms and effect of the proposed agreement and in particular its effect on his ability to pursue his rights before an industrial tribunal;

(d) there must be in force, when the adviser gives the advice, a policy of insurance covering the risk of a claim by the employee in respect of loss arising in consequence of the advice;

(e) the agreement must identify the adviser; and

(f) the agreement must state that the conditions regulating compromise agreements under this Act are satisfied.

(4) In subsection (3)—

"independent", in relation to legal advice to the employee, means that it is given by a lawyer who is not acting in the matter for the employer or an associated employer; and

"qualified lawyer" means—

(a) as respects proceedings in England and Wales—

(i) a barrister, whether in practice as such or employed to give legal advice, or

(ii) a solicitor of the Supreme Court who holds a practising certificate;

(b) as respects proceedings in Scotland—

(i) an advocate, whether in practice as such or employed to give legal advice, or

(ii) a solicitor who holds a practising certificate."

(2) Schedule (Compromise contracts) to this Act shall have effect for making corresponding amendments in the Sex Discrimination Act 1975, the Race Relations Act 1976, the Wages Act 1986 and the Trade Union and Labour Relations (Consolidation) Act 1992.")

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Employment (Miss Ann Widdecombe): I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Madam Deputy Speaker (Dame Janet Fookes): With this it will be convenient to discuss Lords amendments Nos. 43, 61 and 62.

Miss Widdecombe: It gives me great pleasure to put to the House Lords amendment No. 33. My hon. Friend the Member for Elmet (Mr. Batiste) drew our attention in Committee to employers' concerns in this matter. Therefore, I hope that he, and indeed all hon. Members, will welcome the new provisions. I hope that after the previous unsuccessful skirmish there will be peace among the Opposition, at least in respect of this provision.

Amendments Nos. 33 and 61 offer a new, alternative means by which the parties to a particular dispute may reach a speedy and effective agreement between them which settles the dispute, without needing to refer it to an industrial tribunal. It will, however, be possible to do that only if a number of important conditions included for the express purpose of safeguarding the interests of the individual are met.

Under the proposed new provisions, if an agreement settling a dispute includes a term which precludes an individual's right to bring or to continue proceedings before an industrial tribunal in respect of that dispute, that term will be enforceable provided that all the relevant conditions are satisfied.

At present, under the 1978 Act, any term in an agreement which precludes the employee's right to bring proceedings before an industrial tribunal is generally invalid. It cannot prevent the employee from bringing a subsequent tribunal case, the main exception being where an Advisory, Conciliation and Arbitration Service conciliation officer has taken action under section 133 or section 134 of the 1978 Act to assist the settlement. Similar provisions are contained in the Sex Discrimination Act 1975, and the Race Relations Act 1976, the Wages Act 1986 and the 1992 consolidation Act. Amendment No. 61 would amend those Acts in the same way as we propose to amend the 1978 Act.

If the parties to a dispute have already reached an agreement between themselves, ACAS takes the view that it has no statutory role to become involved. In such a case there is no dispute outstanding and therefore, by definition, nothing to conciliate. In this it is supported by legal advice. The practice of validating, or "rubber-stamping", privately reached agreements represented a considerable drain on ACAS resources until it ceased after receipt of that advice in 1990. In 1989, the last year before that service was withdrawn, ACAS dealt with well over 17,000 such cases, representing 36 per cent. of the total number of cases received.

Representations seeking a change to the current situation have been made by a number of employer associations. We have therefore consulted interested parties on the proposals set out in the amendments, and the response has revealed that they would indeed be welcomed.

The proposed means of settling disputes will, of course, be optional. No one can be forced into signing such an agreement; people will always be able to choose to take their claim to an industrial tribunal instead. However, it is obvious that any legislation which allows individuals to agree not to bring or to continue with tribunal proceedings, even if doing so is optional, must be very tightly drawn for the protection of the individual. The amendments therefore include a number of important conditions which must be met if the term of the agreement which precludes the employee's right subsequently to bring a tribunal claim is to be binding. That is to ensure that no one is misled or coerced.

First, the new provisions can be used only in respect of a dispute which has already arisen between the parties and is outstanding. Concerns have reached us from some quarters that the new provisions could be used to encourage individuals to agree not to bring any tribunal claims should disputes arise in the future. I can reassure hon. Members that it would not be possible to use the provisions to do that. It is a condition that the agreement should relate to a specific dispute that has already arisen, and, if that condition is not met, the term of the agreement which precludes a tribunal claim will not be enforceable.

Secondly, the amendments require that the individual must have received advice from a qualified solicitor or barrister or, in Scotland, an advocate satisfying the conditions set out in the amendments.

9 pm

The adviser, who must be named in the agreement, must also be independent of the other party or parties to the dispute. The adviser must advise the individual about the terms and effect of the agreement, especially its effect on his or her right to pursue a tribunal claim with regard to the dispute to be settled by the agreement. The advice must be covered by insurance so that, in the event of the individual suffering loss as a result of negligent advice, he or she will be adequately protected. Finally, the agreement must be in writing, and must state that the relevant conditions are satisfied.

I hope that hon. Members will agree that those conditions will adequately safeguard the interests of individuals, while at the same time offering a simple and effective means of settling individual disputes without adding unnecessarily to the already considerable work load of our industrial tribunals.

Amendment No. 62 will amend schedule 13 of the 1978 Act, which deals with the rules governing the calculation of an individual's period of continuous employment. At present, schedule 13 allows for regulations to be made to preserve continuity of employment when an individual is reinstated or re-engaged as a consequence of the presentation of a claim of unfair dismissal under the 1978 Act, and when he is re-employed as a consequence of an agreement reached with the help of an ACAS conciliation officer when he claims action has been taken where he could present a claim of unfair dismissal.

The amendment extends the order-making power so that regulations can be made to ensure that, when individuals are re-employed as a consequence of an agreement reached under the proposed new provisions in the 1978 Act for settling a complaint relating to unfair dismissal, or the new provisions in the Sex Discrimination Act 1975 or the Race Relations Act 1976, continuity of employment will be preserved in exactly the same way.

It also extends the order-making power to cover re-employment as a consequence of the presentation of a complaint of dismissal under the Sex Discrimination Act or the Race Relations Act, and re-employment after conciliation by an ACAS officer with regard to such a claim, but before such a claim has been presented. That closes a lacuna in the existing provisions.

I hope, therefore, to have the support of hon. Members on both sides of the House in moving that we agree with the House of Lords amendments.

Mr. Spencer Batiste (Elmet): As my hon. Friend the Minister said, this amendment arises out of a clause that I submitted to the Committee to address what is and has been since 1970—and, indeed, for a period before that—a real problem in industrial relations. It cannot be right that, when two sides to a dispute voluntarily reach an acceptable agreement, there is no mechanism for making that agreement enforceable.

I accept that there were some defects in the clause that I submitted and I withdrew it on the undertaking that the Government would produce a clause in another place. The Government have produced such a clause and I wholeheartedly endorse it. I congratulate them on striking a sensible balance between the need to provide a relatively simple and easy method of resolving disputes and the need to protect the rights of individuals.

When I first read this clause, I thought that there might be a slight problem in that it would require employers to rely on a declaration by a solicitor or by a barrister representing the employee that various conditions had been met which they might be unable to verify. However, after examining it in practical terms, the likelihood of that presenting a problem would be limited. The professional bodies of both barristers and solicitors would deal heavily with any member of the profession who signed a false declaration.

On that basis, there should be no obstacle to agreeing to the clause. It will be widely welcomed by industry at large as a way of bringing peace and certainty to an area of industrial relations which has caused significant problems since ACAS withdrew from performing this service.

Mr. Galbraith: I assure the Under-Secretary of State for Employment that hostilities on this Bill have probably come to an end. I cannot absolutely rule out a knee in the groin as we depart from the battlefield, but we can probably say that there is peace in our time.

This clause has resulted from the efforts of the hon. Member for Elmet (Mr. Batiste) and he must be congratulated on that. The Government have introduced a reasonable and simple clause that has the important aspect of guaranteeing the rights of individuals. I am impressed by the conditions that are laid out—the employee must have received independent legal advice from a qualified lawyer and the agreement must be in writing. Those matters are of supreme importance.

The hon. Gentleman is correct not to worry about the question of false declarations. I understand that the legal profession is bound by an ethical code, as are most professions. One of the great sins of any profession is to make a false declaration. In the medical profession, doctors do not get struck off for killing anyone. But if they indulge in alcohol, adultery, advertising or false declaration, they can lose their livelihood. I presume that the position in the legal profession is similar. Alcohol is probably excluded from the list that applies to the legal profession.

The clause is simple and straightforward and it deals with an important issue. I am grateful to the Government for introducing it in such a splendid manner. It is such a good clause that I almost thought that I must have written it.

Question put and agreed to.

New clause

Lords amendment: No. 34—Restriction of publicity in cases involving sexual misconduct: industrial tribunals—

(".—(1) Schedule 9 to the 1978 Act (regulations for industrial tribunals) shall be amended by the insertion in paragraph 1 of the following.

(2) After sub-paragraph (5) there shall be inserted—

"(5A) The regulations may include provision—

(a) for cases involving allegations of the commission of sexual offences, for securing that the registration or other making available of documents or decisions shall be so effected as to prevent the identification of any person affected by, or making, the allegation;

(b) for cases involving allegations of sexual misconduct, enabling an industrial tribunal, on the application of any party to proceedings before it or of its own motion, to make a restricted reporting order having effect (if not revoked earlier) until the promulgation of the decision of the tribunal.

In this sub-paragraph—

"identifying matter", in relation to a person, means any matter likely to lead members of the public to identify him as a person affected by, or as the person making, the allegation;

"restricted reporting order" means an order prohibiting the publication in Great Britain of identifying matter in a written publication available to the public or its inclusion in a relevant programme for reception in Great Britain;

"sexual misconduct" means the commission of a sexual offence, sexual harassment or other adverse conduct (of whatever nature) related to sex, and conduct is related to sex whether the relationship with sex lies in the character of the conduct or in its having reference to the sex or sexual orientation of the person at whom the conduct is directed;

"sexual offence" means any offence to which section 141A(2) of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1975, section 4 of the Sexual Offences (Amendment) Act 1976 or the Sexual Offences (Amendment) Act 1992 applies (offences under the Sexual Offences Act 1956, the Sexual Offences (Scotland) Act 1976 and certain other enactments); and "written publication" and "relevant programme" have the same meaning as in that Act of 1992."

(3) In sub-paragraph (6), after the word "send" there shall be inserted the words "(subject to any regulations under sub-paragraph (5A)(a))".

(4) After sub-paragraph (7) there shall be inserted—

"(8) If any identifying matter is published or included in a relevant programme in contravention of a restricted reporting order the following persons shall be guilty of an offence and liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding level 5 on the standard scale—

(a) in the case of publication in a newspaper or periodical, any proprietor, any editor and any publisher of the newspaper or periodical;

(b) in the case of publication in any other form, the person publishing the matter; and

(c) in the case of matter included in a relevant programme—

(i) any body corporate engaged in providing the service in which the programme is included; and

(ii) any person having functions in relation to the programme corresponding to those of an editor of a newspaper.

Expressions used in this sub-paragraph and in sub-paragraph (5A) above have the same meaning in this sub-paragraph as in that sub-paragraph.

(9) Where a person is charged with an offence under sub-paragraph (8) it shall be a defence to prove that at the time of the alleged offence he was not aware, and neither suspected nor had reason to suspect, that the publication or programme in question was of, or (as the case may be) included, the matter in question.

(10) Where an offence under sub-paragraph (8) committed by a body corporate is proved to have been committed with the consent or connivance of, or to be attributable to any neglect on the part of—

(a) a director, manager, secretary or other similar officer of the body corporate, or

(b) a person purporting to act in any such capacity, he as well as the body corporate shall be guilty of the offence and liable to be proceeded against and punished accordingly.

(11) In relation to a body corporate whose affairs are managed by its members "director", in sub-paragraph (10), means a member of the body corporate."")

Miss Widdecombe: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Madam Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss Lords amendments Nos. 35 and 44.

Miss Widdecombe: Amendment No. 34 gives industrial tribunals discretionary powers to protect people from intrusive or offensive media reports when they are involved in cases which include allegations of sexual misconduct. The definition of sexual misconduct covers sexual offences, sexual harassment and other adverse conduct based on sex, or relating to the sex or sexual orientation of the person at whom the conduct is directed.

The tribunals themselves sought such powers, and when the Department of Employment consulted interested organisations earlier this year, it was clear that there would be widespread support for such a move. The responses show that some potential applicants are deterred from bringing tribunal cases involving allegations of sexual harassment for fear of hostile and intrusive publicity. Many people find the experience of bringing a complaint which involves such allegations deeply distressing, and it is wrong that their distress should be enhanced by their fears of being identified against their will in salacious and incomplete reports of the case. Therefore, I think that hon. Members will agree that it is in the public interest that discretionary reporting restrictions should be available in such cases.

The amendment falls into two halves. New paragraph 4A(a) covers the small number of cases which involve allegations constituting an indecent assault or more serious sexual offence. It gives industrial tribunals powers to remove permanently from decisions and any other documents available to the public any information which would identify any person making or affected by the allegations. Those powers are largely needed to avoid the risk of the tribunals themselves committing a technical breach of the Sexual Offences (Amendment) Act 1992. That Act, which applies in England and Wales, makes it a criminal offence to publish information which would identify the victim of such an offence without their consent for the rest of their life.

New paragraph 4A(b) contains the substantive powers. It covers the potentially larger group of cases which involve allegations of sexual harassment or other sexual misconduct, as defined in the new clause. In cases which involve such allegations the amendment gives industrial tribunals discretionary powers to make restricted reporting orders. Such an order, once made, will prevent any reports of the case published or broadcast in Great Britain from including information which would identify anyone making or affected by those allegations. The order will not be made automatically, but only where the tribunal sees fit. It will lapse on promulgation of the tribunal's decision unless it is revoked earlier by the tribunal. Transgression of the order will be a criminal offence punishable by a fine not exceeding level 5 on the standard scale, currently £5,000.

Amendment No. 35 gives the Employment Appeal Tribunal discretionary powers equivalent to those given to the industrial tribunals by amendment No. 34. The powers to be given to the EAT cover appeals in cases which involve allegations of sexual misconduct, where the proceedings are appeals against an industrial tribunal's decision or refusal to make a restricted reporting order, or against any interlocutory decision in a case where such an order had been made.

In appeals in cases which involve allegations of an indecent assault or other more serious sexual offence, the amendment gives the EAT powers to remove information which might identify any person making or affected by those allegations permanently from decisions and any other documents which are available to the public. As in the case of amendment No. 34, those powers are largely needed to allow the EAT to avoid the risk of committing a technical breach of the Sexual Offences (Amendment) Act 1992.

I hope that hon. Members from both sides of the House will join in the Government's strong condemnation of sexual harassment. The purpose of the amendments is to protect individuals in cases involving such allegations from offensive and intrusive reporting and to encourage potential applicants who might otherwise be deterred by the fear of such publicity to pursue their complaints.

Ms Quin: I congratulate the Minister on her appointment and wish her well. I hope that, in the course of her tenure, she will turn out to be a champion of women's rights at work. This amendment helps women at work, although I regret that so much else in the Bill does not.

The Opposition welcome the amendment, which is very much in line with suggestions that we have made in the past. We also welcome the strengthening of its wording at the instigation of Baroness Lockwood. We are glad that the Government took her additional words into account.

We also welcome the fact that there has been consultation and that the Government have listened to the various organisations that have made representations to them. We would encourage such listening.

We are fully aware that, in some cases of sexual harassment, harm may be caused to an innocent party by intrusive publicity. That is why we welcome the amendment, which allows reporting restrictions. I have one or two questions about it, however. We are somewhat concerned about how widely the new provisions may be interpreted. Of course, the Minister said that the reporting restrictions will not be granted automatically—that is important. Still, we must strike a balance between the need to ensure that such cases are understood by the general public and are not pursued behind closed doors, and the need to protect innocent parties.

It can often be in the interests of the accused to avoid publicity altogether. We do not want to make that too easy. Although there have been many cases of which the reporting has been most intrusive, there have also been cases where reporting has raised awareness of the problem among employers, employees and the public. Some such cases have contributed to the problem being taken seriously, and we should all be pleased about that.

I know that some people say that all publicity is good publicity. I do not share that view; nor do I share the view that all publicity is bad publicity. We should be aware of the gains that publicity can produce. If reporting the results of sexual harassment cases is restricted, it may become more difficult to persuade employers that the subject requires proper complaints procedures and preventive measures. When a complaint of sexual harassment has been upheld by a tribunal, press reports can be an important means of emphasising employers' responsibility to take action to prevent sexual harassment in the workplace. Although the names of the harasser and the victim are often not necessary, some reporting of the name of the employer and the workplace can be an effective method of alerting other employers to their responsibilities under the law.

I should like the Minister to comment in more detail on these observations and to undertake to monitor how the provision works in practice, so that, if there is a danger that it is being interpreted too widely, the matter will be reviewed in future.

9.15 pm

Miss Widdecombe: With the leave of the House, Madam Deputy Speaker, I shall reply briefly to the points that have been made.

I am very grateful to the hon. Member for Gateshead, East (Ms Quin) for her broadly supportive approach to the amendment. The Government are seeking to strike a balance. The hon. Lady made the valid point that publicity arising from sexual harassment cases draws the public's attention to the problem, deters employers from tolerating such activity and encourages them to ensure that they do not themselves become the subjects of such publicity. On the other hand, there will be no publicity at all if people do not bring complaints.

We have to strike a balance between encouraging public examination of the problem and deterring people from taking action as a result of what may have been extremely distressing circumstances. When people are deterred, the perpetrator is not called to account and is left free to carry on with his conduct. I believe that that balance is ensured, first, by the discretionary nature of the power—I repeat that it is certainly not automatic—and, secondly, by the fact that the order will lapse on promulgation of the decision, at which point the facts of the case and of the determination will be made known.

As in the case of the employment tribunals, in whose work we are interested although they are independent, we shall keep a close eye on the progress and effects of the legislation. I can certainly give the hon. Lady an undertaking that if this were ever interpreted as being automatic, we should want to put an end to such an interpretation.

Question put and agreed to.

Lords amendments Nos. 35, 36, 65, 79 and 37 agreed to.

Clause 37

REQUIREMENT TO INFORM EMPLOYER OF PREGNANCY ETC.

Lords amendment: No. 38, in page 54, line 26, at end insert:

"; and in doing so the Secretary of State shall have regard to the requirements of disabled persons."

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.—[Mr. Michael Forsyth.]

Madam Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss Lords amendments Nos. 39 and 40.

Mr. Galbraith: You will remember, Madam Deputy Speaker, that a brief moment ago we had a declaration of peace in our time and the cessation of hostilities. I was unable to guarantee departure from the field without putting a knee in the groin. However, I have had to reconsider my position, as a knee in the groin would be unfair to the Minister, who knows that I am only too willing to be fair to him. I shall therefore limit my activity to a shout of "Yah-boo" as we close hostilities.

My concern is not with the efforts that the Minister has made on our behalf and on behalf of the disabled. A fairly strong amendment would impose on Highlands and Islands Enterprise and Scottish Enterprise some sort of duty to take account of the needs of the disabled. The Minister thought originally that he had agreement with the Scottish Office, but this was more difficult to get through its system than he thought it would be. When he was a Minister in the Scottish Office, he was able to push through virtually anything at will. This is an indication of what happens when a Minister is moved to a Department dealing with matters on a United Kingdom basis.

Thus, this is a somewhat weakened amendment. I do not blame the Minister, and I know that he will not take my remarks personally, as he never takes anything personally. This provision makes reference to such times as the Secretary of State may require—not will require: there is no absolute statutory obligation—provision, if any, to be made. There may or may not be provisions for disabled people. It depends on what takes the Secretary of State's fancy because he has no obligation to include such provisions. That is probably the best compromise that the Minister could reach, but I am disappointed by this weak amendment.

The Minister knows the background to our amendment, so I shall not go through it. It relates to Lennox Castle hospital in my constituency for people with learning and physical disabilities. It had a useful garden project that was funded in part by the local enterprise company, but financial provision was withdrawn. That seems to be happening all over the country. When money in the enterprise companies becomes tight, provision of training for the disabled is the first item to be sacrificed.

Our amendment sought to redress the balance and to place on the Government a statutory obligation to consider the training rights of such people. The Minister agreed with the thrust of our amendment and tried his best. Unfortunately, he has not been completely successful.

[Mr. Galbraith]

There is another reason for a stronger amendment. At Question Time, the Minister and I had a discussion across the Dispatch Box about the laws relating to the employment of the disabled, and especially the 1944 legislation, in cases where the 20 per cent. quota is not enforced. The Minister has said that the policy is one of virtual non-enforcement.

It is difficult to get employers to fulfil their obligations. The Minister said that the Government try to cajole and convince them without having recourse to the law. It makes matters more difficult when the local training and enterprise companies do not have an obligation and can withdraw from looking after the unemployed. For those two reasons we sought a stronger amendment. The Minister has done his best and we are grateful for the amendment, but we wish that it was stronger than "may or may not" and "what, if any". We should be much happier with a statutory obligation to provide training for the disabled and others.

The motion seeks the approval of the House to the amendment by Order in Council of schedule 1 to the 1975 Act. As the House is aware, the Act is concerned with the maintenance of the independence of the House and the safeguarding of hon. Members from undue influence by the Executive through the exercise of patronage. Schedule 1 lists those offices whose holders are thereby disqualified from membership of the House.

It has been the usual practice for any legislation establishing new offices or winding up existing ones to amend schedule 1 accordingly. The 1975 Act is therefore reprinted from time to time in accordance with the provisions of the Act, to incorporate such amendments. The last reprint was made on 1 March 1992; a further reprint will be ordered after the new order has been made.

In addition, from time to time it is necessary to use the procedure outlined in section 5(1) of the Act to bring schedule 1 up to date by Order in Council. That section provides for the schedule to be amended following a resolution by the House, by adding offices which have been created by administrative action, by amending or correcting existing entries and by deleting offices that no longer exist or in relation to which a statutory disqualification is no longer appropriate. The procedure has been followed on nine previous occasions: the first was in 1961, and the last in December 1990.

Copies of the explanatory note describing the amendments in detail have been available in the Vote Office since 11 June. Perhaps I should add that Ministers have been individually responsible for the details of the additional entries and deletions which cover offices within their areas of responsibility. They have based their judgments on the same general principles and criteria which have been followed in the past and which are covered in the explanatory note. Of the 61 amendments, 37 are new entries, 13 are deletions and 11 are amendments to existing entries. Approximately 381 office holders will be brought into the scope of schedule 1. Up to 58 others will no longer be disqualified: that includes offices that have been abolished. There is therefore a net increase of 323 office holders disqualified. Of the 381 added to the schedule, up to 225 are part-time chairmen of child support appeal tribunals.

We also propose that the "de minimis" level—that is, the level below which paid offices in the gift of the Crown or Ministers do not normally attract disqualification—should be raised to £8,000. The "de minimis" limit, of course, has no effect on the level of remuneration received by office holders; its purpose is merely to prevent trivial disqualification. The 1990 figure of £7,000 has been uprated approximately in line with movements in average earnings, and remains within the range of a quarter to a third of Members' salaries.

[Mr. David Davis]

As we are following a well-established procedure, I commend the motion to the House.

9.26 pm

Mr. Mark Fisher (Stoke-on-Trent, Central): I congratulate the Minister on his appointment. I welcome him to his new post, and to his first chance to speak following his time in the Whips Office,.

The details of the amendments and additions to schedule 1 to the 1975 Act are not in themselves greatly contentious, but I welcome this opportunity—the first since 1990—to consider the scope and purpose of parliamentary disqualification. The principle of disqualification, the criteria on which it should apply and who, in practice, should be disqualified are issues that go to the heart of the powers and independence of the House. It is proper that certain groups should be disqualified from membership. Broadly, those groups fall into two categories—those who should be disqualified because of lack of competence and those involved in a clash of interests that requires a separation of powers.

About six further categories are included in the first category: examples are treason, imprisonment for more than one year in Britain—and, strangely, in the Republic of Ireland—and corrupt practices at elections. The Mental Health Act 1983 refers to a statutory procedure for vacating the seat of a sitting Member of unsound mind. I do not know whether the House would agree on exactly what constitutes "unsound mind", and on how subjective that definition is—we could debate that for some time.

Curiously, people under the age of 21 are also banned from the House. That would have denied it the services of Charles James Fox and Lord John Russell, and it would probably have been a weaker House for that. It is interesting to note that Sir Edward Coke, the great jurist, wrote in 1623 that several "infants" sat in the House in his day

"by connivancy—but if questioned would be put out"— rather like dogs, I assume.

The Minister did not touch on the chief aspect of lack of competence, which is bankruptcy. That is of particular interest to the House at a time when, under the present Government, the number of personal bankruptcies has risen.

Madam Deputy Speaker (Dame Janet Fookes): Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. Gentleman, but I am afraid that he is straying beyond the remit of what is before us this evening.

Mr. Fisher: Whether the amendments should include bankrupts, and what the implications of that are, is important and I seek an assurance from the Minister on it.

Bankruptcies have risen from 7,728 in 1988 to 32,106 in 1992. A great many people have been disqualified by the Government's economic incompetence. The House would appreciate an assurance from the Minister that the Government have no plans to protect Lloyd's names and, by doing so, to protect the 47 Tory Members who apparently, according to press reports, are at risk of losing their seats and being disqualified for reasons of bankruptcy.

An assurance from the Minister would relieve a great deal of press speculation. [Interruption.] I will certainly give way to the hon. Member for Aberdeen, South (Mr. Robertson) if he wishes to intervene. If he does not, I am sure that he will agree with a former Member of the House, Mr. Thomas Benyon, who is a director of the Society of Names. Last week, Mr. Benyon said that this "is a time bomb adding uncertainty to the ability of the Major Government to keep its majority intact for the next two or three years."

As the House is debating disqualification for the first time, these matters may be of considerable interest to 47 hon. Members. I am surprised that the hon. Member for Aberdeen, South is not taking it more seriously. No one wants to see hon. Members being disqualified.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): What?

Mr. Fisher: We should like to see them beaten at the ballot box, but not necessarily disqualified.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Geoffrey Lofthouse): Order. In the short time that I have been in the Chair, it appears to me that the type of disqualification that the hon. Member is talking about is not set out in the motion as a disqualification.

Mr. Fisher: That is true, but as we are debating the 1975 Act and amendments to it for the first time in three years, and it is an important current issue, an assurance from the Minister that Lloyd's names will not be handled separately would be an important assurance. I will willingly give way to the Minister if he wants to put the record straight.

Mr. Skinner: My hon. Friend said that the last thing he wanted to see was Tory Members being disqualified. I will tell him straight. If we see 47 Tory Members up to their necks in debt and being made bankrupt, I hope that he will join me in the Lobby to make sure they are kicked out.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will now return to the motion.

Mr. Fisher: My hon. Friend did not quite catch my drift. I would prefer to see them beaten at the ballot box where they deserve to be beaten, and I am sure that we agree about that.

I turn to the second category which is absolutely central to the amendments—those areas in which there is a clash of interests. We all know about the armed forces, the police and the judicial offices, but the categories added to schedule 1 by today's amendments all involve quangos. As the Minister said, the Government are adding 381 new posts to schedule 1. Those quangos were set up by the Government, as indeed were the previous 2,600 additions to the Act between 1987 and 1990. There are not many growth industries in Britain under this Government, but quangos are certainly one.

It is proper that people who head and work for quangos should be disqualified because of the potential clash of interests. They are, in effect, Government employees, and, like civil servants, they ought to be disqualified. The Government are the quango kings. Inevitably, the amendments will be repeated in the few years left to the Government because they are so intent on creating quangos—40,000 posts in 1,412 quangos, which spend an amazing one fifth of all Government expenditure.

My hon. Friend the Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden (Mr. Galbraith) has pointed out that in Scotland one third of all Government expenditure is directed through quangos. As the Government are using quangos as an instrument of government, it is absolutely right that those who do the Government's work through those quangos should be disqualified from being Members of the House as if they were civil servants. It is interesting to note that the Government, by bringing forward the motion, accept the fact that those people are arms of Government and civil servants in all but name and conditions of work.

As the Government seem to imply by the motion, finance is the key. The quangos are public bodies spending public money and it is right that there should be a separation of powers to prevent a clash of interests. The Government do not always seem to understand that there might be such a clash of interests.

Baroness Denton, referring to the 804 appointments at the Department of Trade and Industry, said, "I cannot remember knowingly appointing a Labour supporter." The Government rigorously control the political complexion of the quangos—[HON. MEMBERS: "Rubbish."] Baroness Denton said that she never knowingly appointed a Labour appointee and if Conservative Members are proud of that and believe that that is the right way in which to handle quango appointments, let them intervene in the debate. The Minister's words are on the record and she has never taken them back.

Mr. Graham Riddick (Colne Valley): To put the record straight, the point that my noble Friend was making was that she does not consider the party political affiliations of people whom she appoints. She appoints people on merit. That is the important point. It has nothing to do with party politics.

Mr. Fisher: I am not sure whether the hon. Gentleman is being deliberately humorous or disingenuous, but he knows perfectly well that Baroness Denton meant something totally different. She said that she was proud that she was appointing only non-Labour people.

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): If I were my hon. Friend, I would not take any notice of the hon. Member for Colne Valley (Mr. Riddick), who is on record as saying that the BBC radio programme "Start the Week" is communist propaganda. If the hon. Gentleman is prepared to take that view, he would be prepared to believe that Baroness Denton tried to appoint people on a neutral basis.

Mr. Fisher: If the hon. Member for Colne Valley (Mr. Riddick) will not accept the word of a Minister, perhaps he will accept the words of the Financial Times, which did a survey showing that, of the 10 largest quangos and the 30 largest quangos in the national health service, not one had a chairperson who was either a Liberal Democrat or a Labour supporter, but eight were paid-up members of the Conservative party. It is clear that the Government have a clear and consistent policy and that is why it is right that, because of the clash of interests, those people should be disqualifed from membership of the House.

What the Government do not seem to understand is the difference between their interests and the interests of Parliament or the interests of the Tory party and the interests of the Government. That they cannot make that distinction is to the Government's discredit. They need the separation of powers implicit in the Act, because for the Government it is a seamless robe.

I hope that the new Minister will bring a fresh eye and some intelligence to his responsibilities. I hope that he will bring a new look to his job—I am being nice to him again—and consider the role of disqualification and the clash of interests involved. He can make a start by reducing the number of quangos, by giving us a categorical assurance now that he will have no amnesty for Lloyd's names on bankruptcy and then by working with the Government to try to change the economic policies that are causing such ruin and shoving up the number of bankruptcies across the country to more than 32,000 in the past year.

The Opposition will not oppose the motion, but we shall keep a watchful eye on the Government's quango mania. We shall await the real disqualification act which will be the general election, when the Government will find that they are disqualified from office by the British people.

9.39 pm

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South) rose——

Dr. Robert Spink (Castle Point): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Can you advise me how the hon. Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer) can possibly comment, when he was not in the Chamber for the Minister's opening remarks?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: That matter is not a point of order for me. Mr. Cryer.

Mr. Cryer: I am grateful to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The Minister spoke so rapidly that I was unable to get to the Chamber in time to hear his maiden speech as a representative of the right-wing extremists in the Whips Office now in the Government. I am sorry that I missed it—all two minutes of it.

When this motion appeared in the Whip, all the reporters and Lobby correspondents sought it out immediately, to see whether it contained other than routine changes to the 1975 Act of the kind that are made from time to time. They wanted to make sure that the Government were not trying to get off the hook the 47 Tory Members of Parliament who are up to their necks in debt at Lloyd's. [Interruption.] In fact, the motion does not say that. However, that matter is of considerable concern, particularly to those of us who were here in 1981, when Tory after Tory said that Lloyd's should have all the self-regulation that it wanted because it was such a wonderful——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. We are straying down that road again, and I have already drawn that to the attention of the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central (Mr. Fisher). I hope that the hon. Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer) will return to the subject of the debate.

Mr. Cryer: I shall try my very best, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but Conservative Members were shouting from a sedentary position in a most unruly and undignified fashion, which brings disgrace to this great mother of Parliaments. I do not know how they can do it. It is quite appalling. I am grateful for your protection, Mr. Deputy Speaker, against that pin-stripe mob that is trying to break up democracy.

The proposed alteration to schedule 1 to the 1975 Act reflects the Government's penchant for appointing people instead of extending democratic principles. If the Government were concerned about some of those institutions, they could extend local authority democracy, by allowing some functions—if not all—to be undertaken in association with local authorities. The Government prefer to appoint people, which is a system of political patronage.

The hon. Member for Colne Valley (Mr. Riddick) knows that that is true. He might protest when we say that such appointments are based on Conservative political attitudes, but the Government's record of the past 14 years is one of dedication to the application of political prejudice in every possible walk of life. It has been a corrosive influence. The Government have used patronage—of which this measure is an example—and extended the powers and expenditure of quangos. That was suggested in a recent issue of the Financial Times.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central (Mr. Fisher) mentioned, one fifth of Government expenditure is now made not through Parliament but through the allocation of moneys to quangos. It is clear from the explanatory note provided with the measure that some people are now paid honorariums, whereas before they did the job for nothing. The payment of those sums of money brings them within the scope of the legislation. That shows the extent of the patronage that the Government are doling out.

Labour will examine some of those appointments, to see whether they cannot be placed on a more democratic footing, instead of the terrible business of the Government handing out appointments on the basis that those appointed support the party in power. That has been a canker in our body politic. After the next general election, we shall take a good look at that situation, to see whether we can improve matters.

We can expect more such amendments, because of the Government's shifting sands of patronage. Many quango chairmen, chairwomen and members receive salaries that are way beyond the scope of ordinary people—they are very well paid. It is proof of the power of patronage that it buys people's support, even if there is doubt about that support in the beginning.

I have already mentioned Baroness Thatcher. It is worth remembering that she coined a phrase that echoed throughout her years as Prime Minister. She asked about any candidate, "Is he one of us?" and used that as the political test of reliability. If a Labour Government had applied the same test, they would have been hounded by the press, but because the vast majority of the press is on the side of the Conservative party, it pays little or no heed to the political corruption about which the Minister is now smiling.

The Minister is a former Whip and therefore in an ideal position to hand out patronage because, as a Whip, he has been bullying and bribing Tory Members for the past few years. He would tell them that if they were not present, they would not be allowed to go on free trips or become members of Select Committees. He knows all about patronage, which is very much part of the legislation. We shall examine the legislation again. We are unhappy about it as it stands, but this has been a useful debate to highlight the Tory party's patronage system.

9.45 pm

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): I, too, missed the beginning of the debate, but I have picked it up as I went along.

I have been scanning the list of new quangos which have been included or excluded, as the case may be. My hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer) is right. The Government have been establishing more quangos, but I cannot see listed the Norman Lamont legal aid defence fund, which should be there.

The ex-Chancellor of the Exchequer was able to get money indirectly from Asil Nadir, but also from the taxpayer——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is straying from the motion. Will he please confine his remarks to the motion?

Mr. Skinner: We are talking about whether people should be disqualified because they have jobs that are in some way connected with money paid by the Government, which means by the taxpayer. The ex-Chancellor of the Exchequer received money from the taxpayer, which means that for a short time he also had an office of profit under the Crown—he was being paid his salary but also received £4,000-odd from the taxpayer. That was Government money and he should therefore have been included in the list. That is my point.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. That is very interesting, but it has nothing to do with the list.

Mr. Skinner: It has nothing to do with the present list. What I am trying to say is that people are disqualified for getting money from Government bodies, quangos or whatever one wants to call them.

I cite an example. When the 1974-79 Labour Government were elected, one of the first things they did was to hold a special mini-debate—you were probably here at the time, Mr. Deputy Speaker—about someone who had been elected to Parliament although he had an office of profit under the Crown. It had to be a Liberal, a Dr. Winstanley. He had been receiving money from the taxpayer and, therefore, through the Government. The Government suddenly realised that Dr. Winstanley should be barred as a Member of Parliament.

I think that it was Lord Glenamara, Ted Short at the time, who presented to the House a motion similar to that presented this evening by the Minister. I came into the Chamber and wondered what was happening. The Labour Government did not need the Liberals' support at the time as they still had a majority—we still had Stonehouse plus two. I found that the Labour Leader of the House was making arrangements to allow that Liberal whippersnapper off the hook, although he had broken the law.

The amount of money was small, but the Liberal was on a medical panel, and attended various panels and tribunals during the year. It happened on only a few occasions, but he was receiving a sum of money and that disqualified him. The Leader of the House—he did not get my support; I think that I was the only one who refused—got the House to agree to retrospective legislation—[HON. MEMBERS: "Terrible."]—for a Liberal!

Mr. Riddick: Which way did the hon. Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer) vote?

Mr. Skinner: I do not know what he was doing at the time. He may have voted in favour, because he finished up as a Minister. But I am not sure which way he voted, because he was not a Minister at the time; that came later.

My hon. Friend made sure that the wheels of industry turned—[HON. MEMBERS: "What about the IMF?"] It had nothing to do with the IMF.

I was trying to illustrate the fact that the amount of money involved in the earlier case was small and that a very fine line was drawn in the case involving the former Chancellor of the Exchequer. That case should be examined, as, indeed, should any case involving a Minister or anybody else who gets money from the Government and thereby has an office of profit under the Crown. That is the real reason why I am taking part in the debate.

The case that I mentioned also shows that Labour did not go in for the policy of looking after Labour people. They were not very good at doing that. That is sad when we think about it. Now we have experienced 14 years of Tory Government and they have put hard-line Tories in everywhere—health spivs and all the rest. But when Labour were in power they used to say, "We shall have one for their side and one for the other." What a carry-on. If I had been in power that would not have happened. We would have had a few more socialists on some of those bodies.

Mr. Jacques Arnold (Gravesham): Will the hon. Gentleman tell us whom the Labour Government appointed to be Her Majesty's ambassador in Washington and what relation he was of the Prime Minister of the day?

Mr. Skinner: It is well known that that was Peter Jay —[HON. MEMBERS: "Who was?"]—Jim Callaghan's son-in-law. [Laughter.] I never considered him a socialist.

Mr. Riddick: Jim Callaghan?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. This is all very entertaining, but what has it got to do with the motion? Let us get back to the motion.

Mr. Skinner: I am asked all those questions and I am expected to answer them, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

I was talking about the fine line in the case of the former Chancellor of the Exchequer. There is another fine line to be drawn and that is why I believe the schedule should be examined afresh. We should consider the retrospective nature of what happens when former Ministers of the Crown and Members of the Cabinet become directors of privatised companies; in some cases they have taken the legislation to privatise those companies through the House of Commons. I am talking about water, electricity and so on. Nineteen former Tory Cabinet Ministers got 59 directorships between them, some of which were connected with the industries whose privatisation they had taken through the House of Commons. Those posts should be added to the schedule.

Mr. David Davis: With the leave of the House, I thank hon. Members, such as the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central, (Mr. Fisher), who have congratulated me on my appointment. I especially thank the hon. Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer) for his compliments. I also wish to thank the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner), who I read in the weekend press, has been nominated for a ballroom dancing honour. I hope that he does well.

It is difficult to answer some of the questions that have been asked and still stay within order, but I will do my best. I shall start by referring to a previous debate. When I asked for some previous editions of Hansard, one of my officials wrote that, over the years, the debates have been less than colourful. We have changed that tonight. In 1983, Mr. Charles Morris said:

"a somewhat salutary thought for parliamentarians to note and remember, that, in a job where some might think madness and bankruptcy are distinct possibilities, perhaps occupational hazards, to come here with either involves an infringement of the House of Commons Disqualification Act 1975."—[Official Report, 12 April 1983; Vol. 40, c. 766.]

I think that he was right.

I say to the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central that there is nothing in the amendment to alter the disqualification for bankruptcy. That disqualification comes under section 427 of the Insolvency Act 1986. There is nothing in the motion that changes that, nor am I aware of any intention to change it.

If the amendment introduced disqualification for the bankruptcy of ideas, the Opposition Benches would be rather vacant. In fact, they look rather vacant now.

Mr. Fisher: The record will show that all that the Minister said about the Lloyd's bankruptcy disqualification is that he had no knowledge of it, or that there was no intention. Could he give the House a categorical assurance that his Government will not change either the Insolvency Act or the 1975 Act to give any accommodation that might include Tory Members of Parliament made bankrupt by their dealings with the Lloyd's gambling den?

Mr. Davis: I do not think that people change laws on that basis anyway. The limit that I can give on anything is my knowledge of it, and I have given that.

It was suggested that over the years we have increased the number of quangos. In fact, in 1979 there were 2,167 quangos, whereas now there are 1,412. That puts it on a rather more even basis.

Mr. Cryer: Since the Minister has the figures, presumably in preparation for the debate, will he say how much money was administered by quangos in 1979 compared with today?

Mr. Davis: I do not have those figures. To take up a point that the hon. Gentleman and the hon. Member for Bolsover pursued, the purpose of this Act is to avoid even the appearance of any influence on Members of the House. It was disgraceful to suggest that Baroness Denton said that she appointed on a political basis. The important word in that statement was "knowingly". Appointments are made on merit and Ministers are not told of the applicant's political affiliation. It is not done on a "One for you, one for us" basis, which appears to have operated in the past. That was somewhat of an own goal.

The suggestion that the need for the Act is a characteristic of a Conservative Government misses one point. This is a 1975 Act. I cannot remember which party was in power then, but I do not think it was the Conservative party; it must have been the Labour party. That rather puts paid to that point, too. The whole point is to prevent there being even the appearance of what Opposition Members have asserted. I commend the motion to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved,

That Schedule 1 to the House of Commons Disqualification Act 1975 be amended as follows:—

PART II OF SCHEDULE 1

Additional entries

1. The following entries shall be inserted at the appropriate places:—

Thorpe Marsh Power Station

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Lightbown.]

10 pm

Mr. Kevin Hughes (Doncaster, North): I am grateful for the opportunity to bring the matter of the closure of Thorpe Marsh power station before the House. The closure was announced on 8 June, and is a disaster for my constituency and for many of my constituents who work at the plant.

The blame for the closure must be laid fairly and squarely at the door of the Government. I hope that the Government will get their act together and get an energy policy before it is too late for the many hundreds of people in my constituency who rely on the power industry for their jobs, features and livelihoods.

The decision to close Thorpe Marsh proves the folly of the Government's energy policy. It will lead directly to more than 200 job losses in my constituency and in the Doncaster area, and ultimately to many more job losses. The 1,000 MW plant is just another casualty of a policy which, through a mixture of incompetence and malice, has rigged the market against coal. As a result, the workers of Thorpe March now have to suffer.

The coal-fired plant has proved itself time and again. In May 1993, National Power News boasted proudly that Thorpe Marsh had set thermal efficiency records for the past two years running. The reason for the success of the plant lies largely with the excellent industrial relations and team approach. Management and unions have worked side by side and given their absolute best to the plant and to National Power.

For the workers, the closure came out of the blue. In the past three years, National Power has invested £40 million in new equipment at the plant, and the future of Thorpe Marsh seemed secure. Yet we are now told that there is no option but closure. The workers at Thorpe Marsh have done all they can to keep the plant successful; they even accepted 120 redundancies in March. Now the remaining 232 jobs are also to go. That is a profound disappointment to all those involved, and a shock to the local community.

Thorpe Marsh workers will feel the most immediate effects of the loss of the plant, but many other groups of workers in Doncaster will also be affected. Bentley and Hatfield pits both lie in my constituency. Both are currently undergoing so-called market testing, and both rely on Thorpe Marsh to buy one third of the coal that they produce. Last year, Bentley supplied 270,000 tonnes to Thorpe Marsh, and Hatfield supplied 400,000 tonnes. On Friday 11 June, the last deliveries of coal to Thorpe Marsh from those two pits were made. The plant will rely on stockpiles between now and the closure date next March. That has massive implications for both Bentley and Hatfield. With one third of their market gone, their chances of surviving beyond market testing have been seriously undermined.

Where will the two pits find new markets of that size now? The closure is a huge blow to all the men at the two pits, who had at least been offered some chance of a future but who have suffered a serious setback with the announcement of the closure of Thorpe Marsh. With an unemployment rate of 13·6 per cent., Doncaster is way above the national average, and further rises caused by the closure of Thorpe Marsh will make matters even more difficult.

However, should the closure of Thorpe Marsh also force local pits to close, the long-term unemployment effects will decimate many towns and villages in the area. White collar jobs, along with mining jobs, will go. Local businesses, especially small businesses, and those involved in mining supplies will be badly hit.

It has been estimated that the possible effects of the closures could add as much as 6 per cent. to the present unemployment total. The implications go far beyond the tragedy of Thorpe Marsh. That is why I call on the Government to help. It is a Government-created problem, and the Government must solve it. I do not want to see any more job losses and economic difficulties in Doncaster. I hope that the Government are as concerned as I am about the economic impact of their energy policies on areas such as Doncaster, and that they are finally willing to redress the imbalance in our energy markets.

The Government's energy policy, or lack of one, is at the heart of the debate. Privatisation of the electricity industry sounded the death knell of the coal industry and, with it, coal-fired electricity generation. The Government have stood idly by while regional electricity companies have invested in gas-fired plant when ample capacity already existed in the generating industry. Regional electricity companies want their own generating stations so that they can produce and sell their electricity, at whatever price they want, to themselves. Either the Government do not understand what that will mean for consumers and the size of their electricity bills, or they do not care.

The electricity consumer is playing for the dash for gas and for the building of the expensive new plant that is needed before one watt of electricity is produced. The costs of that plant outweigh any cost benefits of an alternative fuel, which will actually add to rather than reduce consumers' bills. It is only when there is a shortage of capacity that building such an amount of plant can be justified on cost grounds, yet the Government have let the dash for gas continue.

The Government have persisted in the fiction that burning gas is an efficient way of producing electricity, and an efficient use of the nation's energy resources. However, gas burned in power stations gives only 52 per cent. efficiency, and that is at maximum, whereas gas burned in industrial and domestic use is more than 90 per cent. efficient.

That is a dire waste of our scarce energy resources, especially in the light of the alternative of coal fuel, which has fewer alternative uses in the industry and in homes and which has served Britain so well in the past as an efficient generator of electricity. Instead of encouraging the most efficient use of an increasingly scarce energy resource, the Government have allowed coal-fired stations to be closed and have let regional electricity companies continue their profiteering. They have stood by and allowed consumers to be exploited once again.

The consumer is being exploited even more blatantly by the fossil fuel levy, which is subsidising a nuclear industry that has crippling plant, safety and decommissioning costs. With 10 per cent. of all fuel bills going to support the nuclear industry, the consumer is being forced to give a massive subsidy to the industry, and almost 20 per cent. of Britain's fuel is being heavily subsidised. Nuclear Electric received subsidy of more than £1 billion last year, and that subsidy came straight from the pockets of consumers, rich and poor alike. That industry cannot compete with other sources of fuel because of high costs, yet its markets are guaranteed.

Regional electricity companies are forced to buy the output of the nuclear industry, and the consumer is forced to pay the costs of the consequent inefficiency. The amount of electricity that is being sold in that way is on the increase —from 47 to 57 TWh per annum over the past three years. Nuclear power output continues to rise and consumers, are paying more for their electricity to subsidise that expensive white elephant.

The folly of the policy is demonstrated by the case of Trawsfynydd power station. That nuclear power station has not produced enough electricity in the past two years to light a 60 watt bulb, yet it remains open. It has been staffed by 560 people for all that time, costing taxpayers and consumers a small fortune. That should be compared to the model of the Thorpe Marsh power station. It is a comparatively efficient generator, has low costs and has produced good results. For their efforts, the workers and management are now rewarded with redundancies and closure.

The experience with the interconnector has proved that the Government's energy policy is a farce. Only this Government would be barmy enough to allow electricity to be imported when we have surplus capacity. The Government allowed the interconnector to become a one-way traffic, making Electricité de France more like simply another power station, rather than an emergency supply.

The Government's perversion of the energy market has created such waste and such costs for consumers. The nature of the market desperately needs to be tackled, and the interests of consumers and workers protected. It is that wasteful policy that has caused the closure of Thorpe Marsh. It is simply not true to say that coal has no market or that coal-generated electricity is not efficient. Coal-fired power stations are simply not being allowed to compete with gas and nuclear fuels. We have already lost 6,000 MW of coal-fired generating capacity and we look set to lose another 3,000, only to see it replaced by gas powered plant.

A new gas-fired station is being built only 20 miles down the road from Thorpe Marsh at Keadby near Scunthorpe and will have a 750 MW generating capacity. Where is the justification for closing one efficient plant and replacing it with a new plant, incurring all the costs of building and commissioning? How can such a wasteful duplication be based on sound economic arguments? The point is that there is no justification.

The Government's policy lacks any overview or coherence. It has pitted one energy source against another, encouraged duplication and waste, endorsed high costs and high prices for the consumer and penalised efficient coal-fired generation. In so doing, the Government are jeopardising many thousands of jobs in power generation, coal mining and related industries in the Doncaster area.

Have the Government not noticed the destructive effects of their energy policy? The Minister must admit that, through incompetence or design, his Government have set the energy market against the coal industry and all those who work in it. The closure of Thorpe Marsh will have disastrous consequences for the economy in my constituency and in many other localities.

Thorpe Marsh power station is an effective plant, with a dedicated staff who have found a recipe for success in teamwork and hard work. They represent more than simply a branch of a company—they are an important part of the local community, and have given a great deal back to Doncaster in the past few years. Thorpe Marsh should be given a chance. It should be given back the chances that the Government took away when they wrecked Britain's energy market and condemned the coal industry.

Thorpe Marsh must be saved. The only thing that will save it is intervention from the Minister. Over the past 14 years, the Government have stacked the cards against the coal industry and we are all paying the price for that incompetence. It is time for the Government to tackle the problems that they have created. I call on them to intervene to correct the appalling imbalance that they have created in the energy market, and save Thorpe Marsh power station from closure.

Sir Harold Walker (Doncaster, Central): I want to support my hon. Friend the Member for Doncaster, North (Mr. Hughes) who has outlined a tragic case. I attended the official opening of Thorpe Marsh power station, little thinking that I would have the sad experience of bemoaning the consequences of its closure in the House. The Minister will recall that I recently led a deputation with my hon. Friend about the appalling consequences for the region of the pit closure programme and the serious economic difficulties that we faced. I little thought that we would have to face an additional hammer blow.

It will not affect merely the power station's employees, many of whom are my constituents, but will have a knock-on effect, further exacerbating the problems caused by the closures of pits and railways. Those matters are interconnected, as my constituency and that of my hon. Friend depend on the three industries, which together face a crisis.

As my hon. Friend said, we are not facing a natural catastrophe, such as the floods in north Wales or fire. The disaster was created by Government policies. The Government must provide the answers for the thousands of people in my constituency and that of my hon. Friend who are suffering as a consequence of those policies. They face misery and hardship and, unless the Government intervene, there is little likelihood of those people obtaining new employment and a new future.

I want the Government today to say not only what they will do about the consequences of the closure of Thorpe Marsh power station, but what they will do to help my constituency and that of my hon. Friend which will be, to put it mildly, blighted by the Government's policies.

The Minister for Energy (Mr. Tim Eggar): I am delighted to see you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, in the Chair yet again on a coal-related matter.

I understand the concern felt about this subject. I well remember the deputation led by the right hon. Member for Doncaster, Central (Sir H. Walker), accompanied by the hon. Member for Doncaster, North (Mr. Hughes). We discussed in detail the widespread concern then felt in Doncaster about the impending closure of the two pits. I felt that that was a useful meeting, at which we had a frank exchange of views. I hope that those present felt that I was able to provide reassurances about our plans for development area status for the region and the issue of an enterprise zone in south Yorkshire.

I know that the hon. Member for Doncaster, North made a case for locating the enterprise zone in somewhere other than the Dearne valley. He did not mention it in his speech tonight, but I know that he feels that the announcement about Thorpe Marsh—and its possible implications for other pits in the region—bears on the issues that he and others were making at the previous meeting. I assure him that we shall bear in mind those representations.

I also recognise that it is a particularly sad moment for the employees at Thorpe Marsh. I do not think that there is any doubt that the station has performed well, and the employees have done what they can to improve the plant's efficiency. The closure announcement is linked to two factors: the capacity of the market to absorb the station's production and the fact that the station is old.

The right hon. Member for Doncaster, Central said that he was at its opening; he did not refer—perhaps understandably—to the fact that that was more than 30 years ago. It is commonly recognised that the station is one of the older stations still in operation. Drax, which is perhaps the best example of a modern station, has a generating capacity no less than four times the size of Thorpe Marsh's.

When Thorpe Marsh was opened, it represented a new type of technology and a new level of thermal efficiency, but everyone recognises that it has been overtaken by developments since then. It is also widely recognised that, without extensive retrofitting, coal stations have a finite life.

I do not wish to raise false hopes or lay myself open to the charge of misrepresentation, but I should point out that the closure announcement by National Power is not necessarily the end of the story for Thorpe Marsh. The Director General of Electricity Supply has made it clear that he wants greater competition in electricity generation, and he has drawn particular attention to the possibilities for competition in coal-fired generation. Professor Littlechild has also made it clear that the generators could and should do more to make redundant generating plant available for sale to third parties.

One advantage of the early announcement of this closure is that it will at the very least provide enough time for real negotiations with potential purchasers. I do not want to raise hopes, however, because I genuinely do not know whether potential purchasers will emerge. I do know that there are companies looking for investment opportunities in coal-fired plant in this country, and that the director general is keen that such opportunities should genuinely exist. I also know that both National Power and PowerGen are aware of that. I ask the hon. Gentleman to bear this in mind, although I do not want to mislead him or his constituents about the possibility of further life for Thorpe Marsh.

Mr. Kevin Hughes: Can the Minister confirm a story carried on a local television news programme in Yorkshire this evening to the effect that two private generators are interested in purchasing the Thorpe Marsh power station? Does he have any knowledge of that; if so, will he elaborate?

Mr. Eggar: I am afraid that I do not know what was on the programme—I did not see it. I am not aware of any such interest in Thorpe Marsh. I am aware that a small number of companies have expressed interest, in principle, in entering into serious negotiations about the possibility of purchasing older, coal-fired plant. I understand that some companies wish to examine the possibility of retrofitting such plant, which I have been told can be done cost-effectively, and which has been done in the United States to considerable effect. Operating costs have been reduced, and the operating efficiency of older plant has been increased.

I do not think it fair to the employees of Thorpe Marsh or to the people of Doncaster to raise hopes which I am not sure can be fulfilled, but it is right to point out that such an option exists.

The hon. Gentleman referred to the role of nuclear power and of the new gas-fired stations. There was reference to the inefficiency of producing electricity from gas. The new gas-fired generating plant has a thermal efficiency of above 50 per cent., and that figure is rising as each new piece of plant comes on stream. Currently the most efficient coal-fired plant has an efficiency level of below 40 per cent., so there is a considerable gap. Gas has become competitive as a result of technological breakthrough in terms of the development of the combined cycle.

I—like many other hon. Members on both sides of the House, I suspect—believe that there may very well be a similar technological breakthrough in the development of coal-fired technology, which will improve thermal efficiency, as well as the environmental operating factors. Of course, in considering the environmental aspects of coal-fired plant, one must always bear in mind the fact that, by definition, it will be virtually impossible to remove all carbon emissions. As far ahead as, with existing technology, one can reasonably predict, this will always be an environmental disadvantage for coal as against other generating methods, including gas and nuclear generation.

We have been told that nuclear is clean. There is no doubt that, in terms of emissions, it is considerably cleaner than both coal and gas. However, it would be inappropriate at this time to rejig the debate that we had at the time leading up to the coal review and the matters that were investigated by the Select Committee. It is fair to point out, however, that the Select Committee, as well as the Government, recognised that there was a role for nuclear power and that the avoidable costs were low. The Select Committee did not argue for an end to the building of gas-fired plant.

The hon. Gentleman made some remarks about Trawsfynydd. That nuclear station is not operating, as it has been necessary to develop a safety case for the inspectorate. The result of the inspection is awaited. I appreciate the hon. Gentleman's concern about Bentley and Hatfield. I realise why he and his constituents are worried. I do not know exactly where the coal flows will go. That is a matter for British Coal and for the generators. However, I strongly believe that there is a market for deep-mined British coal. That is why the Government have made a subsidy available and why we are committed to the market testing period to which the hon. Gentleman referred.

I understand why the hon. Gentleman has raised this matter on the Adjournment. I understand the immediate response to the announcement about the closure of Thorpe Marsh. Everybody realises that we have a stock of older coal-fired plant, which is not competitive and is bound to face replacement. It is not competitive with nuclear or gas plant or, critically, with the most modern coal-fired plant.

It would not be appropriate for the Government to intervene on an issue of this kind. It is clear that National Power, the owners, believe that there is no market for the product of the plant and that keeping it open would undermine the viability of other generating plants, which they regard as more productive and more competitive. It is possible that other entities will be interested in the plant, and I know that the director general will want to pursue that possibility.

I thank the hon. Gentleman for raising this very important issue. I have taken careful note of all the points that he has made.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at twenty-nine minutes past Ten o'clock.

Public Expenditure Review

1. Mr. Bayley: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what areas of welfare spending he has excluded from his review of public expenditure.

3. Ms Lynne: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what progress has been made in his review of public expenditure of major spending Departments.

The Chief Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Michael Portillo): The Government are conducting a long-term review of public expenditure starting with the Department of Social Security, Department of Health, Department for Education and the Home Office.The Government have a duty to examine all areas of public spending to ensure that they give value for money. We would be failing in our duty if any area were to be exempt from scrutiny. The reviews will produce interim results that will be helpful in this year's public expenditure survey.

Mr. Bayley: Millions of people are concerned about the review and the Government should set out its terms of reference and scope. Given the Chief Secretary's meeting with the Prime Minister to rewrite invalidity benefit, will he confirm that the Government intend to exclude "those who suffer from progressive diseases—for example, multiple sclerosis—and heart patients who are unable to walk on the flat for 200 yards"?

Before I am accused of scaremongering, I may say that that is a direct quote from the Department of Social Security document prepared for that meeting. Will the Chief Secretary explain what other cuts he intends to make to meet the £5,000 million target set for the DSS that is mentioned in that same document?

Mr. Portillo: The hon. Gentleman knows that the Government are on all fours with the Opposition. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition said:

"I set up the Social Justice Commission to conduct a very wide-ranging view of the . . . complex system of tax, benefits and rights . . . We have not looked at any of this, almost since Beveridge."

That is what the Government are doing. We are examining the way in which we provide value for money through the system. As to invalidity benefit, the hon. Gentleman knows that that must be looked at. There has been a massive increase in the number of claimants for invalidity benefit at a time when the health of the nation has been improving. That benefit now costs £6·2 billion a year. No decisions have been taken—in fact, no firm proposals have yet been put to Ministers. It is of course of great importance to us to ensure that the vulnerable are protected.

Ms Lynne: Now that the Chancellor has ruled out prescription charges for pensioners and charging for hospital beds, will he improve his left-wing credentials further by ruling out additional cuts in invalidity benefit and prescription charges in respect of children who are just above income support level? Or does the Chief Secretary feel that the Chancellor will be a little too worried about his own political advancement if the right wing of the Conservative party disapproved?

Mr. Portillo: The hon. Lady does not help the debate by trivialising it. We obviously have to address the question of social security spending rising faster than our national income, which presents us with a problem. We must examine the benefits that are growing fastest and ask ourselves why benefits are rising 3 per cent. a year in real terms, which is much faster than national income. We must take careful decisions. There will be no announcements before November, and it will be later than that, in respect of long-term questions, before we can reach decisions, because these serious matters need careful consideration.

Mr. John Townend: When my right hon. and learned Friend reviews public expenditure, will he bear in mind that every firm in the country that has survived during the recession—small, medium or large—has had to cut its overheads and slim down its staff? Meanwhile, the public sector and local government are still bloated. In the last year, we have increased the strength of the civil service by 2·5 per cent.—nearly 14,000 people. When he looks for savings, will my right hon. Friend set all Departments a target of a 5 per cent. reduction in manpower to cut the Government's overheads?

Mr. Portillo: My hon. Friend has made an important point. In examining Government spending, all we are really doing is ensuring that the public sector does what the private sector has had to do throughout the recession—make sure that it lives within its means. The same applies to every family in the country. It would be intolerable if people made sacrifices, while the Government continued to live beyond their means on the back of borrowing and taxation which are available to them but not to families and businesses.

We need to consider civil service numbers and running costs very carefully. The civil service had quite a tight settlement last year, and I imagine that next year's figures may show the lowest number since the war. I think that that is quite appropriate.

Mr. Jessel: We all greatly admire the excellent work of the national health service, but will my right hon. Friend invite the Secretary of State for Health to consider whether she should continue to provide surgical operations on the NHS for the removal of tattoos? If a person has had printed on his skin signs, symbols, messages and coloured pictures——

Madam Speaker: Order. I have the impression that the hon. Gentleman's question might be better put to the Secretary of State for Health herself. The Chief Secretary has probably got the point by now.

Mr. Portillo: I thought my hon. Friend's question very valuable. It is now etched indelibly on my mind.

Mr. Gordon Brown: Now that the Cabinet has met to discuss public spending, why does not the Chief Secretary use this opportunity to rule out cuts in invalidity benefit for those suffering from multiple sclerosis, and the heart patients who cannot walk 200 yards? Why does he not tell us that he will drop his proposal to privatise some national insurance benefits, and that anything other than full compensation for pensioners and others on low income who have been hit by VAT rises will not be enough? Why must the users of public services pay the price of the Government's economic mismanagement?

Mr. Portillo: I wonder why the hon. Gentleman does not use his own opportunity to desist from scaremongering. Is he not aware of the real anxiety and fear that he causes? Is he not aware of the disrepute in which he is now held because of the disgraceful tactics that he has used, day after day? Is he not aware that the British people are now pretty well fed up with him, and that he should stop?

Mr. Congdon: Does my right hon. Friend agree that, although it is important to review all aspects of public expenditure, many people are rightly concerned about the growth in the expenditure of the Department of Social Security? They expect the Government to review all the various benefits properly, and to ensure that they are targeted. At the same time, members of the public wish us to ensure that NHS expenditure is protected,

Mr. Portillo: My hon. Friend's comments are very valuable. They come as a breath of fresh air after the question from the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown): I am very grateful.

Investment and Unemployment

2. Mrs. Anne Campbell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the relationship between the Budget measures for investment and unemployment levels.

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Stephen Dorrell): The Budget measures for business have been warmly welcomed by the business community. They provide an excellent environment for investment and job creation.

Mrs. Campbell: Given that the CBI's industrial trends survey shows that manufacturing firms are still cutting investment, will the Minister tell us what specific steps he will take to promote investment—especially in areas affected by coal pit closures, defence cuts and local authority capping?

Mr. Dorrell: In a week in which the Central Statistical Office has announced that manufacturing output is now rising at an annual rate of 5 per cent.—the House may be interested to learn that it fell by exactly the same amount when Labour was in power between 1974 and 1979—I do not feel disposed to take any lectures from Labour about how to create an environment in which businesses expand and jobs can be created.

The hon. Lady asked what measures had been introduced to promote business investment. Let me list the measures introduced in the Budget and the autumn statement, which have been welcomed by the business community. In those statements, the previous Chancellor increased the amount of export credit available, provided a £2 billion cash flow benefit to British industry through the advance corporation tax changes, abolished car tax, introduced capital allowances and put extra money into the housing market through changes in the housing associations and in the capital receipts regulations for local authorities.

Mr. John Greenway: My hon. Friend the Financial Secretary omitted from that list the £150 million leasing deal for new railway rolling stock, which was announced in the autumn statement and which is much needed to help preserve jobs in the train-making factory in York. Does he agree that the sooner we establish the leasing market for new trains, the sooner more of those who have been made redundant in York and other places can be put back to work? Would it not help that process if the Labour party dropped its objections to the Railways Bill?

Mr. Dorrell: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. The measure to which he refers reflects not only the Government's commitment to investment in railway rolling stock, which my hon. Friend is right to welcome, but, more importantly, the Government's commitment to improving the service available on British railways through the changes to be introduced in the Railways Bill.

Mr. Robert Hughes: Does not the Financial Secretary understand that the minuscule changes to the petroleum revenue tax announced in the Budget will do nothing to safeguard jobs in the oil industry? Is he aware that only yesterday the Association of Offshore Diving Contractors made it clear that there are likely to be about 21,000 job loses? How can he say that he is trying to deal with investment and improve business when he carries out that sort of action which produces high unemployment?

Mr. Dorrell: The hon. Gentleman's dismissive attitude to the changes that we annnounced yesterday is not reflected by Brindex, which made proposals very similar to those that we announced. As the House knows, the fundamental reason why we are changing the PRT system is that we do not believe that among the many calls on public resources which my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary has to balance we should number subsidising the international oil industry.

Mrs. Peacock: Is my hon. Friend aware that many Yorkshire companies have been investing in new jobs, new factories and new manufacturing processes over the past nine years and that many have continued throughout the recession to invest their own money, not borrowed money? Perhaps he might persuade his colleague, the President of the Board of Trade, to come and look at some of that investment.

Mr. Dorrell I am sure that my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade is capable of being responsible for his own travel arrangements. If he were to travel to Yorkshire, he would find, as my hon. Friend rightly points out, that British industry is benefiting from the more stable environment that has been created over the past two years as a result of lower inflation, lower interest rates, a more competitive exchange rate and the opportunity for British industry to expand, which the indicators show is now being taken.

Balance of Payments

4. Mr. Burden: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the balance of payments.

The Paymaster General (Sir John Cope): The visible deficit was much the same in the first quarter of this year as in the fourth quarter of last year. Some deterioration after the movement of the exchange rate is to be expected, but our trade prospects are now very good.

Mr. Burden: Is the Minister aware that the real story is that imports are growing at twice the rate of exports? Would he care to reflect on the report published this week by the Bank for International Settlements which concludes that the Government's failure to invest in manufacturing industry means that there is not enough manufacturing capacity to support even our domestic markets when demand is low. A total of 44 per cent. of manufacturing jobs in the west midlands have been lost since the Government took office. Does not that show how short-sighted the Government have been to ignore the importance of manufacturing industry?

Sir John Cope: We have not ignored the importance of manufacturing industry or manufacturing companies. After all, if the hon. Gentleman had looked at the Financial Times' survey of the top 500 companies in Europe, he would have seen that 10 United Kingdom companies were in the top 20 for profitability. That reflects their investment, as does the fact that our export volumes are at record level.

Sir Peter Tapsell: As my right hon. and learned Friend is the 13th Chancellor in whose Question Time I have ventured to pose a question, may I confidently express the hope that he will have a happier tenure of office than his 12 predecessors? Before his officials and special advisers have time to bemuse him with contradictory economic theories and dogma, may I respectfully suggest that he should take a firm grasp of the basic proposition that if we had a large balance of payments surplus it would not matter if we had a large public sector borrowing requirement? In other words, the balance of payments is the critical statistic. So he was absolutely right in his Guildhall speech to stress the importance of helping British industry.

Sir John Cope: I am sure that my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer will be very grateful for my hon. Friend's good wishes, especially as they come from such a wealth of experience, and for the advice that he has given.

Mr. Darling: On the question of growth in our manufacturing base, can we be told when the Chancellor will set out the detailed policy changes which will demonstrate a change in the substance rather than merely the style of his prececessor? Does he not accept that giving more television interviews than his predecessor, or the fact that he has spent most of his life in the midlands, do not in themselves add up to a new industrial policy?

Sir John Cope: We shall set out the changes at the usual time, and particularly in the Budget.

Mr. Evennett: Can my right hon. Friend confirm that our exports to non-EC countries have grown in the past year? Should we not all be congratulating British business and business men for their export achievements?

Sir John Cope: Yes, indeed. I echo my hon. Friend's congratulations. In value terms, exports, excluding oil and erratics, to the whole world were 12½ per cent. higher in the first quarter of this year.

Independent Advisers

5. Mr. Boyce: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he next plans to meet the panel of independent economic advisers to discuss the current state of the economy.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Kenneth Clarke): The panel of independent forecasters will be issuing its second report in early July. I look forward to receiving it.

Mr. Boyce: What advice does the Chancellor think that he will receive which will boost the confidence of the country, given that in the current report the state—[HON. MEMBERS: "Reading."] Yes, that is what I went to school for. The current account deficit was £12 billion when the panel issued its last report. The Government's forecast for the coming year is that the current account deficit will be £15½ billion: what encouraging advice does he think the panel will give him?

Mr. Clarke: I imagine that when I receive the advice of the panel I shall find that it contains the variety of advice to which my hon. Friend the Member for East Lindsey (Sir P. Tapsell) rightly referred. I accept that we have a balance of payments problem, which is why I am glad that our export performance is improving and that we are doing so well especially in non-EC markets where demand is not depressed as it is in the Community. Certainly, the Government must do everything possible—in my Department and that of my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade—to support our manufacturers in their efforts to export. Otherwise, I hope that the forecast will take some encouragement from the growth in GDP and manufacturing output and today's fall in the unemployment figures for the fourth successive month.

Mr. Horam: Is my right hon. and learned Friend aware that there was indeed a warm welcome for what he said in his Guildhall speech about growth and recovery and especially about listening to the views of business men? Is he also aware that business men have for some time been calling for a continuation of the process of lowering interest rates? In as far as my right hon. and learned Friend is able to achieve that and therefore able to enhance and maximise growth, he will ease his own problems with the fiscal balance.

Mr. Clarke: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. He sent me a copy of his own interesting suggestions for a policy for industry some months ago, and I have been carrying it around with me ever since. I shall refer to it once more.

One of the things that helps to show the modest signs of recovery is the nine point fall in interest rates which we have achieved recently. It has greatly helped British industry. Clearly, further changes in interest rates can be made only when we have the right circumstances. I set out at the Guildhall the type of circumstances and the type of advice that I would take before deciding on any movement of interest rates.

Mr. Gordon Brown: As the Chancellor has agreed today that the trade deficit is a problem, will he outline the detailed changes in industrial policy that he will introduce? As he said at the Mansion House that achieving higher growth is his objective, what investment in employment measures will he seek to introduce? As the Prime Minister has changed the Chancellor, will the Chancellor now announce the detailed changes in policy so that the country can see action instead of just words?

Mr. Clarke: It is not my intention to pre-empt the work of my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade or my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Employment. All three of us will work in the same direction. My next major contribution will, no doubt, be November's Budget, but I assure the hon. Gentleman that he is facing a business-friendly Government who will take specific measures to sustain British industry and commerce in the recovery that it is beginning to make.

Mr. Willetts: Is not it likely that the panel of experts will be able to show in its next report that Britain is heading for an economic growth rate higher than its inflation rate? Would not that be a remarkable achievement?

Mr. Clarke: It would be a quite remarkable achievement. My hon. Friend will agree that it is important to ensure, first, that that is achieved, in so far as it is within the Government's power to do so, and, secondly, that this time we sustain it, because in the past Britain has done quite well for several periods but has always succumbed to various British diseases that held us up once more.

Mr. Beith: Does the right hon. and learned Gentleman recall being advised that interest rate changes should never be made to offset some unfavourable political event? Does he realise that that advice came from the eighth independent adviser, the right hon. Member for Kingston upon Thames (Mr. Lamont)? Was the right hon. Member for Kingston upon Thames justified by anything in his term of office in giving that advice, and what is the Chancellor doing to change a system under which that could have happened?

Mr. Clarke: I have set out quite clearly the grounds on which decisions on monetary policy will be taken. I propose to take decisions in the light of the various criteria that I have set out. It is quite right that they should be taken on the best objective advice and for good economic reasons. We will persevere with that, so I do not think that the right hon. Gentleman will have cause for complaint on that ground in the coming months.

Mrs. Gorman: Will my right hon. and learned Friend take note of the very good advice of his adviser, Professor Patrick Minford, who said on the radio today that, as the Government's policy had brought inflation down to almost zero, it is time for us to consider lowering interest rates so that we can get the jobs going again, which would follow from the Government's admirable effort in killing off inflation?

Mr. Clarke: I know Professor Minford from times gone by. I have met him from time to time and have always listened to his advice with care. I know several members of the panel of forecasters, which my predecessor assembled, and they hold a variety of views. I am waiting to receive all their forecasts. I suspect that there will be a fairly wide range of advice, and I shall take careful regard of all of it.

Unemployed People (Cost)

7. Mr. O'Hara: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will prepare an estimate of the average cost to the Treasury of one unemployed person in terms of (a) benefits paid and (b) tax revenue lost.

Mr. Dorrell: The net cost to the Exchequer of an individual unemployed person depends on a wide range of variables.

Mr. O'Hara: I am as pleasantly surprised as, no doubt, the Minister about today's slight decrease in the unemployment statistics—which prudent observers, I am sure, will distinguish from a reduction in those who are unemployed and seeking work—but does the hon. Gentleman agree that the cost of each unemployed person, which is authoritatively assessed at approximately £9,000 per year, is the single biggest cause of the ballooning public sector borrowing requirement? Does he agree that the best way to tackle the problem is not to punish unemployed people by reducing benefits but to take positive measures to put them back to work?

Mr. Dorrell: The best way of helping unemployed people is not to speculate on things that are unpredictable and unmeasurable but to create an economy that creates jobs and puts working people back to work. To achieve that, the best thing that the Government can do is to follow the precedent of their record of the 1980s, when manufacturing investment increased by 67 per cent., when the number of jobs created within the economy was 3 million and when manufacturing output rose by 30 per cent. That is the record of this Government between 1982 and 1990, which we wish to recreate.

Mr. Dunn: Does my hon. Friend agree that the one sure-fire way of adding to the cost of unemployment is to sign the social chapter of the Maastricht treaty?

Mr. Dorrell: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. One of the interesting contrasts to be drawn is that between the record of this country in the late 1980s and that of France during the same period. Our growth rates were roughly the same, but the difference was that in this country we converted that growth into jobs and in France, whose socialist Government espoused the cause of the social chapter, they failed to do so. The House should draw conclusions from that contrast.

Mr. John Evans: Will the Minister confirm that the Conservative Government, whose members constantly go on about sound money, are heading for a deficit of £1 billion a week—£50 billion a year—largely created by the incompetence of the previous three Chancellors?

Mr. Flynn: Hear, hear.

Mr. Evans: My hon. Friend's views are just. Does the Minister accept that the way to cut the appalling deficit is not by slashing welfare payments or by charging the elderly VAT on energy, but by taking a knife to unemployment and getting this country back to work again?

Mr. Dorrell: The split between the two sides of the House is not over the desirability of creating extra jobs and getting unemployed people back to work—that is a shared ambition. The split is over how to achieve it. The hon. Gentleman is right to identify the budget deficit as one of the problems that have to be tackled if we are to deliver the objective that both sides of the House share. I look forward to hearing from him, and even more to hearing from his Front-Bench colleagues, how the Labour party proposes to deliver the reduction in the deficit that we all want.

Mr. Brazier: Will my hon. Friend confirm that the only Governments since the first world war to reduce unemployment have been Conservative Governments? Does he agree that the way to reduce unemployment does not lie through a minimum wage, greater regulation of the labour market or the kind of socialism that has delivered 19 per cent. unemployment in socialist Spain?

Mr. Dorrell: My hon. Friend is right to draw attention to the interesting historical fact that it is Tory Governments who cut unemployment and Labour Governments who increase it—just as, incidentally, it is Tory Governments who cut hospital waiting lists and Labour Governments who increase them.

As I said earlier, the best way to get people back to work is to create a vigorous and competitive economy. One of the best bits of news in that regard is the fact that manufacturing productivity is now rising by 7·8 per cent. a year, which means that unit wage costs in manufacturing are falling, for the first time in living memory. Those costs are falling by 2·8 per cent. a year, and that holds out the prospect of improved competitiveness and, therefore, of improved job creation. One would like to think that the Labour party would welcome that.

Mr. Andrew Smith: Will the Financial Secretary confirm that the former Secretary of State for Employment put the cost to the Government of unemployment at £9,000 a year for each unemployed person? Is not the greatest cost of unemployment the cost to unemployed people and their families, and the waste to society of the wealth that their employment would otherwise generate? Are not those costs most corrosive in the case of the 1 million people who have been out of work for more than a year, who loom behind today's welcome fall in the headline unemployment figures? Will the Financial Secretary now tell us what new measures the Government will introduce to counter unemployment and, in particular, what they intend to do to bring work to the long-term unemployed? Will he also examine the case for rebates on national insurance contributions for employers who take on workers from among the long-term unemployed, to whom we must give help?

Mr. Dorrell: Yet again, we have the spectacle of the Labour party recognising that the budget deficit is a problem, although the only ideas that are announced from the Opposition Dispatch Box are those that would have the effect of increasing that deficit. Of course, it is true that unemployment imposes both a social cost on the individuals concerned and an economic cost on the economy as a whole. We have to address the problem of how to make unemployment fall. We believe that the way to do that is by creating a competitive and vigorous economy. That is what we are about and that is what we are constantly being obstructed in doing by the Opposition.

Mr. Matthew Banks: Will my hon. Friend give me an assurance that, while he is considering the cost of unemployment and other benefits during his public spending review, he will continue to do everything in his power to ensure that we continue to provide the most where the need is greatest?

Mr. Dorrell: My hon. Friend is quite right. That, of course, is precisely the purpose of the review of public expenditure on which my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary is engaged, in order to ensure that, within the public spending total, expenditure reflects today's priorities.

Business Investment

8. Mr. Betts: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the level of business investment in the economy.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Business investment remains at an historically high level, despite the recession. In 1992, the share of business investment in gross domestic product was over 14 per cent., higher than in any year between 1970 and 1987.

Mr. Betts: Has the Chancellor read the report by the Bank for International Settlements, to which my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Northfield (Mr. Burden) referred, which shows a major structural weakness in the economy of this country caused by long-term low manufacturing investment? It shows that any recovery is likely to be short lived, since a balance of payments crisis will stop the recovery because of that low level of investment. Will the Chancellor explain to the House what changes in action and policy he will bring about—not words—to rectify the appalling situation caused by 14 years in which his Government have put manufacturing industry at the bottom of the political agenda?

Mr. Clarke: I regret to say that I do not think that that is historically correct. At the moment, business investment is low because we are just emerging from a recession and are in the early stages of recovery, but there was a substantial investment boom in the latter years of the 1980s. Business investment in this country was up more than 45 per cent. in the three years to 1989, which was the fastest three-year growth since the war. We have a much better record of manufacturing and business investment in this country than there has been historically. I will, of course, consider measures that might sustain that good record once the recovery gets under way.

Mr. Ian Taylor: Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that one form of assistance that he could give to business investment is not to crowd out the borrowing market by the high level of Government borrowing and that, therefore, one of his key responsibilities must be to get down long-term Government borrowing, which would allow long-term interest rates also to fall?

Mr. Clarke: I wholly agree with my hon. Friend, which is why the Cabinet, in its decision this morning, places such a high priority on getting down as quickly as we can the level of Government borrowing. That message is simply not taken by the Opposition, who merely come forward with opposition to any revenue raising and proposals for more spending. Indeed, in the debate last Wednesday, the Leader of the Opposition would have added £12,000 million to the public sector borrowing requirement by that one speech alone. The interests of industry and manufacturing investment in this country lie in the direction suggested by my hon. Friend.

Mr. Hoon: Before Britain joined the exchange rate mechanism, it was well known that the Chancellor of the Exchequer encouraged membership on the basis that it would assist business investment. Will he argue the same case again?

Mr. Clarke: Our membership of the exchange rate mechanism certainly helped us to achieve the low level of inflation which is one of the best bases for making industry competitive as we move into the recovery. The five-point reductions in interest rates before we left the ERM were as valuable as the four additional point reductions that we have made since we left the ERM. All were based on this Government's success in getting down inflation. We now have to demonstrate the same success in getting down the public sector borrowing requirement.

Housing

9. Mrs. Angela Knight: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what measures he has taken to assist the housing market over the last year.

Sir John Cope: We have introduced a number of measures to assist the housing market. The autumn statement announced additional housing measures of £750 million, plus time-limited measures to allow local authorities to spend nearly all their new capital receipts. The Budget doubled the stamp duty threshold to £60,000, and, following the significant easing of monetary policy since last autumn, mortgage rates are now down to their lowest levels for 25 years.

Mrs. Knight: Does my right hon. Friend agree that it is interest rates that have the major influence on the housing market? Is it not correct that the low mortgage rates are giving very great encouragement to first-time buyers, the housing market as a whole and the construction industry, as new private housing starts have now increased by 20 per cent?

Sir John Cope: I agree with all that. Private housing starts are up strongly, as are the completions and the particulars delivered. All that is the consequence of the measures that I have outlined, especially mortgage interest rates.

Mr. Raynsford: Will the Minister recognise that, following the short-term increase in spending as a result of the relaxation of restrictions on capital receipts and the housing market package, the rented housing market is likely, once again, to decline this year? Does he now recognise that there is no justification for preventing local authorities from spending capital receipts in the long term? Will he extend the relaxation of the restrictions next year as well as this year?

Sir John Cope: We will not announce anything of that sort at the moment. I notice that new public housing has risen in the first quarter of this year to the highest level for more than eight years. That will greatly help that part of the rented sector.

Mr. Paice: Will my right hon. Friend resist the calls to release those capital receipts in one go? Is it not the case that, however attractive it may be, that would add £6 billion to the bottom line of our public sector borrowing requirement? Labour Members appear to care about that figure.

Sir John Cope: That is indeed the case, and that is why we are cautious about it.

Income Tax and National Insurance

11. Mr. Milburn: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the average total annual payment in income tax and national insurance per employed person in 1992-93.

Mr. Dorrell: A married man on average earnings of £17,992 would pay £3,107 in income tax and £1,423 in employee's national insurance contributions.

Mr. Milburn: Does the Minister recognise that the March Budget has meant a huge tax hike which will bear down hardest on those who are least able to afford to pay? Will he take this opportunity to tell the House and the public what further tax rises he has in store? Will he now admit that the whole country is being asked to foot the bill for the £10 billion-worth of tax handouts that have been given to the very rich since 1988? Why should the poor, pensioners and NHS patients be asked to pay the price for the Government's extravagance?

Mr. Dorrell: The hon. Gentleman refers to the record of the 1980s. One might have thought that he would take the opportunity to welcome the increase in the real take-home pay that was available to all people as a result of the economic policies of the 1980s. Under the Labour Government, real take-home pay for the man on average earnings rose by £1·20 a week at today's values—between 1979 and 1993, it has risen by £81·50 a week. Real take-home pay is what matters, not the statistical analysis offered by the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Barry Field: Is it not a fact that no post-war Government have done so much to simplify the personal taxation structure of the United Kingdom as this Government? When my hon. Friend puts the final cornerstone in place in the autumn Budget with regard to future expenditure and taxation plans, I invite him to go a stage further and introduce the reform that is so necessary in the European Community—bringing our pay-as-you-earn year into line with the calendar year. Only Ireland and this country continue with the peculiar date of 5 April.

Mr. Dorrell: My hon. Friend is meddling with a long-standing piece of history when he wishes to put the tax system on the same calendar as that by which every one has lived since the 17[illegible], but I shall certainly look at it.

On the more substantive point, my hon. Friend is right to stress that the simplification of the tax system is one of the major steps that the Government have put in place which has encouraged the development of a more competitive and successful economy and delivered the improvement in real take-home pay to which I referred earlier, and which is the bell-wether of success.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: Has the Financial Secretary seen the revised parliamentary answer given to me yesterday stating that the number of people who earn less than the basic rate tax threshold but will pay more in national insurance contributions in 1994-95 as a result of the Budget changes is not 500,000, as previously stated, but 2·5 million? Is not he ashamed that 2·5 million of his fellow citizens who are in work but are too poorly paid to have to pay basic rate income tax will still be required to pay extra national insurance contributions as well as extra value added tax on fuel? Can the hon. Gentleman give the House an assurance that that parliamentary answer has not anticipated Government policy—[Interruption.]—and called the 20 per cent. band the basic rate band, solely for the purpose of—[Interruption.]—restricting allowances?

Mr. Dorrell: It must be a long time since the hon. Gentleman asked a question that secured two cheers while he asked it, particularly one so badly based on the facts. His question reflects the fact that we have increased the personal allowance in real terms by 25 per cent. since 1979. The hon. Gentleman might like to refer also to our change in the system of national insurance contributions for employees, which has reduced the burden on the low paid. It is now a more rational system and more friendly to incentives. The key to a tax system is that it is friendly to incentives and makes it worth while for people to make extra effort. That is the guiding light of our tax policy and will continue to be so.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Mr. Evennett: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 17 June.

The Prime Minister (Mr. John Major): This morning, I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I shall be having further meetings later today.

Mr. Evennett: I thank my right hon. Friend for his reply. Will he join me in welcoming today's unemployment figures which show the fourth consecutive fall? Does he agree that that is good news for the unemployed, the economy and Britain?

The Prime Minister: Yes; above all, it is good news for those workers and their families who find themselves back in work. I am delighted at the fall of 26,000—the fourth fall in a row. I concede that unemployment remains far too high. It has fallen by nearly 80,000 since the beginning of the year. Equally encouraging, vacancies are at their highest level for two years. A few months ago, many people expected unemployment to rise throughout the year. Instead, it has fallen in Scotland, Wales and every English region.

Mr. John Smith: Can the Prime Minister explain—his Minister was asked this question—why only last week the Department of Social Security claimed that the number of people on low incomes who would be worse off as a result of the national insurance increases in the Budget was only 500,000, but yesterday was forced to admit that that was wrong and the real figure was 2·25 million? What sort of advertisement is that for the competence of his Government or their understanding of the effects that his policies have on so many people?

The Prime Minister: The right hon. and learned Gentleman is operating under a misapprehension. Suggestions of a mistake are wrong. My hon. Friend was asked about the number of people below the basic rate tax threshold who will pay more national insurance in 1994-95. The answer he gave on 7 June related to people whose earnings fall below the 20 per cent. tax band. The answer he gave on 16 June related to people whose earnings fall below the 25 per cent. tax band. [HON. MEMBERS: "Ah."] Therefore, naturally the figures are different.

Mr. Smith: The Prime Minister—[Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order. The House must come to order. We must hear not only answers, but questions.

Mr. Smith: The Prime Minister seeks to defend his Department on the basis that it cannot read the questions. The question was the same in both cases, but it received different answers. Leaving that matter aside—[Laughter.]

Madam Speaker: Order. The House must come to order. We are using up valuable time.

Mr. Smith: It relates to precisely the same issue. Does the Prime Minister recollect saying on that very issue during that election campaign:

"taxpayers with the lowest incomes will benefit most"?

Why, then, has he imposed a higher national insurance burden on over 2 million low-paid people? Does he admit that, once again, he has broken his word, or was it just another of those throwaway lines delivered on a wet night somewhere in Dudley?

The Prime Minister: The right hon. and learned Gentleman's suggestion that it might be wise to put that aside is an answer which many people will recall for some time. If he looks at what has happened, he will see that we have raised the threshold for the 20 per cent. band by £500 in the Budget and by a further £500 from next year. Most taxpayers in the lower rate band will gain more from the 20 per cent. lower rate than they will lose from the 1 per cent. increase in national insurance contributions.

Mr. Smith: Does the Prime Minister still not understand, as millions of low-paid people do, that putting 1 per cent. on national insurance for people who do not pay income tax is putting up the tax on their income? Why did he say on page 7 of the Conservative party election manifesto:

"We have reduced the burden of national insurance on low earners"?

Was the whole manifesto written on a wet night somewhere in Dudley?

The Prime Minister: I must tell the right hon. and learned Gentleman that it did not sound any better the second time, so perhaps he should put that aside as well. He should look at what has happened, with the introduction of a 20 per cent. tax band and the raising of a 20 per cent. tax band, and I reiterate—as he clearly did not hear it the first time—that most taxpayers in the lower rate band gain more from the 20 per cent. rate than they lose from the 1 per cent. increase in national insurance contributions. In short—so that the right hon. and learned Gentleman clearly understands—they are better off under our plans than they ever would have been under his plans, which would have involved the largest increase in direct taxation ever seen this century.

Mr. Sims: Has my right hon. Friend had an opportunity to study the current issue of the journal of the Royal Society of Medicine? Is he aware that it includes a survey carried out by a distinguished doctor of general practice in 12 countries in Europe, north America and the far east in which he reaches the conclusion that British is best? Will my right hon. Friend confirm that, as we proceed with the implementation of the NHS reforms, that will continue to be the case?

The Prime Minister: The immediate answer to my hon. Friend is no, I have not seen that survey, but, as he has drawn it to my attention, I shall take the opportunity of looking at it. There has been a dramatic improvement both in the resources available to the health services and in the quality of health treatment provided in recent years by the people who work in the service. It is our intention that that should continue—[Interruption.]—and I am sorry if the right hon. Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett) thinks that it is nonsense that the people in the health service are providing a better service. I believe that they are.

Mr. Ashdown: Is it not the case that in the 17 or so years since the decision was taken to build THORP—the thermal oxide reprocessing plant—at Sellafield, the economics of THORP have collapsed, the risk of nuclear proliferation has increased, international opposition has hardened and the threshold of safe nuclear emissions has been substantially reduced? Will the right hon. Gentleman undertake that, before a decision is taken to put THORP into operation, the widest possible consultation and debate will be conducted on that dubious project?

The Prime Minister: THORP is a substantial engineering and export success for this country. It supports some 3,000 jobs and has £9 billion-worth of contracts, which is a powerful vote of confidence in the plant from people around the world who will be its customers. As the right hon. Gentleman may know, my right hon. Friends the Secretary of State for the Environment and the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food are considering the inspectors' reports on the proposed new discharge authorisations for the site. The right hon. Gentleman will realise that it would be inappropriate for me to prejudge their considerations.

Mr. Stephen: Is my right hon. Friend aware that visiting the House today is a very special group of 21 men who served this country in the Army, Navy and Royal Flying Corps during the great battles of the first world war? Does my right hon. Friend agree that all of us who live in freedom today owe everything we have to those gallant men and their comrades who died in that most terrible of all wars?

The Prime Minister: I agree with my hon. Friend. I have sent a message to those very welcome guests to the House today. I am sure they will be welcomed by everyone in the House.

Q2. Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 17 June.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Llwyd: Given the widespread alarm among millions of constituents about the proposed imposition of value added tax on domestic fuel, which will result in an increased incidence of hypothermia and even more poverty among middle-income groups, will the Prime Minister urge his colleagues to reconsider this pernicious and indiscriminate form of indirect taxation? In so doing, he might just assist his albeit fragile, political future.

The Prime Minister: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his concern. We have set out a policy that we believe is correct and we have stated that we will take action to assist vulnerable groups. That assistance will be in place before the extra charges are introduced. The hon. Gentleman utterly fails to mention that the cost of fuel has been falling as a result of our policies, not rising astronomically as it did before we came to office.

Mrs. Roe: Does my right hon. Friend agree that it is typically British for commentators and Opposition Members to talk British industry down, yet totally ignore the best manufacturing output figures for five years?

The Prime Minister: I think that my hon. Friend understates her case a little. They do not just talk Britain down—given the chance, they do it down and do it in. Opposition policies would impose an extra tax on jobs and would be no good for British industry. Raising employers' costs and introducing the social charter would be no good for employment prospects or employers. The minimum wage would further damage job prospects. Yet again, the use of flying pickets would be legalised. [HON. MEMBERS: "Boring."] That is the Labour party's policy. Labour Members may regard my comments as boring, but people in work regard their policy as a job destruction programme.

Q3. Mr. Bennett: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 17 June.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Bennett: Will the Prime Minister join me in congratulating Mr. Pink on winning his case for unfair dismissal against the Stockport health authority? Does he agree that whistleblowers play a very important part in a democracy? Will he urge the Stockport health authority to reinstate Mr. Pink and ensure that resources are available to improve the staffing of the geriatric wards at the hospital in question?

The Prime Minister: I am not aware of the details of the case, but if justice has been done I am delighted.

Q4. Mr. Fabricant: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 17 June.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Fabricant: Following his Cabinet meeting this morning, will my right hon. Friend unequivocally assure the House that—despite the rumours and smears from the Labour party, which preys on the fears of the most vulnerable in our society—the national health service and welfare state always were, are, and for ever will be safe in Conservative hands?

The Prime Minister: As I indicated a moment or so ago, the health service has improved dramatically during recent years, partly as a result of the increased resources made available to it and partly as a result of the activities of the many dedicated people who work in it. I have no doubt that will continue to be the case in the future. [Interruption.] It is thriving.

Q5. Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 17 June.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Griffiths: Has the Prime Minister given the President of the Board of Trade a list of the companies that have donated to the Conservative party since 1979? Will the Prime Minister confirm that if the President finds that they have not declared those donations in their accounts, they will all be repaid?

The Prime Minister: The hon. Gentleman must understand that British business supports the Conservative party because it believes that our policies are right for British business, the British future and British jobs. Perhaps it is because business understands and applies that test that precious little money from companies goes to the Labour party.

Sir Jim Spicer: Would my right hon. Friend remember today that, over the past year, the wild and sometimes woolly Members of this House have said that the Government should intervene more directly in Yugoslavia? Will he accept the thanks of most sensible Members for all that he and the Government have done, on behalf not only of the United Kingdom but of the world, in not allowing such intervention to take place?

The Prime Minister: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. In my judgment, there is no doubt that it was right to assist with the humanitarian operation, and I believe that the activity of our troops has been widely admired, not just in this country but around the world. They have certainly done a magnificent job.

There are only two ways of settling the dispute. One is to put in hundreds of thousands of troops for an indefinite period—no one wise wants to do that, and no other country would be prepared to do it. The only alternative is to seek a diplomatic solution allied to the humanitarian aid that we and others have been providing. We still seek that diplomatic solution.

I understand that Lord Owen and Mr. Stoltenberg had a useful meeting yesterday with the Presidents of Serbia and Croatia. They will continue their negotiations next week. Lord Owen will brief me on Saturday before I go to the European Council His determined efforts over recent months have done as much as those of any other individual to keep alive the prospect of a political settlement.

Business of the House

3.31 pm

Mrs. Margaret Beckett (Derby, South): Will the Leader of the House state the business for next week?

The Lord President of the Council and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. Tony Newton): Yes, Madam. The business for next week will be as follows:

MONDAY 21 JUNE—Conclusion of a debate on a Government motion to approve the defence estimates 1992 (Cm. 1981).

Motion on the Army, Air Force and Naval Discipline Acts (Continuance) Order.

TUESDAY 22 JUNE—Opposition Day (14th allotted day). There will be a debate entitled "The Need for Openness on Funding of Political Parties and the Enforcement of Company Law on Declaration of Political Donations", on an Opposition motion.

WEDNESDAY 23 JUNE—Remaining stages of the Agriculture Bill [Lords].

Motion on the Council Tax Limitation (Wales) (Maximum Amount) Order.

THURSDAY 24 JUNE—Motion on the Northern Ireland Act 1974 (Interim Period Extension) Order.

Motion on the Appropriation (No. 2) (Northern Ireland) Order.

FRIDAY 25 JUNE—There will be a debate on the health and welfare of children on a motion for the Adjournment of the House.

MONDAY 28 JUNE—Opposition Day (15th allotted day). Until about 7 o'clock, there will be a debate on a motion in the name of the Liberal Democrats, followed by a debate in the name of Plaid Cymru. The subjects have yet to be announced and, for all I know, to be chosen.

The House will also wish to know that European Standing Committee A will meet on Wednesday 23 June at 10.30 am to consider European Community documents Nos. 8487/90 and 5902/93 relating to plant variety rights.

[Wednesday 23 June:

European Standing Committee A—Relevant European Community documents: 8487/90, 5909/93 plant breeders' rights; relevant reports of the European Legislation Committee: HC 11-xxxiii (1989-90) and HC 79-xxx (1992-93).]

Mrs. Beckett: I am sure that the Leader of the House recalls that some considerable time ago an agreement was reached with the Procedure Committee that every effort would be made to have a debate in the House in Government time, preferably roughly every six months, before meetings of the European Council. The right hon. Gentleman will know that there is a meeting of the Council in Copenhagen this weekend, and although we recognise that the business of the House has been under some pressure, I hope that that agreement is not being breached and that we may have an undertaking that every effort will be made to arrange debates before these Council meetings so that the House can comment on developments in the European Community. I also hope that we will have a statement in the House following that meeting.

The Leader of the House will also know that hon. Members throughout the House are anxiously awaiting information and statements on assisted area status. I understand that some information may have been transmitted to the European Community. We are anxious for a statement in the House as soon as possible.

The right hon. Gentleman will recall that I have asked on a number of occasions when we are likely to have a proper debate on the public expenditure White Paper that we would normally expect at some stage during the year. It would be most unfortunate, to put it mildly, if that debate were not held before the next public expenditure White Paper is announced in outline in the autumn. I hope that the Leader of the House will bear in mind our many requests on the shape of the public expenditure programme before it is hacked to pieces.

That brings me to the other issue on which we would like a debate in Government time—the Government's plans for invalidity benefit.

The Leader of the House will know that there is pressure for a debate in the House in Government time on the report of the Select Committee on Members' Interests, which has been around for a long time without being debated.

Mr. Newton: For once, I shall take the hon. Lady's requests in their original order. I regret that it did not prove possible to have the six-monthly debate on European matters in advance of the Council meeting, although the House will acknowledge that it has not exactly been starved of opportunities to debate European matters recently. I shall be looking for a suitable opportunity for the debate in the near future—no doubt, in due course, the Opposition will decide to abstain. I expect that my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister will make a statement at the earliest convenient opportunity after the European Council meeting next week.

The position on assisted area status will be indicated in an answer this afternoon. The Government's proposals were submitted to the European Commission on 15 June, and the proposed new map will be published as soon as Commission approval has been received. Obviously, we want to get on with that as soon as possible, but I cannot give the exact timing at the moment.

I note the right hon. Lady's request for a debate on the public expenditure White Paper, although I cannot add to what I have said on previous occasions. She is, of course, continuing to press me for a flow of Supply days, so I have to make some judgment of priorities as to which of her demands to meet.

The right hon. Lady will certainly have noted what my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister said at Question Time on Tuesday about our plans for invalidity benefit. Against that background, she will be clear that there are no plans as such to be debated at the moment. The matter is being looked at in the way that my right hon. Friend explained. If and when it is appropriate to have a debate, of course I shall arrange one.

Lastly, on the Select Committee on Members' Interests, I am making reasonably good progress towards the debate that the right hon. Lady and some of her hon. Friends would wish to have.

Mr. David Ashby (Leicestershire, North-West): Is my right hon. Friend aware that the Select Committee on Home Affairs is looking into the funding of political parties, that it is hearing evidence on the funding of political parties and that it will in due course be producing a report? The effect of the debate on Tuesday, which is frivolous in the extreme, will be to try to prejudge that report and unduly influence the Committee, which will be considering an extremely serious subject indeed.

Will my right hon. Friend perhaps prevail upon the Opposition not to waste good Supply days on frivolous matters, but to leave this matter to the Home Affairs Select Committee, which will then be able to debate the report? The motion is total nonsense from the Labour party.

Mr. Newton: You will have noted—as I did, Madam Speaker—that, in effect, although that question was properly phrased to be directed at me, it was really directed to the right hon. Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett) and her right hon. Friend the Member for Bishop Auckland (Mr. Foster). I know they have heard it; I hope they will reflect on it. But you will understand, Madam Speaker, as will my hon. Friend, that, although my views coincide with his, I am not in a position to direct the Opposition about the way in which they choose to use their time.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): First, I thank the Leader of the House for his accommodating, if slightly mischievous, announcement of the second of our small entitlement of Opposition days in ten days' time. I can assure him that he will be given the subject in due course.

Following the question of my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Liberal Democrats to the Prime Minister, I put it to the Leader of the House that the Government must find time in the near future to debate any potential go-ahead for the THORP project, a subject that has not been debated in the House since 1978. That has the most far-reaching domestic and international implications, and it relates not only to Britain's economy but to our energy and environmental policies and to global matters of proliferation. May we have an undertaking of a debate on THORP before any go-ahead is announced by the Government?

Mr. Newton: I reject out of hand any suggestion that I am ever mischievous. All I did was try, with some success I am glad to say, to raise a small smile on the hon. Gentleman's friendly face.

I cannot promise the hon. Gentleman a debate in the terms that he requests, nor add to the point that my right hon. Friend quite properly made to his right hon. Friend in the course of questions about the current position in which an inspector's report is being considered. But the obvious thought strikes me that, if the hon. Gentleman feels that strongly about it, I have just given him half a day in which he could choose that subject for debate if he so wishes.

Several hon. Members rose——

Madam Speaker: Before we proceed further, I remind the House that I now want brisk questions and brisk answers so that I might call as many Members as possible. Many Members are standing today.

Mr. Bob Dunn (Dartford): Thank you for calling me, Madam Speaker.

As the Government abolished the Greater London Council, the Inner London education authority and the metropolitan county councils, will the Leader of the House undertake to provide time for a debate in the near future in which Conservative Members might demonstrate and state our total opposition to regional government in any shape or form?

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): Yes, we should like that.

Mr. Newton: I cannot make a promise in quite that form, but I shall bear my hon. Friend's request in mind. The only thing that really puts me off is that the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) would clearly speak.

Mr. William Ross (Londonderry, East): We are happy to have a full day's debate on Northern Ireland next week, but will the Leader of the House bear in mind the fact that, although the report of the Examiner of Statutory Instruments has just been published, there has been a considerable gap in the examination of various statutory instruments in Northern Ireland because of the death of the previous holder of the post? Will the Leader of the House assure me that there will be a debate on that report, which might provide a peg on which to hang some requests for examination of those earlier instruments?

Will the right hon. Gentleman also tell the House what status is accorded by Her Majesty's Government to visits by the President of the Irish Republic to Northern Ireland? They seem to be billed as private visits, but whenever the President is——

Madam Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman's last question does not relate to business questions. It has nothing whatever to do with the Leader of the House.

Mr. Newton: I would simply say that I imagine that, to a significant degree, the status depends on the basis of the visit. Leaving that aside—hastily, in view of your clear steer, Madam Speaker—I undertake to look into the point that the hon. Gentleman raised.

Mr. Simon Burns (Chelmsford): As a fellow Essex man, will my right hon. Friend consider giving the earliest consideration to a statement on regional unemployment figures so that it may become clear to people in the mid-Essex area that the fall in unemployment in Braintree and Chelmsford, which was announced today, was the largest fall in a single month in more than six years, with 362 individuals going back into work rather than being in the dole queues?

Mr. Newton: I shall bring that point and that welcome news, which I too noted, to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Employment if my hon. Friend promises not to call me an Essex man again: last time, for the first time in seven elections, I changed the wording of my election address from "is an Essex man" to "was born and brought up in Essex."

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Is the Leader of the House aware that during the past week it was announced that Rufford—one of the pits in the east midlands, in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Sherwood (Mr. Tipping)—will close by the end of this financial year, which is in direct contradiction to the statement and pledge that the President of the Board of Trade made to the House several times, because it was one of the 12 pits that were going to be left to be market-tested?

Will the right hon. Gentleman arrange for the President of the Board of Trade to make a statement? Failing that, the Leader of the House should arrange for him to make a personal statement, as the previous Chancellor of the Exchequer did, because he deserves to be sacked for misleading the House and misleading the country.

Mr. Newton: I had anticipated the hon. Gentleman, and I have already arranged for the President of the Board of Trade to be here to answer questions next Wednesday.

Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley): Can my right hon. Friend find some time next week for the House to discuss what pressure could be brought to bear on travel agents so that they disseminate information that they receive from the Foreign and Commonwealth Office properly, such as the warnings that holidaymakers should heed before they go to certain parts of the world? I am extremely concerned. My concern was highlighted by the programme "World in Action" on Monday and has certainly been borne out by the murder of many British holidaymakers throughout the world. The information exists, and holidaymakers need to get it; travel agents have it and they are not passing it on.

Mr. Newton: In the light of what he said, my hon. Friend's concern is understandable. The appropriate course is for me to bring his comments to the attention of my right hon. Friends for their consideration.

Mr. Andrew Faulds (Warley, East): Apparently there is some monkey business under way as regards the Museums and Galleries Commission. When can we have a statement as to what plots are afoot as regards this matter?

Mr. Newton: I shall bring that matter to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for National Heritage, and I am sure that he will communicate with the hon. Gentleman if he has intelligence to impart about any problem.

Mr. Anthony Coombs (Wyre Forest): My right hon. Friend will no doubt be aware of the encouraging statistics issued yesterday which show a record proportion of young people going on to further or higher education—an all-time record. May we have a debate so that we can discuss the impact of standards and compare the recent report by Ofsted, which showed that tests led to a significant improvement in teaching and learning environments in schools, with the comments made on last year's tests by the hon. Member for Dewsbury (Mrs. Taylor), the shadow spokesman on education, who regarded them as totally worthless? That shows how far from reality she is on the matter.

Mr. Newton: I agree with the latter point, and also with the first point about the satisfaction we all feel about the great increase in the number of young people going on to further and higher education. As to the middle matter, my hon. Friend will be aware that the Education Bill is under consideration in another place. I am sure that there will be further opportunity for discussion there.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): Has the Leader of the House had an opportunity to look at early-day motion 2138 about air pollution in London?

[That this House is deeply concerned at the appalling quality of air in London, particularly during hot and still weather; believes that the high incidence of bronchial illness and child asthma is related to this and that the major sources of polluted air are private cars; and therefore calls for urgent Government action to improve public transport and reduce wasteful commuter motoring.]

Can he give an undertaking that there will be an urgent and early debate on the need to restore democratically elected government to London so that the city's future can be properly planned, its transport infrastructure properly developed, the amount of commuter motoring reduced and air quality and the life of Londoners improved? Does he not think that it is a disgrace that this is the only capital city with no unified elected local authority?

Mr. Newton: The answer to that is no. I understand that there is an opportunity to discuss the matters raised in the first part of the question in an Adjournment debate this evening.

Mr. Paul Tyler (North Cornwall): Can the Leader of the House reassure us that there will be no repetition of the shambles that overtook the ministerial statements on Monday? You will recall, Madam Speaker, that the Secretary of State for Wales made a comprehensive statement about flooding devastation in Wales and that, after a long discussion, the Under-Secretary of State for the Environment attempted to make a statement, without warning, on the equal devastation and loss of life that has occurred in Cornwall and other parts of the west country. Can we be reassured that, in future weeks, there will not be such a difficulty and that we shall have a comprehensive statement of all the effects of flooding, what the Government intend to do and what the National Rivers Authority is doing about flood defence and flood warning systems?

Mr. Newton: On any occasion on which natural disasters or difficulties occur, some regard must necessarily be paid to the scale in determining whether or not it is appropriate to make a statement. The scale of the flooding in Wales exceeded that in most other parts of the country.

Mr. Ken Maginnis (Fermanagh and South Tyrone): In the wake of the Prime Minister's meeting with the Taoiseach of the Irish Republic, does the Leader of the House agree that it is time that we had a full debate on the workings of the Anglo-Irish Agreement, which has been in place for eight years? In 1985, we were told that the agreements would produce peace, stability and reconciliation. Does the right hon. Gentleman acknowledge that all we had from the most recent meeting with the Taoiseach was a repetition of a harsh, aggressive and irredentist territorial claim?

Mr. Newton: This matter is for you, Madam Speaker, but I would be surprised if the full day of debating Northern Ireland on Thursday, 24 June—on some fairly wide-ranging motions—did not permit subject matter of that kind to be introduced.

Mrs. Alice Mahon (Halifax): Is the Leader of the House aware of the havoc that the internal market is wreaking on the national health service? Will he consider what is occurring at centres of excellence such as the Billericay burns unit, which I am sure the right hon. Gentleman knows very well? Since the internal market was introduced, the superb team at the unit only undertake emergency and urgent cases and not elective surgery, because the funds for that are not available. May we debate urgently centres of excellence and others, such as Killingbeck, which is having to close because there is insufficient money under that stupid, crazy system?

Mr. Newton: I do not accept the hon. Lady's description of what is occurring, but I will of course bring her observations to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health.

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): Has the Leader of the House read early-day motion 2175?

[That this House expresses concern that Home Office statistics show that 100,000 young people under 21 years were either convicted or cautioned for drunkenness in 1990; is alarmed that Department of Transport figures for 1989 indicate that about 25,000 injury accidents are associated with driving over the legal limit for alcohol and that overall 20-25 per cent. of road deaths occur in accidents where at least one driver is beyond the legal limit; condemns the marketing executives and administrators who have sold the England and Australian Cricket teams to breweries; and finds the use of beer advertisements on players and on grounds morally offensive and the subjugation of a once fine sport to such unscrupulous profiteering especially nauseating.]

It highlights the potentially adverse effects of alcohol on young people, with 100,000 under-21s convicted or cautioned for drunkenness in 1990, and expresses opposition to the idea that the English and Australian cricket teams should be sold to the breweries for advertising purposes. Is it not time to stop that nauseating invasion of our screens by enforcing the BBC charter? It is not meant to broadcast advertisements and it is unfair, wrong and illegal for it to do so in that way—and offensive into the bargain.

Mr. Newton: I am sure that the broadcasting authorities will take note of the hon. Gentleman's comments. It is worth noting that, thanks to significant efforts, road deaths involving alcohol more than halved in the last decade. The Department of Transport is launching a major television campaign against drinking and driving on 29 June.

Mr. Derek Enright (Hemsworth): Will the Leader of the House arrange a debate on opencast mining? Is he aware that my constituents are outraged by British Coal's proposals to opencast at Wintersett and North Featherstone—so ravaging what little countryside remains there—at the same time that British Coal is closing local productive pits?

Mr. Newton: The hon. Gentleman referred to "proposals". Presumably that means that there is scope for a considerable public inquiry before any decision is made. That would be the right approach for the hon. Gentleman to adopt.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): Next Tuesday's debate could not be more relevant, given what has been happening with political funding. I was told by the Attorney-General, in reply to my questioning, that seven Tory Members made representations on behalf of Mr. Nadir. Could the four who remain unidentified be named in next Tuesday's debate, and reasons for their representations given on the Floor of the House? Those representations had no constituency purpose. How much more corruption are we to learn of from that case?

Mr. Newton: I understand why the hon. Gentleman feels it necessary to stir the issue in that way, but I doubt whether right hon. and hon. Members on either side of the House really think that it would be appropriate to make public every occasion on which constituency Members, quite properly, ask for information about a case following an approach from their constituents.

Mr. Paddy Tipping (Sherwood): There is a widespread feeling of betrayal among people working in the mining industry in Nottinghamshire and, indeed, throughout the country. Does the Leader of the House understand that those people will not be reassured by the fact that the President of the Board of Trade will be here to answer questions on Wednesday? What they want to know is why, only last March, assurances were given about the future of pits. That was a political fix, which is now coming unstuck. The President of the Board of Trade should be here to apologise to us, and to those miners and their families.

Mr. Newton: As I have said, my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade will be here next week, although I cannot undertake to ensure that he will address the hon. Gentleman in the terms that he invites.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): Has the Leader of the House read the story in the current issue of "Private Eye" which states that, between 1984 and 1990, Mr. Asil Nadir was entertained at No. 10 Downing street on six occasions as an honoured guest of Margaret Thatcher? Now that the right hon. Lady is away from here and it is safe to come out and talk about such matters, may we please have a debate about the contacts and the relationship between Margaret Thatcher and Asil Nadir?

If we can prove that there is something nasty there, perhaps she will also do a runner to northern Cyprus—which will undoubtedly bring smiles to the faces of some Conservative Members, and great delight to the nation as a whole.

Mr. Newton: As it happens, I have not seen the piece in "Private Eye"; no doubt it will be studied carefully.

Let me point out that we are talking about a period during which, as far as I am aware, there was no particular reason to suspect the existence of the problems that have been indentified more recently. I have before me a note that probably relates to roughly the same period: it states that, at the time, both Polly Peck and Unipack Plastics Ltd. were giving money to such bodies as the Spastics Society, the Royal Opera House and the National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children. The atmosphere was quite different from that which now exists.

Mr. Harry Barnes (Derbyshire, North-East): At the Edinburgh conference of European Community Heads of State, it was decided to lift the veil of secrecy from some operations within the Council of Ministers by publishing the votes that took place at its meetings. I was told in a letter from the right hon. Member for Watford (Mr. Garel-Jones)—who was then a Minister—and in a parliamentary answer from the Prime Minister that all parliamentary answers relating to the Council's meetings and published in Hansard would include the details of votes, and give a nil record if no vote had taken place. However, that is not happening in the bulk of Departments. Will the Leader of the House ensure that it is done? It will undoubtedly assist us when European Community matters are debated in the House.

Mr. Newton: I am aware of the general move towards greater openness; indeed, that was one of the matters advanced by the British Government at the Birmingham council, and we are anxious for it to proceed further. I shall look into the specific points that the hon. Gentleman has raised.

Mr. Alan Simpson (Nottingham, South): Will the Leader of the House find time for a debate on the Government's proposals for changes in the affordability rules affecting housing associations? Only today, associations from the whole of the east midlands have been attempting to set out the clear consequences of the proposed change. They would raise the average rent to £85 a week, force low income earners out of housing association properties, terminate the flow of private finance into housing association building and bring about a huge increase in the housing benefit bill, which must be met by the country as a whole.

Mr. Newton: I cannot undertake to find time for such a debate in the immediate future, but I can and will undertake to bring the hon. Gentleman's anxieties to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Security.

Rev. Martin Smyth (Belfast, South): Has the right hon. Gentleman's attention been drawn to a recent report by the Standing Advisory Commission on Human Rights in Northern Ireland, which severely criticises the way in which the people of Northern Ireland have been deprived of their civil and human rights because of the way in which the House deals with Northern Ireland legislation? Will the right hon. Gentleman, as custodian of the House in this regard, respond positively to the report in the near future?

Mr. Newton: I note the hon. Gentleman's request. There has not been deficient representation from Northern Ireland this afternoon, because three hon. Members have addressed me from the Bench on which the hon. Gentleman is sitting. The hon. Gentleman will have a further opportunity to raise those points during the debate next Thursday.

Mr. Paul Flynn (Newport, West): Does the Leader of the House realise that the anxiety about the thermal oxide reprocessing plant is not confined to one group, but is spread to every corner of the House and throughout the country and the world? That is shown by early-day motion 2174 and several others.

[That this House welcomes the 12 to 1 majority vote of the Paris Commission Convention on The Control of Pollution of the Seas, at its meeting in Berlin on 16th June, to adopt further measures including the application of best available techniques for the reduction or elimination of inputs of radioactive substances to the maritime area and its further agreement that a new or revised discharge authorisation for radioactive discharges from nuclear reprocessing installations should only be issued by national authorities if special consideration is given to: (a) information on the need for spent fuel reprocessing and on other options, (b) a full environmental impact assessment, (c) the demonstration that the planned discharges are based upon the use of the best available techniques and observe the precautionary principle and (d) a consultation with the Paris Commission on the basis of (a), (b) and (c) above. Deplores the refusal of the United Kingdom Government alone to support this decision; believes this Paris Commission decision will rightly have serious implications for Sellafield; and demands that this decision be fully taken into account in the present considerations on Thorp.]

Does he not realise that, if Thorp is commissioned, it will mean a ninefold increase in radioactive pollution in the Cumbrian area and will leave a legacy of nuclear waste that will be a nightmare and a burden to our grandchildren's grandchildren? During the debate in 1978, assurances were given by every party that this would not go on without a further debate. The rationale for Thorp was to use its production for the fast breeder reactor. That has been cancelled, and we must have a debate.

Madam Speaker: Order. I ask hon. Members to co-operate in putting only one question, not their arguments at this time. We can then make some progress.

Mr. Newton It will not surprise you, Madam Speaker, or the hon. Member for Newport, West (Mr. Flynn) when I say that I have already commented on that this afternoon, as has my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister. I cannot add to that now.

Mr. Mike O'Brien (Warwickshire, North): Will the Leader of the House accept that some Labour members of the Home Affairs Committee welcome the debate on Tuesday? Will he draw to the attention of the Minister leading for the Government our concern that there should be a reference to the responsibilities of Ministers when they go on foreign trips paid for by the taxpayer? The Committee has received evidence that the Prime Minister took time off from official functions in order to touch foreign business men for donations to the Tory party, and that other Ministers may have done the same.

Mr. Newton: I sometimes think that the propensity of Opposition Members to throw such allegations so easily about the Floor of the House is deplorable. I am conscious of the fact—there is practical evidence of it in jobs in various parts of the country—that my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister's efforts to ensure that foreign business men do business with British companies, buy British products and create British jobs have been among the great successes of his visits.

Mr. Jim Dowd (Lewisham, West): The Leader of the House will be aware that the report of the Royal Commission on Criminal Justice is to be published in the near future. Can he give some indication of what preliminary arrangements have been made for its contents to come before the House? While making those arrangements, will he make representations to his appropriate right hon. Friends to ensure that the report includes consideration of the serious shortcomings revealed by the case against my constituents, Lisa and Michelle Taylor, who were freed by the Court of Appeal last Friday?

Mr. Newton: I cannot dictate to the royal commission what matters it should choose to consider and comment upon. I am not in a position to say when the report will be published. In those circumstances, I can hardly make a statement about how it will be dealt with.

Mr. Robert N. Wareing (Liverpool, West Derby): Is the Leader of the House aware of early day-motion 1874, which refers to Croatian army atrocities in Bosnia-Herzegovina?

[That this House recognises the horrific consequences of the conflict in Bosnia-Herzegovina and condemns the perpetration of massacres against civilians by all sides whether they be Serb, Croat or Muslim; is appalled by most recent reports of Croatian Army atrocities against Muslim civilians in Jablenica, Vitez, Jelinak, Armici, Zenica and many surrounding villages which have been witnessed by officers and men of the Cheshire Regiment and calls on Croat authorities to end, forthwith, attacks against local civilians; calls for all regular Croatian Army troops to withdraw from Bosnia-Herzegovina; and simultaneously urges Her Majesty's Government to discuss, with other Members of the Security Council, an appropriate response by the international community.]

In the light of the fact that The Daily Telegraph journalist, Patrick Bishop, and a British soldier serving with the UN force in Bosnia were wounded this morning by a remote-controlled landmine in the region of Travnik where Croatian soldiers are active, could we have a statement from a Minister about relations between this country and Croatia?

Mr. Newton: I cannot undertake to ensure an immediate statement of that sort. I note the unhappy news that the hon. Gentleman has communicated about that incident. He will know that we fully support the Security Council's statement of 21 April and other things that have been done subsequently to protest to the President of Croatia about the renewed violence and call upon him to use his influence to stop it.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): Has the Leader of the House caught sight of early-day motion 2171, signed by 169 Members across the House, which calls for the cleaning up of the former United Kingdom atomic test site at Maralinga in South Australia?

[That this House welcomes the visit of Mr. Gareth Evans, Australian Minister for Foreign Affairs and his Ministerial colleague, Mr. Simon Crean and their meetings with the Foreign Secretary and the Secretary of State for Defence; expresses the hope that these meetings will lead to an early agreement being reached between the Federal Government of Australia and Her Majesty's government concerning the final cleaning up of the former United Kingdom atomic test site at Maralinga, South Australia; reminds both governments that they are jointly responsible for this matter and that the Aboriginal people of the Maralinga-Tjarutja have pursued the objective of the restoration of their traditional lands in an honourable, dignified and peaceable way; and therefore urges the two governments to respond in like manner, thereby bringing this issue to a conclusion which meets the legitimate needs and interests of the Maralinga people.]

Is it not the case that Gareth Evans, the Foreign Affairs Minister of the Federal Australian Government, has a meeting this afternoon with the Foreign Secretary at which they will discuss this very matter? May I impress on the Leader of the House the need for an early statement from our Foreign Secretary about it, as he will surely agree that the honourable and decent people of the Maralinga-Tjarutja require nothing less than that our Government and the Federal Government of Australia clean up their traditional tribal lands?

Mr. Newton: The hon. Gentleman is right. The Australian Ministers for Foreign Affairs, for Primary Industries and for Energy are in this country and are meeting my right hon. Friend to discuss the matter. Indeed, there must be nearly as many members of the Australian Government in Britain as there are members of the British Government, judging by the numbers I have met—and very genial they and the members of the Australian Opposition are.

As for the subject that the hon. Gentleman has rasied, both Governments are keen to reach a mutually satisfactory solution as soon as possible, and my right hon. Friend will be reporting the outcome of the meeting to the House.

Mr. George Foulkes (Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley): Does the Leader of the House realise that it is ages since the Secretary of State for Scotland produced his White Paper on the options for water and sewage in Scotland and that, during the consultation period, representations against privatisation have been flooding in, including many from Scottish Conservatives?

Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that, in today's Scottish Daily Express, there is what looks like a Scottish Office inspired story, which reveals the form in which the Secretary of State is going to announce the future of Scottish water? As I know that you, Madam Speaker, are always concerned that statements should be made to the House, not in the newspapers in the form of leaks or in any other way, will the Leader of the House ask the Secretary of State for Scotland to make a statement to the House next week, or as soon as possible, on the outcome of the consultation on the future of Scottish water and sewage?

Mr. Newton: When there is an outcome to the consultation, I am sure that my right hon. Friend will wish to make an appropriate statement to the House. However, at the moment, there is not, and I therefore cannot promise a statement next week. Nor can I promise a statement on every piece of speculation that appears in the Scottish or United Kingdom press.

Statement on the Defence Estimates

[Relevant documents: First Report of the Defence Committee on the Statement on the Defence Estimates 1992 of Session 1992-93, HC 218; Fifth Report of the Defence Committee on Army Commitments and Resources: the Government's Response and Army Manpower Statement of 3rd February 1993, HC 731 of Session 1992-93.]

4.7 pm

The Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. Malcolm Rifkind): I beg to move,

That this House approves the Statement on the Defence Estimates 1992 contained in Cm. 1981.

I very much welcome the fact that some Opposition Members below the Gangway have tabled their own amendment to the motion. I congratulate them on their clarity and consistency and I can only regard it as unfortunate that the official Opposition appear to have departed from their previous views without having anything to replace them. This is an opportunity for the House to discuss not only last year's White Paper on the defence estimates but a range of other defence issues.

I begin by paying a personal tribute to my right hon. Friend the Member for Epsom and Ewell (Mr. Hamilton) who, until very recently, was a most distinguished Minister for the Armed Forces and who, for a number of years, made a valuable and important contribution to the well-being of our armed forces, something which I believe will stand the test of time.

It is important that the House should have opportunities not only to debate these matters but to do so in a well-informed fashion. We shall soon be publishing the next defence estimates—the next White Paper—which are likely to be before the House in early July. I hope that it will be possible to debate that White Paper more quickly than it has been possible to debate this one, especially because, although I do not wish to anticipate the contents of that White Paper, I believe that the House, the armed forces and the country as a whole will find it a very informative document which will provide much information that has not before been made available to the House or the country and which will seek to present all the work of the Ministry of Defence in such a way as to make a substantial and important contribution to the proper discussion and understanding of the role of the armed forces, the tasks that they have to carry out, the way in which they meet their tasks, various elements of the forces' structure and how the very large resources available to the Ministry of Defence are used.

I begin by reporting to the House the situation in Bosnia and the role of our armed forces in the former Yugoslavia at the present time. May I offer what I am sure are the congratulations of the House as a whole to those members of our armed forces who appeared in Her Majesty's honours list recently and who received well-deserved recognition for the work that they have been doing in that country. Those who received awards for gallantry and for exceptional leadership deserve to be especially proud of what has been achieved.

The Bosnian Serb rejection of the peace plan, developed by Lord Owen and Mr. Vance and accepted by the Bosnian Croats and Muslims, has been a serious setback to the achievement of a negotiated political settlement, which offers the only prospect of an end to the conflict. Sooner or later, the Bosnian Serbs will have to come back to the negotiating table. Sanctions against Serbia will be applied vigorously until she brings an undoubted influence to bear to that end.

In the meantime, in the absence of a settlement, fighting has worsened between Croats and Muslims in central Bosnia where the British battalion group is deployed as part of the United Nations protection force in its humanitarian task. As the House knows, that task is the provision of protective support for humanitarian aid convoys, under the auspices of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, and for convoys of released detainees under the auspices of the Red Cross.

In the past week there have been serious incidents involving our forces. Last Thursday, 10 June, near Kiseljak, six British personnel were forced out of their Spartan vehicles at gun point and robbed of their weapons and their equipment. Last Friday morning, 11 June, near Novitravnik, British forces had to open fire in self-defence against Bosnian-Croat troops who engaged them while they were protecting a Muslim convoy. On 11 June a sentry at Vitez fired in self-defence at a sniper and there is reason to believe that the assailant was killed.

Those are serious and disturbing incidents. The United Nations and British commanders will make whatever changes they consider necessary in their procedures and dispositions in the light of developments on the ground and will have the Government's full support. For their part, the Government have kept and are keeping the safety of our forces under constant review.

Even before the incidents that I have described occurred, I announced on 10 June new measures that we were taking to ensure that we were ready to provide additional protection for our troops if that became necessary. For several months we have maintained contingency plans to provide additional protection for our forces should circumstances warrant it, through both maritime and land-based assets. To complement those existing arrangements, I announced that a number of Army units and individual officers and men were being placed at readiness to move to the former Yugoslavia at short notice to provide a range of options should the need to protect our forces make that necessary.

We have placed at readiness a range of capabilities that can be drawn on selectively according to the needs of the situation. No troops are being sent to the theatre at this stage, apart from a small number of personnel who will be required for ground-to-air command and control functions in connection with the provision of air support. HMS Ark Royal remains in the Adriatic sea with her Sea Harriers and Sea King helicopters embarked. We hope that it will not be necessary to deploy those capabilities, but the Government will not hesitate to reinforce our battalion group if required, either to enable it to continue with its current task or to assist with the withdrawal of United Nations forces if it came to that.

As we have already made clear, the units that we have on standby would not be sent to undertake any new mandate. We are already a leading contributor to UNPROFOR's Bosnian command and there are more British soldiers in Bosnia than there are from other United Nations countries. It will be clear to the House that British troops are fully committed in fulfilling their current humanitarian task. The provision of additional forces to enable the safe areas concept in Security Council resolution 836 must be a matter for other nations. We very much hope that those resources will be forthcoming.

The safe areas concept is part of the joint action programme agreed between the United Kingdom, the United States, France, Russia and Spain in Washington on 22 May. Implementing the concept is an important immediate step to help stabilise the situation on the ground, relieve suffering and create an improved climate for further work to achieve a negotiated settlement. Neither Britain nor the other co-sponsors of the resolution regards safe areas as a permanent solution or an end in themselves.

Mr. Patrick Cormack (Staffordshire, South): Even as we debate the matter, at least one of those safe areas, Gorazde, is being subjected to continued aggression by Serbia. My right hon. and learned Friend mentioned Croatia and the Muslims. Will he emphasise the fact that great brutality is still being perpetrated by the Serbs in Bosnia?

Mr. Rifkind: I have to confirm that fact. There have been incidents of brutality involving all communities in this ghastly conflict. I acknowledge my hon. Friend's comment that Serbia has a particular responsibility and has been involved in a number of the most serious incidents.

Safe areas are a temporary measure to help to create a climate in which renewed efforts to help a lasting and equitable peace can make progress, building on the work of Lord Owen and Mr. Vance. The Security Council resolution has given UNPROFOR a mandate in six areas: to deter attacks; to monitor the ceasefire; to promote the withdrawal of military or paramilitary units other than Bosnian Government units; and to occupy some key points on the ground in addition to participating in the delivery of humanitarian relief.

The resolution authorises member states acting nationally or through regional organisations or arrangements to use air power in support of UNPROFOR carrying out its mandate in and around the six designated safe areas. NATO has agreed to take on the task in support of, and in close co-ordination with, the UN as an extension of its current operations to enforce the no-fly zone. I announced on 10 June that the Government have offered a squadron of Royal Air Force Jaguar aircraft to participate in such an operation. We are closely in touch with NATO about the detailed arrangements for the operation and I shall keep the House informed.

The House will want to join me in paying tribute to the courage and professionalism of all our forces involved in operations in and around the former Yugoslavia. We are well aware of the impressive scope of those operations. Royal Navy ships and Royal Air Force aircraft are taking part in operations to enforce sanctions against Serbia and the arms embargo against the whole former Yugoslavia and to enforce the no-fly zone in Bosnia.

Mr. Mark Wolfson (Sevenoaks): How effective is the increased effort to tighten sanctions proving to be? That is germane to the question whether there should be more or less military intervention.

Mr. Rifkind: Sanctions are having a very considerable effect on the Serbian economy. President Milosevic sees the effect of sanctions as very damaging to the economic prospects of the country. There is massive inflation, vast unemployment and a huge fall in manufacturing production. That is, in part, why Mr. Milosevic sought to persuade the Bosnian Serbs to support the Owen-Vance proposals. The sanctions will continue until we can be satisfied that sufficient progress has been made.

The battalion group that has been involved in our humanitarian operations has been very successful and can claim to have been responsible for the saving of many tens of thousands of lives. Those who advocate the lifting of the arms embargo in favour of the Muslims or intervention against one party or the other must realise that to do so would bring the humanitarian operation to an end. I repeat, however, that we shall not hesitate to take whatever steps may be necessary for the safety of our forces and the House can rest assured that this is, and will continue to be, our paramount consideration.

The possible participation of South Africa in the anniversary celebrations of the Royal Air Force has given rise to some interest in the House and in another place. I am pleased to announce that South Africa will be invited by the Royal Air Force benevolent fund to send a transport plane to attend the Fairford international air tattoo. South Africa's association with the Royal Air Force is long-standing. Indeed, the RAF's existence as a separate service owes much to Field Marshal Smuts. We have, therefore, concluded that this association should be marked with the participation of a non-combat plane in the air tattoo to mark the RAF's 75th anniversary year.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): Does the Secretary of State think it entirely appropriate to have a South African military presence in this country when South African armed units are attacking Government positions in Angola in defiance of a United Nations resolution and of the clearly expressed wish of the Angolan people for peace?

Mr. Rifkind: The involvement of the South African navy in the recent services relating to the battle of the Atlantic was warmly welcomed by all shades of opinion in South Africa, including the people most representative of black opinion. We are now in a new situation and it is right and proper for us to respond in the way that I have described.

Mr. Iain Duncan Smith (Chingford): I do not wish to expand much further on the point, but just to establish the facts clearly for the record, during the second world war a vast number of South Africans volunteered, against the wishes of some of the more Boer elements in South Africa, to come here and many lost their lives on behalf of this country. The whole point of the commemoration is that it is about those people, not about what may be going on politically today.

Mr. Rifkind: That is absolutely correct. We can never forget the contribution made by those brave South Africans, many of whom sacrificed their lives. When we are commemorating the history of the Royal Air Force it is right and proper that that contribution should be taken into account. As my hon. Friend says, that does not represent a political comment on any contemporary difficulties that may be continuing in South Africa today.

We are all conscious of the fact that the armed forces are going through one of the most radical reorganisations since 1945 and I pay tribute to the people, both civilians and members of the armed forces, who are having to supervise a difficult period of transition and who are doing so with the customary spirit and dedication that we expect to see in the armed forces.

I note that some Opposition Members, although not Front-Bench Members, have tabled an amendment calling for a major reduction in our defence expenditure, echoing the calls of the Labour party conference for defence expenditure to be drastically pruned. When those hon. Members say that our defence expenditure should be reduced to the level of that in other European countries, perhaps they have not fully examined what the other countries with which one might most easily compare the United Kingdom spend on defence. For example, when one compares the defence expenditure of the United Kingdom with that of France and Germany one finds an almost uncanny similarity in the total sums made available. Expressed in pounds sterling, United Kingdom defence expenditure in 1992 was about £24·4 billion; that of France was £25·8 billion; and that of Germany almost exactly £24 billion. An almost identical amount was being spent by those three major countries. Furthermore, the United Kingdom has some special responsibilities, such as our commitment to Northern Ireland and our continuing obligations to defend our dependent territories. The responsibilities associated with our being a nuclear power —a factor that we share with France—also have to be taken fully into account.

We have also seen a dramatic improvement in the ability of the United Nations to meet various international challenges and it is well worth remembering the increased contribution that the United Nations is making to easing some of the problems of security and peacemaking in various parts of the world. Since January last year, when only 12,000 United Nations forces were involved in various operations around the world, the figure has increased so that today about 60,000 United Nations forces are engaged in United Nations operations. That increase has profound implications and it is now time for the United Nations to consider whether at the heart of its activity it has sufficient military advice and personnel to assist the Secretary-General to develop and co-ordinate the many military operations with which the organisation is associated. Increasing attention needs to be given to that question.

It is also important to ensure that countries invited to contribute to United Nations operations should not be expected to be committed to supporting the United Nations in any particular theatre for as long as support may be required. Sometimes that may involve a period of many years—for example, we have now been in Cyprus for more than 25 years—and it is not realistic to expect the small number of countries which provide the bulk of United Nations support to give such an open-ended commitment on an ongoing basis. Much more sensible is the principle of rotation, as that enables another country to be brought in for a period of time, thereby helping to spread the burden in a realistic and sensible way.

I want today to make some very important comments with regard to the use of our reserve forces, because I believe that they have a crucial contribution to make and I know that they are a matter of considerable interest to many hon. Members.

I know that the House will join me in paying tribute to the contribution that has been made over the years by members of our reserve forces. The willingness of men and women to give up their spare time to serve the Crown has been warmly welcomed and on many occasions has proved to be vital.

In March 1992 we issued an open Government document on the future of Britain's reserve forces which set out proposals for the more flexible use of reserves, permitting their use in a wide range of types of operation. That document proposed legislation in the 1994-95 Session and we have that objective firmly in mind. Since that document was issued, the change in the international situation has provided us with the opportunity to introduce new roles for the reserves. At the same time it has become clear that standing reserve forces are no longer required for certain current roles.

Against that background we have been looking in detail at the structure of the reserves of all three forces. Today I shall be announcing the results of our detailed deliberations on the future of the Navy's reserves and our latest proposals for the RAF reserves. We are also re-examining the operational requirement for the Army's reserves and hence the size and shape of the Territorial Army. I shall be making a further announcement on that later in the year.

Before I come to the detail of our proposals on the Royal Navy and the RAF, there are a number of basic principles which I should set down and which underpin our thinking on all three services. First, I must place on record my personal commitment to the future of our reserve forces. Reserves in all three services will play a continuing crucial role in providing support to their regular colleagues.

Secondly, I believe that we should bring up to date the roles of the reserves where they are no longer relevant to our changing defence needs. It is in no one's interest, not least that of the reservists themselves, that they should be expected to carry out roles which, although vital in the past, no longer require standing forces. That would breed frustration and disillusion.

Thirdly, and most important of all, I believe that the time has come to make arrangements to deploy reserves much more widely in operational roles in peacetime. I regard this point as particularly important. In the past, with only a few exceptions, we have called out reservists only at times of heightened tension or in war. We are now moving to a world where the possibility of major confrontation is less than it has been for many years, but where the demands placed on our forces for peacekeeping and related tasks have never been greater. Furthermore, I know of the frustration felt by many reservists that their skills were not used during the Gulf war, when their American counterparts were deployed in such large numbers. Today, hundreds of Canadian volunteer reserves are serving in Cyprus, Cambodia and Somalia; and in the former Yugoslavia Canadians are joined by hundreds of Danish reserves.

I can see no reason why we, too, should not plan to deploy our reservists in peacetime. I am therefore looking in detail at the possibilities, particularly as we consider the proposed new reserve forces legislation. One specific idea is that we might use volunteers from the TA to form units or sub-units to contribute on a planned basis to operational commitments undertaken by the regular Army. The feasibility of attaching a composite TA infantry company composed of volunteers to regular units undergoing United Nations tours is being examined, with a view to running a pilot scheme in late 1994. I shall say more about this when I come to report on the future of the Territorial Army later in the year. I regard it as a very significant and welcome development. I want similar opportunities to be available to naval and air force reservists. I believe that in this way we shall ensure that the reserves are given more relevant, more important and more fulfilling jobs to do and that the link between reserves and regular forces will be strengthened thereby.

Sir Geoffrey Johnson Smith (Wealden): I am sure that the announcement that we have just heard about the enhanced role and status of the Territorial Army service overseas will be warmly welcomed on both sides of the House. Can my right hon. and learned Friend reassure the House that, in the further consideration that he is giving to the role of the TA, he will give consideration to the concept of ever-readies, which has often been advanced in the House, so that we can see across the broad stream of activity the TA playing an even greater role in helping to sustain our armed forces?

Mr. Rifkind: I thank my hon. Friend for his comments. Any use of the reserves for operational roles in peacetime must be based on the fact that they would be volunteers —they would have made it clear that they were keen to be used for such a role if it should become available. Over the next few months, we will be working on the detailed way in which the objectives will be translated into specific structures to bring that about.

I come to the detailed proposals for the future of the Royal Naval Reserve. The proposals to which I am about to refer are, of course, subject to consultation. No final decisions will be taken until the process is complete.

First, I should make it clear that we have no plans for changes to the Navy's ex-regular reserves, other than to match the greater opportunities for women within the Royal Navy to the same reserve liability as their male colleagues. Currently numbering some 24,000, those ex-regulars would, if necessary, provide the great bulk of reinforcement to the Royal Navy. Each year, some 2,000 highly trained personnel leave the Royal Navy and provide a readily usable pool of ex-regular reserves. Any degradation of their skills can be recovered through refresher training.

For the naval volunteer reserves, the proposals are the culmination of studies that were announced to the House by my right hon. Friend the Member for Epsom and Ewell on 24 July 1991. The main aim of those studies was to achieve closer integration of the Royal Naval Reserve with the operational activities of the Royal Navy. As hon. Members know, the Royal Navy's volunteer reserve forces comprise the Royal Marine Reserve, the Royal Naval Reserve and the Royal Naval Auxiliary Service. The principal role of the Royal Marine Reserve is to provide training reinforcements to bring the marine commandos to full war strength on mobilisation. That is an important and continuing role. We have no current plans for changes to the Royal Marine Reserve.

Two of the major roles of the naval volunteer reserves during the cold war have been the defence of ports and anchorages and the manning of the Naval Control of Shipping organisation. Those tasks have been undertaken jointly by the Royal Naval Reserve and the Royal Naval Auxiliary Service.

The Royal Navy has reviewed the continuing need for those tasks and concluded that the scale and immediacy of a perceived threat to the western alliance has reduced to such an extent that it is no longer sensible to earmark discrete forces for them. In the extreme circumstances of a rise in tension and a direct threat to this country, there will be sufficient time to provide such forces by an appropriate expansion, if necessary, of the Royal Naval Reserve or regeneration of the ex-regular reserves. The end of that requirement removes the need for 710 Royal Naval Reserve personnel and all but 135 of the Royal Naval Auxiliary Service ratings.

After careful study, we have concluded that there are no other roles that would be suitable for the RNXS and that such a service of 135 would be too small to be viable. Accordingly, and with considerable regret, we have concluded that the RNXS, which came into being only in 1962, should be disbanded and its training units closed. In making those proposals, I pay tribute to the loyalty and dedication of members of the RNXS over the years—this cannot be over-emphasised. However, I know that the RNXS would not wish to carry on with tasks that the tide of history has left behind. There will be an opportunity for up to 135 RNXS personnel with suitable skills in Naval Control of Shipping to join the Royal Naval Reserve to provide a capability for possible short-notice deployment overseas.

We have considered the impact on the reserves of developing technology. Nowhere is that more apparent than in the field of mine counter-measures. Our River class of minesweepers fleet, which provides the basis of the current Royal Naval Reserve seagoing role, was designed to counter deep-moored mines as well as a specific Soviet threat. Following the collapse of the Soviet Union, that mine threat no longer exists. The minesweepers fleet has no other mine counter-measures capability and has been overtaken by advances in other aspects of mine counter-measure warfare and technology. Accordingly, we propose to withdraw those vessels from this role and the Royal Naval Reserve.

The task of deep-water mine counter-measures will be assumed by our modern mine counter-measure vessels such as the Sandown class. Such modern vessels are highly technical and require the crew to be at a high state of training readiness to be prepared to meet their operational commitments. It would not be possible fully to man the vessels with Royal Naval Reserves. However, under our new proposals, members of the Royal Naval Reserve will be able to serve on these vessels.

Mr. Peter Viggers (Gosport): I follow the argument of my right hon. and learned Friend and accept the logic of what he says about the River class minesweepers. However, the next step in his chain of logic would be to confirm that there will be further orders for Sandown class minehunters. Does he accept that the need for mine counter-measure vessels has not diminished worldwide and, indeed, that the kind of threat facing us in the so-called new world order requires mine-hunting capacity? Will he confirm that the orders intended for later this year will be forthcoming?

Mr. Rifkind: I thank my hon. Friend for his understanding approach to the reasons that have led to this decision. We expect to go out to tender shortly in respect of the Sandown class minehunters. We intend to ensure that they will be available as soon as they are operationally necessary. I hope that that reassures him.

Mr. Paul Flynn (Newport, West): Both sides of the House will welcome the timely decision that the Secretary of State has just announced in response to changing world circumstances. Will he now tell us what change he will make to our nuclear capability in response to the changing world situation? Does it make any sense to continue as we are doing and not only retain our present nuclear weapons, but increase their size, numbers, range and power?

Mr. Rifkind: I am not sure that that is relevant to the role of the naval reserves, but, as the hon. Gentleman intervened to ask the question, I remind him that we have already announced the ending of all nuclear artillery, the use of Lance missiles and the use of tactical weapons on naval vessels.

Mr. Flynn: What about Trident?

Mr. Rifkind: We are committed to Trident and rightly so because it is based on our perception of what is the minimum deterrent required to ensure the protection of the United Kingdom. We have no intention of departing from that policy.

Several hon. Members rose——

Mr. Rifkind: If I may, I shall return to dealing with the Royal Naval Reserve.

The Government fully accept that serving in Royal Navy ships lies at the heart of the Royal Naval Reserve, underpinning its ethos and recruiting. I am happy to announce that this role will be developed so that it encompasses all types of Royal Navy ship. We are proposing that a dedicated seagoing branch of some 500 personnel be set up, training in all types of Royal Navy ships, not just mine counter-measure vessels, and employed at sea wherever appropriate, as an integral part of the fleet. Additionally, smaller numbers of Royal Navy Reserves will assist in the logistics area, in submarine operations management and on aircraft maintenance. In future, Royal Naval Reserve training will be more closely sponsored by the appropriate Royal Navy organisation.

The net effect of these changing roles is that the Royal Naval Reserve will reduce from 4,700 to about 3,500. Eleven units will close, but a new unit, based in HMS Bristol, the harbour training ship at Portsmouth, would be created which would offer the opportunity for RNR personnel from HMS Sussex, HMS Wessex and HMS Southwick to transfer. In future, 13 RNR units, to be retitled "Reserve Centres", will be sited throughout the United Kingdom. We will try to find alternative employment in the Ministry of Defence or other Government Departments for some 200 civilian employees, some part-time, who will be affected, but this may not always be possible.

Mr. Robert Banks (Harrogate): I appreciate what my right hon. and learned Friend has said today. It is important for the Royal Naval Reserve to have an active role rather than one, of which I had experience, in the naval control of shipping. Can he say something about HMS President, which has been an important landmark in the City and a good recruiting and training centre? Will that unit be retained?

Mr. Rifkind: I thank my hon. Friend for his comments. The opportunity for members of the Royal Naval Reserve to train with the Royal Navy on all types of warship at sea is an important step forward and will be widely welcomed. I cannot give my hon. Friend an immediate answer to his question, but my hon. Friend the Minister of State for Defence Procurement, who will reply, will certainly respond to that point in due course.

I turn to our proposals for the Royal Auxiliary Air Force. Again, the end of the cold war and the manifestly reduced threat to the United Kingdom has a significant impact, particularly in relation to the direct threat to our airfields. Accordingly, we have concluded that it is no longer necessary to retain No. 1339 Wing, equipped with Oerlikon anti-aircraft guns and Skyguard radars to protect RAF Waddington and RAF Coningsby.

As hon. Members will know, our proposals under "Options for Change" will lead to the cessation of flying at RAF Honington. The Royal Air Force Regiment depot will move to that station from RAF Catterick. There is, therefore, no longer a requirement for the wartime specialist ground defence currently provided by No. 2623 (East Anglian) Squadron Royal Auxiliary Air Force Regiment. Notwithstanding the fine service that those units have given over the years, they no longer meet a defence need.

We have also reviewed our previous plans to expand the Royal Auxiliary Air Force defence force flights. Again, circumstances have changed so radically that it would be unwise to proceed with that expansion before the results of the service's wide-ranging review of its long-term requirements are known.

While those changes represent reductions in the auxiliary air force, I am delighted also to announce our proposals for the Royal Auxiliary Air Force to take on a new role, with auxiliaries filling about half the posts in two regular squadrons of the Rapier air-defence missile force. Recruiting is expected to begin next year in the areas around RAF Leuchars and RAF Leeming and the new units should be complete by 1997.

To simplify call-out procedures, which will require the introduction of the new legislation I mentioned earlier, we propose that that part of the Royal Air Force volunteer reserve which has a war role should be amalgamated with the Royal Auxiliary Air Force, producing a more streamlined organisation for war. That would not affect the Royal Air Force volunteer reserve training posts associated with the air cadet organisations and the university air squadrons.

Taken together, those proposals will lead to a net reduction of about 480 auxiliary air force posts. That is about 10 per cent. of the current strength of the RAF reserves.

The naval and air force proposals that I have announced will be of interest to a great number of hon. Members and to many people throughout the country. Accordingly, I have set out the proposals in some detail in consultative documents which I have placed in the Libraries of both Houses and which are also being sent to organisations known to have an interest. My hon. Friend the Minister for the Armed Forces and I have written to those hon. Members whose constituencies are affected. Further copies of the documents are available in the Vote Office.

Mr. Roger Knapman (Stroud): Bearing in mind the fact that this is the 75th anniversary of the establishment of the Royal Air Force, may I ask my right hon. and learned Friend to join me in congratulating Dowty Aerospace Propellers Ltd., for which many of my constituents work, on being selected to supply high technology and all composite propellers to the Lockheed Corporation? I understand that the Dowty propeller will equip the C130-J Hercules aircraft and that the order run may be about 500 aircraft sets, worth about £150 million. Does he agree that that is a great boost for British industry and shows that we are still a great engineering nation?

Mr. Rifkind: I am glad of this opportunity to congratulate Dowty on that success, which is a tribute to the excellence of our aerospace industry. As my hon. Friend will know, the Hercules C130-J is a candidate to replace our existing Hercules aircraft, which have given valuable service for over 25 years.

The proposals that I have announced today will be subject to consultation with the trade unions where civilian employment is affected. We shall continue to liaise closely with the territorial, auxiliary and volunteer reserve associations and the national employers liaison committee. The consultation period will run until 30 July. Thereafter, having considered any and all comments received, we will announce a decision on the proposals in due course.

We are living in a time of change, but I know that the Territorial Army as well as the naval and air force reserves will welcome our intent to use them more fully for operational roles in peacetime. This represents an historic change and is entirely appropriate to the new international situation.

Mr. Andrew Robathan (Blaby): I am interested to hear my right hon. and learned Friend's remarks about the reserves. He seems to be announcing reductions in the Royal Naval Reserve and the Royal Air Force Auxiliary as a positive step which will enable the people concerned to take part in more regular activities. I put it to him that by manning Rapier squadrons half with reservists, those squadrons are likely to be undermanned because, needless to say, in many cases the reservists will have full-time civilian jobs.

Mr. Rifkind: I assure my hon. Friend that it will be done in such a way as to ensure that the operational requirements of the Royal Air Force are fully met. It would be irresponsible to do otherwise. It is inevitable that there will be some reduction in the size of the Naval and Royal Air Force auxiliary services and reserves if certain of their basic roles are no longer required.

We have approached the matter from the point of view of whether there is a continuing need for a particular function. I do not think anyone would argue that, for example, naval control of shipping or the defence of ports and anchorages requires a dedicated force in the circumstances that we now face. That is the approach that we have adopted. Wherever we have identified new roles that make sense and are relevant to the needs of the Royal Air Force or the Royal Navy, we have been very willing to utilise those roles for such purposes.

Mr. Keith Mans (Wyre): Dealing specifically with the Royal Auxiliary Air Force and bearing in mind the increased role that Rapier squadrons are likely to have overseas as a result of the end of the cold war and the sort of peacekeeping operations that may have to be backed up by air defence or strike attack aircraft, may I ask my right hon. and learned Friend to say how those reservists will be able to go overseas with their squadrons in future to fulfil that role?

Mr. Rifkind: Reservists who are used overseas—this relates to my earlier remarks—will be volunteers. It will be for those who are willing, when they join the reserves, to be considered for such operational roles overseas to indicate that willingness and to be attached, I would expect, to units that may be used for that purpose. Then, should the circumstances so arise, they would be available. In broad terms, that is the way in which it will operate.

We have much work to do on that concept because this is the first time that we have considered using reserves, although many other countries do so. We shall be using the time in the coming months to prepare the necessary legislation and the pilot scheme that I said would be introduced in 1994, and translate this firm proposal into its specific procedural and other details, which will then take effect. I believe that it will be warmly welcomed.

Mr. Julian Brazier (Canterbury): We have a clear lesson to learn from the Gulf war—clear at least to anybody who knows territorial soldiers, and I served with the TA for 13 years. Our former hon. Friend Neil Thorne, who represented Ilford, South, often raised the point in the House. It is that territorial soldiers should never be asked to volunteer twice. Calling for volunteers puts men, their employers and sometimes their families in an impossible position. Either a unit should be called out or it should not. Calling for volunteers places terrible stress on people. That is why the TA does not believe the document and is not happy with its content. It does not see it as a suitable way forward for using reservists in peacetime.

Mr. Rifkind: I would not dissent from some of the points that my hon. Friend makes, but he knows as well as I do that the TA has expressed a desire to be used in an operational role in peacetime. He knows it because he has urged that course on me on numerous occasions. What he and others who share that aspiration, which the Government endorse, can do is to help construct the precise structure which will enable that aspiration to be translated into practice. That is what we are seeking to do and I believe that it can be done effectively.

Mr. Archie Hamilton (Epsom and Ewell): Does my right hon. and learned Friend also accept that it is a complete travesty to say that all members of the TA are employed by large companies? That is not the position. They are often self-employed and sometimes they are unemployed. In those circumstances, they are grateful for the opportunity to serve. So it is nonsense to say that they will be withdrawn from their companies or that a disturbance will be created.

Mr. Rifkind: I accept that, and I am conscious of the fact that whenever I have visited TA units, the desire to be used in an operational role has been the single, most repeated request made to me. I suspect that hon. Members on both sides have often had that request put to them, for understandable reasons.

Mr. David Young (Bolton, South-East): I fear that as more reserve forces are brought in as part of a wider scheme, people will feel that their jobs will be in jeopardy because of the view of their employers. Will the Government remove from the unemployment figures the unemployed who volunteer for the reserve forces?

Mr. Rifkind: That is among the sillier suggestions that I have heard for some time. The answer to the hon. Gentleman's underlying point is that we must have close liaison with the national employers liaison committee, which represents the interests of employers who have a commitment to assisting the reserves. We shall be working closely with that body.

Mr. James Couchman (Gillingham): I represent what was the Chatham Royal Naval base and there is considerable local interest in the future of HMS Wildfire, the Royal Naval Reserve establishment in Chatham. Will my right hon. and learned Friend bear in mind the 500 years of naval history behind that unit? That is where naval affection is now focused and there will be sadness in the Medway towns if that link is broken.

Mr. Rifkind: I understand my hon. Friend's point. I hope that he will take the opportunity, however, to read the consultative document that we have published today. If he believes that particular points have not been properly considered, I hope that he will not hesitate to make them known to me.

I do not wish to detain the House for much longer——

Mr. Robert N. Wareing (Liverpool, West Derby): Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman give way?

Mr. Rifkind: Not at the moment, but no doubt there will be other opportunities to give way to the hon. Gentleman.

We are all conscious of the fact that the ending of the cold war and the collapse of communism in Europe was a triumph for NATO. I also believe that it was a triumph for the defence policies that had been pursued by the Government and previous Conservative Governments. I do not believe that the Opposition Front Bench Defence spokesmen can take any great sense of pride in what has been achieved with the collapse of communism and the end of the Warsaw pact.

On most of the major issues that we have had to address and concentrate our attention on in recent years, including the unilateral defence policy of the Labour party and the use of cruise missiles, the Labour party has opposed the fundamental tenor of Government defence policy.

Mr. Wareing: Will the Secretary of State give way?

Mr. Rifkind: In a moment.

Opposition Members claim to be men and women of principle, but that is not supported by the charge sheet. Once upon a time one used to ask, "What did you do during the great war?" The answer was, "I survived." If Opposition Members were asked what they did during the cold war, they should reply, "I surrendered", given the way in which, in successive election campaigns and in the House, they have committed themselves to policies designed to reduce defence expenditure and abandon our nuclear deterrent. The way in which they have generally ignored our defence interests has been appalling.

The hon. Members who now make up the Opposition defence team claim that they are now reformed characters and that their past convictions should not be held against them. It is important to remember exactly what they said in recent years, because all of them, who now have defence responsibilities, have quite a lot of answering to do.

The hon. Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark) is responsible for defence matters in the shadow Cabinet, but even to this day none of us knows whether he is still a member of the Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament. He has never been prepared to confirm that he has left CND and his reluctance to do so makes us wonder whether he is still a member of it.

The record of the hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes) on defence matters has not been much better. In 1982, during the Falklands war, he called for an immediate truce while the Argentinian forces still controlled the island. No doubt they would still control it if his advice had been accepted. In 1987, he called on the Government to cancel Trident in the light of international changing circumstances. We have never heard him confess that he was wrong to do so.

The hon. Member for Carlisle (Mr. Martlew) also supported the cancellation of Trident and yet now claims to support a Labour party policy that seeks to ensure Trident's continuation. We must ask ourselves what are the policies and principles on which those Front-Bench spokesmen seek to put forward their arguments.

The position of the shadow Cabinet is just as doubtful. The hon. Members for Livingston (Mr. Cook), for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) and for Sheffield, Brightside (Mr. Blunkett), three of its most prominent members, defied their leadership in 1990 by voting in favour of massive defence cuts to the level of the west European average.

Mr. George Foulkes (Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley): Did the right hon. and learned Gentleman tell my hon. Friends that he intended to refer to them?

Mr. Rifkind: I am referring to the facts. [Interruption.] They are well aware——

Madam Deputy Speaker (Dame Janet Fookes): Order. We cannot have repeated sedentary interventions.

Mr. Foulkes: It is a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. The Secretary of State has mentioned my hon. Friends and I would like to know whether he wrote to them to tell them what he intended to do. The three Opposition Front-Bench spokesmen on defence are here and are expected to be here, but has the right hon. and learned Gentleman had the courtesy to inform my other hon. Friends that he intended to mention them?

Mr. Rifkind: The hon. Gentleman knows the rules of the House as well as I do. He knows that I am referring to factual matters that are on the record and established and that, therefore, there is no need to follow that convention.

The reality is that three members of the shadow Cabinet have voted constantly for massive cuts in defence expenditure and sought to justify that. What about the deputy leader of the Labour party, the right hon. Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett)? As recently as June last year she was asked in a Fabian pamphlet whether she supported the views of the Labour party conference, which called for a massive reduction of £6 billion in defence expenditure. She replied:

"I have always taken the view that conference determines Party policy."

If that is the view of the deputy leader of the Labour party, it needs to be questioned and we require a proper answer.

Mr. Wareing: Will the Secretary of State give way?

Mr. Rifkind: No, because I have a particular point to put to the hon. Member for South Shields, the Opposition's spokesman on defence.

During the 1992 general election campaign, the then Leader of the Opposition, the right hon. Member for Islwyn (Mr. Kinnock), offered the most novel policy of the Labour party on defence. He said that the Opposition would not negotiate away Britain's nuclear weapons as long as other countries had such weapons. I hope that the hon. Member for South Shields will admit that the meaning of that statement was clear. The right hon. Member for Islwyn said:

"a Labour Britain will keep nuclear weapons as long as anyone else has them."

That appeared to be a clear, unambiguous statement. On 17 May this year, however, the hon. Member for South Shields, speaking on behalf of the Labour party, was asked to comment on matters involving Trident. He said:

"We would deploy and retain Trident, but if it got to the stage when we would consider it appropriate, we would enter Trident into the disarmament negotiations . . . we wouldn't give Trident away for nothing."

That is very reassuring, but not entirely satisfactory. Presumably we would give Trident away for something, if not for nothing—something short of the total removal of nuclear weapons by countries that represent a possible threat to us.

The hon. Member for South Shields owes it to the House and, perhaps, to his own party to tell us whether he has changed Labour party policy. We wish to know whether he stands by the views of the previous Leader of the Opposition, who said that we would keep our nuclear weapons

"as long as anyone else has them."

Is that or is it not still the policy of the Labour party?

Dr. David Clark (South Shields): I am delighted to clarify the situation. The position is quite clear and it was laid down in words of one syllable, or almost, so that Conservative Members had a chance to understand, in our manifesto. It clearly stated that Labour would

"in government partner the United States in negotiating to reduce"—

[Interruption.] I am reading slowly so that Conservative Members can understand—

"the world's stocks of nuclear weapons. We shall seek to involve the four former Soviet nuclear republics, together with France and China. Until elimination of those stocks is achieved, Labour will retain Britain's nuclear capability, with the number of warheads no greater than the present total."

I hope that that is clear to Conservative Members. That was the policy of the Labour party at the election and it is its policy today. That, too, is my policy, which I have reiterated time and time again. I hope that Conservative Members are able to understand words of one syllable.

Mr. Rifkind: The hon. Gentleman says that that is his policy, but it is not what he said in his major lecture at the International Institute for Strategic Studies on 17 May, when all that he was prepared to say was:

"we wouldn't give Trident away for nothing."

Dr. David Clark: That is the same thing.

Mr. Rifkind: I am interested in the hon. Gentleman's clarification, which the House is also delighted to hear. We are delighted that the hon. Gentleman has confirmed today that the Labour party would keep nuclear weapons as long as other countries kept theirs. That is a small step for mankind, but a great step for the Labour party.

Mr. Wareing: It is clear from the Secretary of State's speech that he wishes to defend British interests, although he uses small party political points to do so.

The Secretary of State mentioned the Falkland Islands. I recall that the withdrawal of a British ship from those islands gave a signal for the Argentinians to invade. When will the Secretary of State talk about Belize, where the withdrawal of British troops was foreshadowed exactly four days before by a coup d'état in Guatemala? That was four days after some Opposition Members had warned the right hon. Member for Watford (Mr. Garel-Jones) that Guatemala was not stable and that Belize's safety was not safeguarded. Will the Secretary of State address himself to the protection of both British and Belizean interests in the Caribbean?

Mr. Rifkind: I had a valuable discussion with the Prime Minister of Belize only last week and we are conscious of our obligations to that country. The hon. Gentleman should know—if he does not, I am happy to inform him—that the new Government in Guatemala have not stated that they take a different view of the independence of Belize——

Mr. Wareing: Yet.

Mr. Rifkind: The hon. Gentleman says yet, as if there were an implicit threat. We have given the fullest protection to Belize and we are conscious of our responsibilities to that country. Belize is now recognised by and has diplomatic relations with Guatemala. Guatemala has withdrawn her claim to the territory and the idea that the United Kingdom should continue with a permanent military garrison in those circumstances is unrealistic. We have also said that, following the gradual withdrawal of the garrison, we shall continue to have a presence in Belize, as we intend to continue jungle training there.

The United Kingdom will continue to have the closest possible relations with Belize and with its Government. If the hon. Gentleman suggests that a permanent garrison is required, he must appreciate that that would be a most inappropriate policy to pursue.

Mr. Wareing: No agreement with former Guatemalan President Serrano Elias had been reached on territorial waters even before the coup. Who knows what could be in store in an unstable country where there was a great threat of a military takeover just a few weeks ago? Is the Secretary of State saying that he is certain that that threat has gone for ever?

Mr. Rifkind: The question is whether we choose to retain a military garrison in an independent state that has, at the moment, no claims upon its territory from other countries. We do not keep military garrisons around the world. We keep them in territories where we have an historic obligation or where there is a threat to a country's independence and integrity. The idea that, because of unresolved differences of view between two countries that do not involve the independence or integrity of either state, we should keep a military garrison on an open-ended basis is a grave distortion of priorities for any country, and particularly for this country at the present time.

I emphasise that we have no intention of abandoning Belize. The withdrawal of our garrison will be gradual and could be reversed if circumstances justified it. We have no reason to believe that the present Guatemalan Government have any intention of reopening some of the old animosities. If that intention were to change, we would have to take that carefully into account.

I shall conclude by saying—[Interruption.] I am conscious that I have been speaking for quite a long time. A number of hon. Members wish to speak and I hope I may be allowed to conclude.

Mr. Corbyn rose——

Mr. Rifkind: The hon. Gentleman has tabled an amendment and he will wish to speak to it. If he catches the Chair's eye, he may be able to put forward his views.

The Government are conscious that there are difficult challenges and problems for the armed forces of the United Kingdom to face. That is inevitable at a time when we are experiencing a reduction in the size of the armed forces. It is not a problem unique to the United Kingdom —clearly all NATO countries face similar circumstances. Dramatic changes are occurring in the former Warsaw pact countries which require considerable attention and cause severe strains.

There is no doubt that, at the end of that process, we will still be able to say without equivocation that the United Kingdom retains one of the most powerful, relevant and significant military forces both in Europe and in the international community. Our professional armed forces are held in the highest respect because of their professionalism, expertise and training. We remain committed to those standards and, while there will inevitably be difficulties over the next couple of years, I believe that we will come through that period and that our armed forces will continue to be a source of great pride and achievement to the British people.

5.6 pm

Dr. David Clark (South Shields): I shall begin in a non-controversial manner by joining the Minister in wishing good will to our troops in Bosnia and in many other trouble spots of the world. I wish them well and hope that they come back to this country safely.

I wish to place the Labour party's gratitude to our service personnel on the record. They have demonstrated their dedication and professionalism on numerous occasions over the past year. We should recognise that, and also that we are extremely fortunate to have those high quality armed forces. The demand by such bodies as the UN for British forces testifies to their excellence and skill. We are fortunate to have them.

We are also fortunate to have the reserves, who give the country more time and effort than is reflected by the remuneration that they receive. We must remember also the thousands of Ministry of Defence civilian workers and the hundreds of thousands of defence workers who play a vital part in the defence of our country.

The Secretary of State announced far-reaching proposals for the reserves. We must study those proposals with care. I noticed that he did not get the resounding support that I think he had expected from his Back Benchers. We must study the small print of the proposals.

The Secretary of State announced the proposals in a positive way, but left many questions unanswered. Many of us feel that the decision is not strategic, nor is it based on defence requirements. It is based on a decision by the Treasury to screw money out of the Ministry of Defence. When he replies to the debate, I would like the Minister to state how much the proposal will save, or how much extra money it will cost. Will he also say whether there will be any further reductions in the size of the Territorial Army? Those questions must be examined carefully.

The Secretary of State's announcement, and the way in which it was announced, gave a new meaning to the "army of unemployed" in this country. The Secretary of State was dismissive of the problem of unemployed reservists. However, there are 3 million people out of work and a number of them are reservists. He pooh-poohed questions about whether those reservists will be available for work. I hope that he will address that question. The petty interpretation currently employed by the Government for people who are trying to do voluntary work does not bode well for the future.

The Labour party has called for this debate for the past nine months and, obviously, we now welcome it very much. We are conscious that we are discussing the defence White Paper for 1992 halfway through 1993. It is clear that none of the discussions or votes relating to the debate will have any impact on the defence estimates, which have already been passed by the House with our support. We are debating the Government's statements on the estimates—in other words, the Government's defence strategy. We understand why the Government have been so slow to hold a debate. It is ironic that we are debating these estimates now, when within two weeks we shall get the defence estimates for 1993. I hope that in future the Government will not treat the House in such a cavalier manner.

On examining the Government's statement on defence, I can say only that by their neglect and incompetence and through their sheer inefficiency the Government have mismanaged gravely the defence of our nation.

The reason why they have made such a mess is quite clear. They are simply unable to shake off their free-market dogma and come to terms with the demise of the Soviet Union. The Conservatives have never been adept at handling change. As one Tory wag once remarked, it is not that they are against change; they simply do not like doing anything for the first time. That is the Government's dilemma. The concept of planning is anathema to them, yet planning is absolutely central to defence. Thus, with the greatest changes in the security sphere since the end of world war two, they rejected a full-scale defence review in which the chiefs of staff were properly consulted. That has been the traditional method of reassessing our defence strategy and that is what should have been done on the breakdown of the cold war.

In a letter to the RUSI News Sheet of autumn 1991, Richard Mottram, a senior MOD civil servant, stated that the group that produced the first "Options for Change" proposals, while it did contain some military personnel, did not include the chiefs of staff. The most important reason for this was to "help avoid . . . selective leaks to the media".

That is why chiefs of staff were excluded from the discussions on "Options for Change".

I find it disturbing that Government Ministers had such little confidence in their chiefs of staff that they actually agreed with that. What confidence can the House have in a defence policy that has been written without proper consultation with the military?

Mr. Mans: While I can understand that there was a compelling reason to have a full-scale defence review at the end of the cold war, does the hon. Gentleman not agree that, with hindsight, that would not have been the right way forward? Events have moved so rapidly and in such unpredictable ways that any review at that time would already be out of date. With hindsight, was not Government policy at the time—to look at the situation and make the changes they did—the right one?

Dr. Clark: I can answer the hon. Gentleman in one word—no. The real reason is that the Tory party is dogged with dogma. Any defence review was out of the question, so the then Secretary of State decided to have his hole-in-the-corner review of defence which he grandly called, "Options for Change".

The irony is that in the past couple of weeks we have had the best explanation and description of that process in the diaries produced by the then Minister of State, Alan Clark. It is quite remarkable that he spills the beans and tells us what it was all about. He was very quick off the mark and presented his own proposals on 14 January which, in his own words, were "the lead document" and had the advantage that they were "only five pages long" as opposed to the cumbersome policies and documents put forward by the other parties. He describes in great detail what happened.

"How shrewd and good I was to get it in first", he writes, and talks about how he was beginning to win the battle in the Ministry of Defence. He says:

"I retoy with the idea of supplanting him,"

—the then Secretary of State—

"and promptly. Of course I should be in charge",

he writes,

"handling the whole thing at international level, also Washington, Brussels. My present solution would be to move TK to Health".

I shall not continue because he is rather rude about certain Conservative Members. He goes on to describe the critical ministerial meeting with the Prime Minister in the chair. He says:

"I set out my stall, named and costed a number of programmes which could be eliminated without any risk. This induced show intakes of breath from the military men but I could see Lawson and Lamont beaming with approval. Martin Farndale tried to come back at me, but the PM cut him off and she started on a quite well-informed (Charles's hand clearly in evidence) summary of the approach to the equipment problems, and the need for 'inter-operability' across NATO. When the Prime Minister said that 'further work was needed' I jumped in. It was now or never."

Mr. Cormack: It is a book at bedtime.

Dr. Clark: That is exactly the point. It does read like a book at bedtime. However, it is how the Government did their defence review. I thank the hon. Gentleman for making the point for me.

The book continues:

"What a coup! . . . 'Well done Alan', said Lawson . . . We've made it! Single-handed, you and I are going to write the Review."

Those were the words of a player in the "Options for Change" review. It was really like Noddy land. As the hon. Member for Staffordshire, South (Mr. Cormack) said, it was just like a book at bedtime. I suggest to the House that it was not a proper or sensible way to devise our country's defence.

Mr. Robathan: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for the amusing interlude that he is giving us. Does he view Alan Clark as a reliable source of information? If he does, he has further proved that the Labour party is not fit to determine our defence. Surely Alan Clark can never be called a reliable source of information.

Dr. Clark: All I can say is that, to the best of my knowledge, Alan Clark is not a member of the Labour party; he is a card-carrying member of the Conservative party. He was a Minister of the Crown until he himself resigned; he was not actually sacked and, as he has produced the only account of "Options for Change", we must accept it as the true one until the Government describe precisely what happened.

Mr. David Young: Is it not a sad concern that the Government have not created a comprehensive review in order to meet the current situation which is resulting now in the loss of morale in the forces, the fact that forces are over-stressed and over-worked and the fact that Britain is not in a position to meet the day-to-day commitments that are forced on us by the United Nations and by the rise of nationalism? Are not the Tories avoiding their election commitment to provide the necessary resources for the effective defence of this country because they have never planned for such a defence?

Dr. Clark: My hon. Friend put the point so well that I might consider employing him as my speech writer. He is quite right that there is no strategy and that is why we are in the current mess.

After the bedtime stories, the then Secretary of State, who quite clearly came from the same military school as Blackadder, decided to produce one of Baldrick's cunning plans and, like all Baldrick's cunning plans, it has fallen apart.

Then there was the indignity of Ministers sneaking out figures just before the Easter break, so that the House could not discuss them, announcing that 5,000 extra personnel in the Royal Navy were to be sacked. That sort of action comes from having no strategic plan. There is not even a document "Options for Change"; only a parliamentary statement supplemented by newspaper leaks and Government announcements, which, perhaps, makes the point that there has been no strategic thinking.

As has been said, the great asset of the plan was supposed to be flexibility. But, critically, that means that there was no strategic assessment of our defence needs in the mid-1990s and beyond. There has been no attempt to match the shape of our forces to the threats and risks facing our security and our obligations to the world community. What we needed then, as now, was a full-scale defence review.

We all accept that we live in a changed world and that there will be reductions in defence spending. On 19 May, the Minister of State for Defence Procurement told the House that Britain would be making cuts of about 10 per cent. in the next three years. That adds up to a reduction of about 30 per cent. by the end of the decade.

[Dr. Clark]

No one quibbles with the need for reduced defence expenditure. However, when expenditure is cut it is all the more important to get it right. The correct balance must be struck between our services and those of our NATO allies. Because the Government failed to have a fundamental review, we have seen repeated examples of crisis management and the associated over-stretch. Our armed forces have too many roles to undertake.

The Government cannot take decisions themselves. In the autumn of 1992, the Government told the people of Plymouth, in the local press, that they would announce before Christmas 1992 whether Devonport or Rosyth would refit Trident. Yet, here we are in June, still awaiting that decision. When will they make up their minds? When will they end the uncertainty? When will they put the people out of their misery? Or do they enjoy torturing people? It appears that the well-known inability of the Prime Minister to take decisions has infected the Secretary of State with a vengeance.

It is not only the lack of decision or strategy towards change that concerns us; it is the mistaken policies based on pure dogma, especially those of privatisation and contractorisation. That approach has cost this country dear. For example, there was the recent fiasco at St. Athans with the Tornado fighters, so ably highlighted by my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, West (Mr. Morgan). The House will recall that, under the Government's competitive tendering scheme, a £7 million contract was awarded to Airwork Services to refit the fighters. It is understood that the company so botched up the work and cut so many corners that the planes are now unfit for service. The cost of rectifying that will be about £6 million per plane—on a £7 million contract. Meanwhile, 18 crucial fighter planes are grounded.

I put it to the Secretary of State that if he had achieved the downing of 18 fighters single-handed in the last war he would have been awarded the iron cross personally by Goering. The right hon. and learned Gentleman has achieved the almost impossible, all because of dogma. That is not an isolated case. Tragically, there have been as many cases as there have been escapees under Group 4 —another example of the Government's dogmatic approach.

On 9 June 1993, the National Audit Office confirmed that the Minstry of Defence police are investigating a massive fraud involving shipowners and agents during the Gulf war crisis; an issue that we raised in 1991, for which we were ridiculed. While our troops were risking their lives trying to liberate Kuwait, the fat cats were busy milking the inefficiencies of the MOD. Excessive commissions were paid, nearly all the charters were placed with foreign shipowners because the Government had destroyed the Merchant Navy and vast profits were made. It is small wonder that the Tory party received £7 million in their coffers from foreign business men, who have been richly rewarded.

There is not only fraud but inefficiency. The same National Audit Office revealed that almost £50 million out of £260 million was spent unnecessarily because of Government incompetence. The country paid the price then for Tory dogma, but that was not an isolated case. Only yesterday the Public Accounts Committee was severely critical of the Government over ship refitting contracts. It revealed that £224 million—these are vast sums—was wasted on refitting two nuclear submarines which were then decommissioned in the middle of the refit. What a disaster, what a tragedy and what a costly mistake for which the British taxpayer is having to foot the bill.

The tragedy is that the Government do not seem to have learnt the lesson. The National Audit Office, in its report, says that the chartering arrangements to the former Yugoslavia are so poor that for the supplies going to our troops. I shall not spell out the implications of those findings, but the Secretary of State must drop that dogmatic approach to all things and sort out the system once and for all because lives are literally at stake.

"the absence of suitable movements systems and expertise . . . could then have serious consequences"

Mr. Andrew Mackinlay (Thurrock): Before my hon. Friend moves on from that shameful catalogue of inefficiency by the Secretary of State and his predecessor, will he add to it the case of HMS Victoria which has cost the taxpayer an additional £70 million, is three years behind in delivery and still does not have the defence systems that were intended for it? Will my hon. Friend press the Secretary of State to ensure that before the debate is concluded on Monday evening we have a full and frank disclosure of the circumstances behind the scandalous loss of public money in relation to HMS Victoria, know when the vessel will be completed and have a reassurance that it will have the defence systems for which it was originally designed?

Dr. Clark: I pay tribute to my hon. Friend for the assiduous way in which he has gone about researching and publicising that scandal. Representing a constituency on the River Tyne—perhaps I should say River Teign, which seems to be the Prime Minister's way of describing it—I well remember the problem. It is a sore point. When I, along with my hon. Friend the Member for Jarrow (Mr. Dixon), have 800 constituents likely to be made redundant by Swan Hunter, it is particularly painful to realise that that order was deliberately turned away from the Tyne and given to Belfast. Therefore, I look forward to the reply to my hon. Friend's question and I hope that the Minister will be forthcoming.

Will the Secretary of State, or the Minister when he replies, confirm that last Friday, as questions were being asked in the House about the future of our troops in Bosnia and whether they should or could be evacuated, the Royal Fleet Auxiliary Argos, whose light artillery, the Secretary of State told us when the naval task force was sent to the Adriatic, was critical in aiding the evacuation of our troops, was, almost to the minute, sailing into a military port in the south of England loaded with the very light artillery that the Minister told us was vital if we were to get our troops safely out of Bosnia? That is a serious charge and the Minister owes an explanation not only to the House and the country but to the troops in Bosnia who were told that equipment was available to help. Why was the RFA Argos brought home at that critical time?

The Minister may refer to Sea Harriers, but they cannot provide 24-hour cover. They are dependent on ground guidance, and are unable to reach troops in the split second that is sometimes required. If light artillery were in place, it could provide the cover needed. I hope that the Minister will remedy that serious inadequacy as speedily as possible.

The Government threaten our defence with their incompetence, indecision and inefficiency—but also by their negative approach. Nowhere is that more clearly seen than in the comprehensive test ban treaty. The United States, Russia and France all agreed to a moratorium on nuclear testing. Only Britain and China disagreed. It is widely understood that the British Government's position is the hardest of them all, and that threatens the complementary non-proliferation treaty, which is due for review in 1995.

It is widely acknowledged that, unless there is progress with a comprehensive test ban treaty, the future of the non-proliferation treaty will be at stake. Why are the Government so obstinate? There is no need for further testing.

In a letter to The Independent on 18 February, four former ambassadors and senior civil servants clearly and explicitly made the case against nuclear testing. Many leading scientists in this country and overseas—including Lord Zuckerman, the former MOD chief scientist—take a similar view. The Government know the situation. In a letter to me dated 14 June, the Secretary of State wrote:

"At the first meeting of the NPT preparatory committee held last month, some countries made it clear that in deciding their own approach toward the non-proliferation treaty they felt it important to see progress being made towards a CTBT."

The Secretary of State cannot claim that he does not understand the argument. Why does he not act upon it? It is in the interests of Britain and of the whole world that the non-proliferation treaty is signed. Security is a far wider concept than defence. In a world of weapons of mass destruction, security is probably more vital than the narrow concept of defence.

A lack of leadership seems to characterise the Government, who constantly trail behind and are never in the vanguard. That is clear in the case of Bosnia in particular and of the United Nations in general. The Government have always lagged behind what is required in Bosnia, and people have lost their lives because of it.

The Labour party shares the Government's caution, but we have always argued and advocated a policy aimed at protecting non-combatants. Fortunately, we have been able to drag the Government along, but always slowly—and lives were lost in the meantime. If only the Government had acted earlier and with vigour, the consequences would have been much better.

As early as 7 August 1992 I called—on behalf of the Labour party—for United Kingdom troops to be sent to Bosnia to escort humanitarian convoys as part of the United Nations effort, but we had to wait until 22 September before the Government decided to act. Why the delay? In December, the shadow Cabinet responded to my suggestion that the United Kingdom should advocate and support in the United Nations a no-fly zone over Bosnia. We had to wait until 1 April before Government support for such a policy was forthcoming.

When the House last debated Bosnia, on 29 April, I argued that United Nations safe havens should be protected by United Nations troops, and that if asked, Britain should consider allowing our troops to participate in that humanitarian role. We still await the Government's conversion. The six-nation declaration of 24 May that only United Nations troops will receive protection in safe havens almost beggars belief. Are not British troops there to protect non-combatants? They must be. That is their purpose.

Our defence industries play an integral part in our country's defence effort. We acknowledge that with defence spending cutbacks both here and abroad, there will inevitably be reductions in the numbers employed in those industries. We differ from the Government in that we feel that one simply cannot disregard the years of loyal service given by those employees. It is not sufficient to let the free market decide their fate and to throw them on the dole with the 3 million other unemployed.

In the past three years, the national press has logged 81,900 workers in defence-related industries as losing their jobs. That figure excludes thousands more job losses that have not been reported at a national level. Do the Government feel no obligation to those people? Why do they reject calls from this side of the House to assist those workers by establishing a defence diversification agency? The Governments of other countries assist their companies to develop into other markets and products. The dual use of technology may be difficult but it is not impossible. Other countries and other companies are achieving that. In Britain, many local authorities are endeavouring to assist in that way, so why do the Government shirk their responsibility?

This Government, in the words of the former Chancellor of the Exchequer, are more interested in office than power. They are a Government without vision. They are a Government devoid of a leadership instinct. They are a Government for whom ideas seem too much of a burden. That is characteristic of all the Government's activities, but nowhere is it more clearly seen than in the sphere of defence. As a result, the very security of Britain is suffering.

Sir Jerry Wiggin (Weston-super-Mare): The hon. Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark) attacked my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Defence for dogma, but I could hear in the hon. Gentleman's words echoes again of the Labour party's anti-nuclear stance. The strength of our nuclear arm was surely one factor in the collapse of the Warsaw pact. We stuck with it through thick and thin, despite criticisms, and with difficulty and expense—but I believe that that was the most sensible, worthwhile, and peace-promoting activity that the Government undertook in conjunction with their allies.

I want today to draw attention to our reserves. This afternoon, my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State made some important announcements. The world scene does not give me any feeling of great peace or security. I have not added up the figures, but the other day I was told that there are no fewer than 28 armed conflicts currently raging in the world.

I do not see any great reduction in the threat from the former Warsaw pact. Many of those soldiers have nothing to do and are hungry, and many of the factories are still producing armaments in substantial quantities. Furthermore, the Governments that are supposed to have control of those countries—although they may or may not have control—are themselves insecure and unstable, and those countries are on our borders. Elsewhere in the world, the scene is no happier.

[Sir Jerry Wiggin]

I did not cast my vote in support of "Options for Change", because I believed that it was premature and too much. It must be sensible at a time when we are reducing our regular forces to enhance our reserves. There cannot be a strategist in history who would not acknowledge that as a sensible way to proceed. In fact, regular officers in command of our armed services, who are responsible for deploying their resources with the maximum effect and maximum economy, in their opinion, will always derate the reservist and say, "I would rather have a regular frigate than 10 minesweepers," or, "I would rather have a regular company than 10 Territorial Army battalions." I am afraid that that philosophy has been allowed to prevail again. I understand that the Territorial Army is undergoing yet further inspection, months after "Options for Change".

More than 10 years ago, when I was at the Ministry of Defence, I had the welcome and happy task of helping to expand the Territorial Army. We set targets that I considered somewhat optimistic on the whole; indeed, they were never achieved. For a number of reasons that I have given the House before, recruitment was never maintained at the desired level.

When the "Options for Change" figures were published, I had to say that I thought it realistic to set a reasonable and sensible figure, in terms of recruitment and equipment. Now all that has been overturned, and a further examination of possible economies in the TA is being made. Rumour has it that up to 14 units may be involved.

Perhaps I should declare an interest—not a financial one. I have the honour to have been appointed honorary colonel of A squadron of the Royal Mercian and Lancastrian Yeomanry, an amalgamation which—although, thanks to the common sense of the officers, it is proceeding happily—is far from natural.

The other day, I heard an ugly rumour that the MOD was thinking of abolishing honorary colonels; I sincerely hope that it was but a rumour. Although I well understand that the political power that such a collection of gentlemen can produce is sometimes uncomfortable for those sitting in Whitehall, I believe that they have a role to play, and that their abolition would be outrageous. In any case, I have not yet paid for my mess kit.

I think I heard my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State say that he had no plans to reorganise the Territorial Army associations. They, too, play a political role of a sort: they not only maintain TA buildings, but maintain the liaison between employers, serving TA soldiers and the community in every area. I hope that the Territorial Army volunteer reserve associations can be preserved in their present form.

My right hon. and learned Friend spoke of consultation. I note that each of the documents published this afternoon, concerning RAF and Royal Navy reserves, has "Consultative Documents" in large letters on the front page. To me, however, that has the ring of something produced by the MOD. However many consultations may be proposed, there seems little likelihood of change.

If my right hon. and learned Friend genuinely intends consultation to take place, I hope that he will study carefully the paper that has just been produced by the council of TAVRAs; it has been sent to some of us in the past few days. The document, which is extremely well written, calmly argues the fundamental point that a reservist, if trained to carry his personal weapon, to conduct himself in a military manner and to understand the chain of command—in other words, to look after himself—can be useful in any circumstances.

The same applies to the seaman. The mine counter-measures training of the Royal Naval Reserve may not be so relevant to today's threat, but the fact remains that—for very little pay, and with very little reward—reservists were able to operate and navigate their ships, to look after themselves and to behave in a seamanlike way. They, too, would have been of asssistance.

I do not think that my right hon. and learned Friend can get away with hoping that he will not be criticised for his announcements about the RNR. The removal of no fewer than nine ships and 11 units, as announced in the document, deals a death blow to the RNR. It is ridiculous to suggest that re-enlisting 500 men in aircraft and submarine maintenance will produce anything like the present-day RNR. The truth is that the regular view has prevailed: "We will keep our regular frigates, and to hell with the reservists." It is a very sad day for the RNR; I deeply deplore what has happened, and I hope that what I have said will be counted as my contribution to the consultation.

I know that, in the next few months, Ministers' minds will be engaged by the question of the size and role of all the reserves. I emphasise the word "role". The regulars' favourite trick is to argue that there must be a role. Everything must be cut and dried: we must know exactly what this or that soldier will do when we go to war. One of the lessons of history is that almost never does a war obligingly come up to suit the staff college; wars are always unexpected and happen in the wrong place, the equipment is wrong and the soldiers have been trained in the wrong way. What, then, is wrong with training a reserve force? It must be sensible.

I believe that, last year, the reserve force cost the MOD 2·08 per cent. of its total expenditure. The Ministry cannot have anything cheaper than that. My regiment has 20-year-old vehicles. The standard of training is extremely high, and there is a good deal of enthusiasm; the pay, however, is minimal. If it were not for the enthusiastic way in which the soldiers are led, the MOD would be getting nothing for its money, but in fact it receives extraordinary good value. I hope that, one day, one of the Ministers will spare the time to visit us so that we can show him at first hand the excellent job that TA soldiers are doing.

I was interested to note that the hon. Member for South Shields mentioned the decision on the nuclear refit at Devonport. Although my constituency is about 100 miles from Devonport, the entire west country considers that decision crucial. There is no longer a justification for two dockyards the size of Rosyth and Devonport; at some point, hard decisions will have to be made. The sooner it is decided that Devonport shall be the principal dockyard for the south coast, the better: ultimately, that is what will happen, and if we go on dithering we shall simply waste a good deal of money and cause a good deal of ill feeling.

The west country is also affected by the question of the EH101. I have often argued in the House for the provision of proper helicopter support for the British forces. As long as the RAF is responsible for supporting the Army, problems involving the allocation of money will arise—problems identical to those caused by the conflict between regulars and reserves. In 1987, Lord Younger—then Secretary of State for Defence—promised that the EH101 would be purchased in its utility version to provide medium heavy lift capacity for the British armed forces; nothing has been heard since.

We know that, because the so-called Air Mobile Brigade is about as mobile as the bicycle corps used to be because it has no helicopters, pressure is now building up. Experience of the Gulf and other such theatres—along with the experience of other armies, and the work of analysts—has shown that the British forces need a substantial helicopter enhancement.

The RAF was bemused by the offer of a cheap version of the Chinook, whose design is more than 30 years old. Of course it will pay the Americans to sell the British forces a cheap version of the helicopter: it will put our helicopter producers out of business, and in 10 or 15 years, when it comes to the next round, there will be no British alternative. The EH101 is technically an advanced helicopter, well capable of beating all its rivals. I accept that it is on the expensive side, but, if the RAF does not buy it, what hope have we of selling it anywhere else?

My hon. Friend the Minister may not be aware that the MOD made our aircraft industry a laughing stock in the recent Paris air show by revealing that MOD officials had inquired of the French Ministry whether it had any secondhand Pumas for sale. What on earth are we doing when something such as that happens? The EH101 is a fine aircraft and we want a firm order—we have 40 in mind. Let us go ahead and show the world what we mean. That will be good for United Kingdom Ltd., because we will sell that helicopter around the world.

Mr. Mans: Does my hon. Friend agree that, although the initial purchase of the EH101 may appear to be expensive, if one compares the full life costs of that aircraft with that of the Chinook, it works out considerably cheaper?

Sir Jerry Wiggin: Yes, and it is not only that. The reliability that will be built in—such as the non-vibration factors and so on—will commend that helicopter enormously.

The hon. Member for South Shields was complaining about decisions that had been delayed for months. This decision has been delayed for years, and it is time it was made in favour of the EH101.

5.50 pm

Mr. Menzies Campbell (Fife, North-East): It is difficult to escape a sense that some of our deliberations this afternoon may be inconclusive because of the imminence of the publication of the estimates for 1993. For example, looking back at the Defence Committee's response to the 1992 estimates, it is clear that the Committee's observations about the submarine fleet are likely to be overtaken by events. The Government's proposals are likely to be available in a more detailed form in the 1993 estimates than in those for 1992.

In spite of that, a debate of this sort necessarily allows an opportunity for the discussion of a number of long-term issues. It was notable that the hon. Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark)—he is no longer in the Chamber, because he has another obligation—began by asking for a full-scale defence review. There is never a defence review now that is not accompanied by the adjectives "full" and "scale".

A call for such a review was repeated this morning in the Scottish newspapers by Lieutenant-General Sir Peter Graham, the recently retired GOC Scotland. He has gone from that eminent position to lead the campaign to save the Gordon Highlanders. That may to some extent justify the view that, if there were to be a full-scale defence review, at least in the beginning, Mr. Alan Clark was sensible to consider that involving the service chiefs might not be wise.

The hon. Member for South Shields considered that the fact that it was thought that they might be the source of leaks was some sort of reflection on them. I should have thought that it was almost inevitable, in circumstances such as those outlined in the "Diaries", that leaks would have occurred, because there would necessarily be some inter-service rivalry. The hon. Member for South Shields was being, if not naive, perhaps a little disingenuous.

There is no doubt that Mr. Alan Clark believed that he was the progenitor of something in the nature of a review. However, it was clear when "Options for Change" was first announced in the House and spoken to by the then Secretary of State, the right hon. Member for Bridgwater (Mr. King), that he believed that a defence review was not under way.

Tribute was paid earlier in the debate to the right hon. Member for Epsom and Ewell (Mr. Hamilton). I should like to add my congratulations to him on his tenure of office and to thank him for the courtesy that he displayed to me, particularly during the Gulf war. He was at pains on a number of occasions to ensure that I was aware of certain steps that were being taken by the Government so that the fullest information, consistent with security, was available to hon. Members of all parties.

The right hon. Gentleman conducted himself then and on many other occasions with a great deal of charm and courtesy for which I am grateful. I hope that we will hear from him frequently in debates of this sort, because he knows where the bodies are buried. He may be able to bring a perception to some of our debates that we would otherwise lack. If he is ever looking for battle honours, he may be able to claim, with some justification, that he served for a number of years in the Ministry of Defence with Mr. Alan Clark.

My criticisms of "Options for Change" are that there were never any options, there were never any choices and there was never any public discussion of the commitments, or the resources that might be made available to meet those commitments. I must say, particularly to those on the Opposition Front Bench—I do not excuse myself from this criticism—that it is far too easy to use the notion of a defence review as a shield against taking tough decisions.

There is no doubt that any Government of any political colour operating on the Treasury Bench now would face a series of critical and extremely difficult decisions because of the change in the strategic environment and reduced resources. It is important to realise that a defence review is not a solution. It is a means of identifying questions that will require solutions. I believe that a review is a better means of identifying those questions than any other, but it is important that one does not respond to every change in the defence environment by pretending to people in Harrogate, Rosyth and Devonport that, if there were to be a full-scale review, the difficult decisions involving their futures would be taken in a way entirely favourable to them.

Those of us who argue for a defence review have an obligation to make it clear that a review will be a more effective way of identifying the decisions, but that in the end, against the background of changes in the strategic environment and reduced resources, difficult decisions will have to be taken.

Another criticism of "Options for Change" is this. There have been substantial changes in the international security environment since July 1990. It would be surprising should there not be a change of policy to meet those changes. What policy decisions by any Department in July 1990, other than the Ministry of Defence, are still standing unaltered? The changes in the international security environment that I have in mind include Yugoslavia, the break-up of the Soviet Union, instability in the middle east and the extended role of the United Nations.

I do not believe that a middle-ranking power such as the United Kingdom can now maintain every capability, but I believe that an alliance can. Therefore, the significance of NATO and, in due course, the evolution of a common foreign and security policy within the European Community, is the means by which we may be able to provide the necessary range of capabilities. It was an alliance that met the Soviet threat. Alliances are now necessary to ensure access to the range of capabilities that the changing international situation may well require.

We must acknowledge that the driving force of a European security policy is financial as much as political, as is the reduction of United States forces in Europe. It was commonly believed that "Options for Change" was Treasury-driven, although that has been consistently denied by the Government. However, if, as is popularly believed, something such as "Options II" is taking place, with the purpose of taking £4 billion over the next three years out of the Ministry of Defence budget, that can only be at the imperative of the Treasury, and cannot be the product of a strategic overview or some rational analysis of commitments.

Some weeks ago, Sir Richard Vincent, formerly senior commander in the United Kingdom and now a senior commander with NATO, exhorted the polititians to state what the clear political objectives might be in Yugoslavia before consideration of any commitment to further military resources. He was stating a truism but, like many truisms, it frequently has to be repeated. The same applies in defence policy.

We must have clear political objectives before we can determine what resources are necessary, but we must acknowledge that we do not start with a blank sheet of paper. Previous decisions of previous Governments have an influence over what we may do now, as do political commitments and historical responsibilities. There will always be a temptation to operate at the margin—to delay a particular procurement programme, or to make reductions in personnel, aircrafts or ships at the margin —because that is the easiest way to manage a reduction in defence spending. It is much easier to do it that way than to make difficult choices between, for example, size and quality. In the changing environment, I believe it will become more important for us to consider how we do something rather than how many things we do.

We must explore the question of force specialisation. I do not underestimate the difficulties of embarking on such a project. There would be opposition from the services and the defence industry and there would be political consequences within existing alliances, all of which would be mirrored in countries with which we sought to have a dialogue about force specialisation. It will, however, be essential to move in that direction because the financial compulsion will be overwhelming.

It would be too simplistic, especially in the light of the two opening speeches, to call for a consensus in the House, but we shall need some kind of general domestic political understanding of the direction in which policy is taking us because some of the decisions made will be irreversible. I cite an example which, as it did not happen in this way, might be thought to be neutral. If the Government had cancelled the European fighter aircraft, as they were under some pressure to do, the project would not have been reinstated. It is, therefore, very important that there should be a general domestic understanding of where policies are leading and what the consequences of certain decisions might be, perhaps not today or next year but in five or 10 years.

One matter in which consensus would be highly desirable is that of nuclear deterrence. I have never had any difficulty with the independent nuclear deterrent. I believe that for the foreseeable future it will be necessary for the United Kingdom to maintain it. I also believe, and have often said, that we need four submarines for that deterrent to be constantly available. However, I can see no justification for the deployment of any more warheads on Trident than on the Polaris system which it is to replace. Trident has twice the range, is much more accurate and is capable of being independently targeted.

I am not saying anything that the Minister has not heard me say before if I state that there is no justification for the tactical air-to-surface missile. We may just have persuaded the Government about that, but it is at least still a live issue. The TASM is the product of the old thinking which NATO has abandoned, the product of the doctrine of flexible response, nuclear war fighting, an effort to find a weapon that could cope with the massed tank formations of the Warsaw pact countries as they streamed across the inner German border.

Mr. Brazier: I am following the hon. and learned Gentleman's argument carefully. On that narrow point, what type of deterrent does he think we could provide to a third world dictator—many, some as near as Libya and Algeria, are close to possessing nuclear weapons—without TASM, because Trident would be very difficult to use in a third world scenario?

Mr. Campbell: I must take issue with the hon. Gentleman from a technical point of view. The evidence given to the Select Committee on that topic was that Trident is capable of being used in a sub-strategic role—one missile with one warhead. I do not believe that it is a realistic threat, and I shall tell the hon. Gentleman why in a moment, but if he is anxious to maintain a capability against the threat that he outlines, he could have it with the Trident system. In what circumstances does the hon. Gentleman conceive that the United Kingdom, acting alone without its allies, would consider the independent use of a sub-strategic weapon? I find it difficult to imagine such circumstances. Let me put the question in a slightly different way to reveal the nature of my thinking.

What additional increment of deterrence does the United Kingdom need beyond what is already available within the alliances of which we are a member and which would be provided by our own tactical air-to-surface missile? I cannot conceive that the additionality—to use a rather heavy-handed word which is often used in the Community—is justified.

Mr. Brazier: I understand what the hon. and learned Gentleman says about specialisation and looking within the alliances and I agree with his general point, but he must face the reality that America may not be here for all time. It is essential that at least one European country—it can only be ourselves or France—has the capability to deal with the third world scenario that we are describing. No one is likely to have the political will to use Trident against a third world threat. Trident is invisible. Whereas an aircraft can hover on the edge of a radar screen as a threat, a third world dictator could conceal Trident from his own people.

Mr. Campbell: I fancy that most third world dictators would conceal from their own people an aircraft hovering on the edge of a radar net—I doubt whether they would take prime time in downtown Baghdad to say that several European fighter aircraft were hovering just outside their airspace with tactical air-to-surface missiles.

We must assume—indeed, I am astonished that the hon. Gentleman is not prepared to concede this—that the NATO alliance will continue, and that it will continue as a nuclear alliance. One of the conundrums that we must resolve is the fact that the United States is anxious for Europe to take a greater role in dealing with its own defence but that, whenever it appears that it is more capable of doing so, the United States begins to believe that there may be no justification for remaining on continental Europe. If one is seeking a lock, or a means of binding the United States to Europe, it is more likely to be the nuclear element than anything else.

To proceed as I have outlined, with no more warheads on Trident than on Polaris, would be consistent with our obligations under the non-proliferation treaty and certainly with the NATO doctrine of minimum deterrence or nuclear weapons as weapons of last resort. That is necessarily relevant to the issue of nuclear proliferation, which must surely be the most significant threat to the integrity of the United Kingdom from a nuclear point of view.

I do not believe that the risk is necessarily one of direct attack on the United Kingdom. A nuclear war between two parties in the middle east would have a profound effect on the United Kingdom even if we did not come under direct attack. The non-proliferation treaty must be used to the maximum. We must use diplomatic and economic means, too. I believe that the United Kingdom's good faith would be a potent weapon in the battle against nuclear proliferation.

To some extent, the hon. Member for South Shields covered my next point but it is worth repeating. It is the question of the United Kingdom accepting a moratorium on nuclear testing. There are reports today that the Clinton Administration may be about to resume testing in Nevada. This week, a report from the Clinton Administration is circulating which suggests that there will be nine tests before 1996, of which three are for the United Kingdom.

In answer to questions, the right hon. Member for Epsom and Ewell has made it clear in the past year that the moratorium had no significance for or application to the Trident system. If the United Kingdom is embarking on further tests, the implication is that they are for another warhead. Reports from Washington suggest that, with the three tests, the United Kingdom is seeking to test a redesigned warhead which would be fitted to a new sub-strategic system, either a free-fall bomb to replace the WE177 or, if the option is kept open, a tactical air-to-surface missile. I do not believe that that is in the interests of non-proliferation. Why should tests for the United Kingdom in Nevada be in the national interests of the United States of America?

As the hon. Member for Canterbury (Mr. Brazier) hinted in his intervention, it is time to explore the issue of nuclear co-operation with our allies—the United States and France—all of whom, at one time, have strategic deterrents at sea. It would be possible to achieve an agreement by which, without giving up an independent deterrent, the alliance could maintain a constantly available strategic system. It would require the co-ordination of patrols and the integration of doctrine and procedures. Those are not insurmountable obstacles if we bear in mind the fact that Polaris is already committed to NATO, and that the Trident system will be similarly committed once it is brought into service.

We will be able to make more realistic observations about procurement when we see the scope of the 1993 estimates. Although I do not agree with the hon. Member for Weston-super-Mare (Sir J. Wiggin) about the preference in favour of Devonport—which will hardly surprise him—I certainly agree with him about the EH101. The commitment, as he has rightly pointed out, was several years ago, and it has never been expressly withdrawn. The EH101 seems to fulfil the necessary requirements, and it is a United Kingdom aircraft with great potential for export sales.

There are some principles by which one should determine procurement issues. These are not my original thoughts but the distillation of a recent discussion with other members of the Select Committee on Defence, including the Chairman, the hon. Member for Upminster (Sir N. Bonsor), who is likely to try to catch your eye, Madam Deputy Speaker, later in the debate.

We cannot run a procurement policy in which the Ministry of Defence does not accept that it has a responsibility for the defence-industrial base—a policy in which it is accepted that, while competition is desirable, it should be the subject of intelligent application, not slavish adherence. We should have a procurement policy in which the Government robustly protect the interests of the United Kingdom in joint ventures and, perhaps most significantly, our policy should ensure the best value for money for our troops, not necessarily for the Treasury.

Those are all issues to which we shall return once the 1993 estimates are published when we will be required to focus on all the issues that I have raised and more. I feel that we sometimes deal in abstracts in these debates, whereas the reality is that the defence of the nation and the protection of the United Kingdom's interests requires not only our political contribution on how those interests are to be preserved and that defence to be maintained, but on the skill, courage and loyalty of all three of our services, which are being shown, even as we have this debate, in a number of places throughout the world. We owe it to those men and increasing number of women to show that we are worthy of their commitment.

6.13 pm

Sir Nicholas Bonsor (Upminster): It must be a matter of regret that, in June 1993, we are discussing the defence estimates for 1992—almost a year after they were published and less than a month before the defence estimates for 1993. I know that Ministers are conscious of that and I look forward to our returning to a proper timetable. I hope that the 1994 defence estimates will be published next spring and that we shall be able to return to the system whereby they are published every spring and discussed, at the latest, in the summer.

Much has happened since the 1992 defence estimates were published. I should like briefly to remind the House of some of the more significant changes that have occurred. In the autumn statement last year, several hundred million pounds were sliced off the top of the defence budget for this year and the next two years. That has had a significant impact on our flexibility to respond to additional needs that crop up in the defence sphere and has made it extremely difficult for us to retain the defence capability that we need in an increasingly uncertain world.

Two battalions that had been under threat were reprieved, which was most welcome. Much less welcome was the fact that that was not specifically funded, and the danger is that the £80 million that it will cost will be offset in other ways, to which I shall return later. Although the reprieve is welcome, we are looking for more as the increasing demands of Bosnia and other United Nations commitments throw greater strain on our troops. That cannot be achieved under a defence budget that has no flexibility and is limited to what has already been assessed as today's need.

That is overshadowed by what has happened in Bosnia and by the threat of nuclear proliferation, which so far has been understated in the debate. The shadow Secretary of State read out the careful statement from the Labour party manifesto in what he described as words of almost one syllable. He did not reach a word as long as proliferation because nothing in the Labour party manifesto or in its planned statements dealt with the problem of the spread of nuclear weapons. The manifesto listed countries such as China, France and the United States and said that Labour would not remove our nuclear capability until those countries had done so, but what about the other countries that are now known to have nuclear weapons and the ones that are likely to have them in the near future? I think particularly of the Ukraine, Israel and North Korea, which must pose a serious threat to the stability of that part of the world and, therefore, a long-term threat to Britain and to the interests of our NATO allies.

Mr. Corbyn: Does the hon. Gentleman think that the development of the Trident nuclear missile system, with a fourfold increase in nuclear warheads compared with the existing Polaris system, is not itself an enormous proliferation and, indeed, a breach of the United Nations treaty on the non-proliferation of nuclear weapons?

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: It will not surprise the hon. Gentleman to learn that I do not agree. There is no doubt that Trident is necessary for our security. We cannot take it for granted that the former Soviet Union, in its break-up —[Interruption.] If the hon. Gentleman listened instead of interrupting, he might hear.

Mr. Corbyn: Who is the enemy?

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: The enemy could be any country of the former Soviet Union that is still armed with nuclear weapons. We cannot take it for granted that the currently benign leadership of Russia will continue. Anyone who looks at foreign affairs with the remotest degree of intelligence must accept that. The Ukraine is showing increasing reluctance to surrender its substantial nuclear arsenal to Russia, as it previously agreed. There is the danger of North Korea arming itself with nuclear weapons. There is a large number of nuclear weapons in Israel.

Mr. Cormack: And Iraq.

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: As my hon. Friend says, there is the threat of Iran and Iraq, which are very close to having nuclear weapons. The hon. Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn), who cannot see that we need a substantial nuclear arsenal to counter the threat of proliferation, is like a camel with its head in the sand.

Mr. Corbyn: I thank the hon. Gentleman for giving way again. I do not want to destroy his speech, but the only point that I should like to make in rebuttal is that roughly 170 countries—members of the United Nations—manage to live in peace and security without nuclear weapons, and many of them are not members of any alliance. Cannot the hon. Gentleman grow up and understand that nuclear weapons are a danger and that any firing of a nuclear weapon will spark off the most appalling holocaust that will kill all of us?

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: I find it extremely hard to answer such a fatuous point. The hon. Gentleman must be aware that the NATO alliance has secured peace for western Europe. He says that there is peace throughout the world. I do not know whether he goes—[Interruption.].

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. There have been too many sedentary observations.

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: I am grateful to you, Madam Deputy Speaker. We have had enough of that, and I shall get on with the serious speech that I intended to make.

I shall now deal with some smaller but not insignificant recent events, the first of which is the decision to withdraw from Belize. I believe that that decision is mistaken, not least because, as has been pointed out, Guatemala cannot be considered stable at the moment, and when a country is unstable that must throw doubt on whether any assurances given by the regime of the moment can be relied upon even in the short and medium term.

Our presence in Belize has an enormous value, way beyond the military element. It is welcomed by the Belizeans, by the United States and by the previous Guatemalan Administration—I am waiting to hear what the present Administration feel about it. I believe that, until we decided to withdraw, the United States, the Belizeans and the Guatemalans were all begging us to stay, but now that the Government have decided to withdraw, all those Governments are obligingly falling into line and announcing that of course they understand and they can perfectly well do without us. However, the troops and RAF personnel in that part of the world, and especially the guard ship stationed there, all play a significant role in anti-drugs operations, in bolstering the British presence in central America and in securing peace in that part of the world.

The withdrawal is short-sighted, and my right hon. Friend the Member for Watford (Mr. Garel-Jones), who was until recently Minister of State at the Foreign Office, told other hon. Members and myself when we went to see him that it is all for the sake of saving £9 million a year at most. That figure does not take into account any increased aid that we might feel that we have to give to Belize by way of overseas development grants and so on so as to offset what will be lost by the withdrawal of our troop presence.

I welcome the fact that my right hon. Friends have decided not to withdraw altogether but to maintain Belize as a training area. The Select Committee on Defence will go there in December and when we return I shall report to the House what we find.

Sir Jerry Wiggin: My hon. Friend has left out one important factor—Belize is the only theatre in which British troops receive any training in jungle warfare. This will be the first time since the end of the second world war that no jungle warfare training is available.

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: I did not leave that factor out, because we are not withdrawing from the jungle training element; there will still be jungle training facilities in Belize. However, I doubt whether we have costed the true cost of sending people out to use those facilities and offset it against what we allegedly save by bringing people back regularly. I suspect that the decision represents a frantic effort by the Government to ease the emergency tour plot gap. Clearly, it will do that to some small degree.

The Defence Select Committee was in Cyprus a fortnight ago and I found there, as everywhere else we go, the troops are stretched to the utmost limit. Half our troops stationed at sovereign bases are not at the bases at all, but carrying out emergency tour plot operations in the Falklands. That means that they have had to take their families from this country out to Cyprus, and then promptly abandon them so that they can do a six-month tour in the Falklands, leaving their young wives extremely unsettled in Cyprus, in a strange place in which they do not especially want to be.

That is bad enough, but I am told that at least one unit will have to go away not once but twice during its Cyprus tour. That is an example of the difficulties that our troops face because of the shortage of infantry available to carry out all our tasks in Northern Ireland and elsewhere. My right hon. Friends in Government will have to tackle those problems.

The Select Committee on Defence will keep a close eye on developments in that sphere, and I shall not rest until the emergency tour plot gap is back to the 24 months that is supposed to be the minimum, rather than the 17 months that is the present average and the 10 or 11-month gap that can sometimes occur.

Mr. Wolfson: My hon. Friend was talking about families being abandoned for periods in Cyprus and other places. Does he agree that that has a deleterious effect on morale, and therefore affects a person's decision whether to remain in the services or to get out? Does that not represent a cost to the services to be offset against possible savings?

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: My hon. Friend is right, of course. There is a distinct danger that morale will sink to the point at which we can no longer sustain the kind of troop forces that we need. That is especially important among those with specific skills, such as senior non-commissioned officers. People of that age and rank tend to have young wives and children, and substantial family commitments. When we were in Northern Ireland, we saw evidence of the fact that if too great a stress is put on family life by removing too regularly the man of the house for six months at a time, it is the wife who finally puts her foot down and says, "I cannot put up with this any longer. You must leave the Army and find a better job so that you can be at home." One reason why service men are not leaving in greater numbers is the recession, so I fear that as we come out of recession we shall find it harder to keep troops with the necessary expertise, unless we can put that problem to bed.

Dr. Charles Goodson-Wickes (Wimbledon): Time and again, we have heard Ministers repeating the aspiration for a 24-month interval between tour duties. Has my hon. Friend or the Defence Committee seen any evidence that that aim may be achieved within the draw-down period to 1995?

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: I think that it is common ground that that will certainly not be achieved before 1995, and the Defence Committee has been unpersuaded by the Government's assurances from time to time that things will get better after 1995. I see no evidence in the detailed figures that that will happen, and it will certainly not happen if there are any other demands on our troops in other parts of the world—for example, if we have to increase our forces in Bosnia or honour some other United Nations commitment. I see little prospect of our getting anywhere near a 24-month minimum emergency tour plot gap in the foreseeable future.

I shall now consider how we are getting on with some of the specific points raised in the Select Committee's report on the Statement on the Defence Estimates 1992. I shall concentrate first on equipment. We are still waiting to hear details of the update of the Challenger 1 tank fleet. There have been many promises that Challenger 1 would be upgraded and be close to being as good as Challenger 2, and substantially cheaper. That announcement was made two years ago, and so far as I am aware we are not close to implementing it. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister of State for Defence Procurement will be able to make a statement on that when he replies to the debate.

Likewise, as my hon. Friend the Member for Western-super-Mare (Sir J. Wiggin) said, the EH101 contract was promised by Lord Younger six years ago, and we are no closer to seeing that. It is time that a firm decision was made. I endorse everything that my hon. Friend said about the respective merits of the systems, and I hope that we shall not have to wait even as long as until the end of the year before there is a distinct EH101 contract on the books and we know where we are going. The support helicopter role is critical to any future defence planning for this country, and at the moment we are a long way away from having anything effective in place.

[Sir Nicholas Bonsor]

The Eurofighter, now called the Eurofighter 2000, is apparently on track now. When I last heard how the costings were going, I understood that I was being told that the cost was 13 per cent. lers than that of the original European fighter aircraft; yet when I see figures showing how the costings are going, they rise inexorably, and faster than inflation. I hope that my hon. Friend will enlighten me as to how we are achieving a 13 per cent. saving on the original cost when the true cost of the project is rising at such an alarming speed. I have no doubt that EFA 2000 will be an excellent aircraft, and that we need it, but we must keep proper cost control and make certain that our partners honour their part of the deal, and we are not left holding the baby.

On naval matters, the Upholder class submarine is giving me cause for concern. I am not at all clear what the plans for it are. It is certainly true that we would not order that type now because of the change in the strategic needs for the Navy and the fact that nuclear submarines can fulfil most of the roles. None the less, we have got them and they are first-class submarines. I do not believe that we would get very much for them if we wanted to sell them. I look for some assurances that we will keep the Upholder submarines, keeping at least one of them operational, so that we have the skills necessary to benefit from the particular advantages that diesel submarines offer, with the rest being in a state of "extended readiness"—something on which I have commented before. We should have a diesel submarine fleet available when needed, particularly for coastal work.

With regard to personnel, the Committee has looked very closely at the housing and resettlement programme for those who have been made redundant. I look forward to hearing what further progress has been made on that front. I should also like to hear whether the Herford job centre is to be extended for two years, as we were told it might be. Everything that we have heard about the centre shows that it is doing a magnificent job in helping people who were in Germany to find jobs back home. I hope that the centre will be continued for as long as a need for it is apparent.

Pay is also very important. We have 1·5 per cent. for this year. The pay review body was not allowed to look at the merits of that award. I should like an assurance that it will be given back its remit to set the right level of pay for the armed forces, starting in 1994-95.

We also looked at the transitions work programme—paragraphs 4.23 to 4.25 of our report—and the £1·14 billion allocated in 1991 for new building and refurbishment. The Committee was worried that it was proving difficult to set up the programme within the time allocated and that money could not be rolled forward when it was not used. I should be grateful if my hon. Friend the Minister would tell us how much was spent in 1992-93, whether the unspent balance was brought forward and how the £460 million allocated for this financial year, 1993-94, will be spent. As we said in our second report, either the money must be found to give the members of the services decent accommodation or they must be given more freedom to use their own resources to create it—in my view, that method is grossly underused. We have some magnificent people with magnificent skills in the armed forces, and too often they are prevented, in a way that is quite unnecessary, from using those skills to enhance the standard of their own accommodation. I hope that my hon. Friend will take a close look at that and give me the assurance that I request.

The Committee is concerned that the civilian element of the armed forces is not being run down quite as fast as the sharp-end element. There is nothing very unusual about that. When people are given the task of cutting back, it is most unlikely that they will cut back on themselves first. We were given assurances at our oral session that the civilian cuts would match the sharp-end cuts, but there are still, I believe, 135,000 civilians in the Ministry of Defence. It is by far the largest part that is left of any of the individual services, and I feel that the House would look askance were it to find that the civilian staff were not being run down in proper proportion to the armed forces.

Mr. Rhodri Morgan (Cardiff, West): The Chairman of the Defence Select Committee seems to be categorising all civilian employees of the Ministry of Defence as box-wallahs in Whitehall, as it were, and part of the tail, not the teeth. Most of those civilians are involved in the repair or supply of equipment. I shall come to the role of some of them later, should I be fortunate enough to catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: I can certainly reassure the hon. Gentleman that I do not want to give any false impressions. Of course, the civilians do an invaluable job in our armed forces. None the less, it remains true that the rundown has to be seen to be fair and balanced and the civilian element must be seen to be making the same kind of sacrifice as the rest of the armed forces are asked to make.

Today, we have had announcements about the reserves. I am glad to be able to welcome a great deal of what my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State said. I specifically welcome the assurance that he has given the House as to his personal commitment to ensuring the future of our reserve forces. It is clearly essential, when our regular forces are being run down, that our reserve forces are bolstered. That is the only way in which we shall be able to maintain our long-term capabilities. My right hon. and learned Friend's assurances on that in general terms are most welcome, as is his statement about the widening of the role that can now be played by the Territorial Army and the other reserve forces. The TA has wanted for a long time to be given operational duties in peacetime, and I very much welcome its widened role.

I take some of the points that my hon. Friends have made about the difficulty of getting the detail right. I was pleased that my right hon. and learned Friend said that he was determined to have a consultation period and to make sure that the detail was agreed specifically by those directly concerned in the operation of the new system, so that none of the dangers and pitfalls that could flow from the change, if it were not properly handled, resulted.

I very much welcome my right hon. and learned Friend's statement that the details of the naval and RAF volunteer reserve forces that he has announced today are flexible, and that these are indeed consultation papers and not writ in stone, because I share some of the fears and reservations that have been expressed in the House today as to the consequences of some of the details.

Like my hon. Friend the Member for Gosport (Mr. Viggers), I cannot argue with the logic that says that we cannot have minesweepers which are obsolete and for which there is no proper role. It clearly must be right, therefore, to look again at the role of the Royal Naval Reserve, what sort of vessels it should have and what they should do. However, I am reluctant to accept, without looking at the matter in more detail, that it is right to remove all ships from the RNVR and to say that their only future role will be maintenance or land based, or, in the case of about 500, that they will be attached to Royal Navy regular ships. It seems to me that the RNVR role will be very difficult to maintain, as will the enthusiasm of the people who join it, if they do not have some kind of ships of their own. They need not be terribly expensive—for example, coastal patrol vessels or something small but up to date. In any case, we must look at that matter in detail. There is nothing to be gained by speculation today as to what might be the best way forward on that front.

I wish to make one point about the Royal Air Force volunteer reserve. Today, the Defence Committee went down to the Army Air Corps, where there is a very large TA flying reserve unit; 666 Squadron is made up entirely, as I understand it, of volunteer airmen, and they undertake 28 per cent. of all United Kingdom land force flying commitments that the Army Air Corps undertakes. If that can be done in the Army, why can we not have a flying reserve in the RAF? It is something that most other countries—certainly the United States—have. We have a great many people in civilian life with flying skills, which I am sure could be adapted and used to military advantage, and I do not understand why we have always turned our backs on the idea of looking closely at an RAF flying reserve. I hope that my right hon. and hon. Friends on the Treasury Bench will adopt a more flexible and imaginative attitude to an RAF volunteer reserve than has been shown for several years. [Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Morris): Order.

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: I am sure that the hon. Member for Liverpool, West Derby (Mr. Wareing), who has his back to me, is nevertheless paying attention to every word that I say.

I turn finally to the other report which the Defence Committee tagged as relevant on the Order Paper—our fifth report, which we agreed yesterday and which takes forward the question of Army manpower, in particular infantry numbers. The Government's reply to our second report is attached.

I hope that hon. Members will take the trouble to read the Government's reply to our second report and our further comments because, frankly, I am not happy with the present situation. Some of the answers seemed to me and other members of the Committee to be singularly weak. For example, the Government have claimed that, because the level of forces in Germany is being reduced, our commitments are likewise being reduced in parallel. That is simply not the case, because almost all our troops in Germany are at least double, triple or quadruple hatted.

The fact that our troops will not be in Germany does not mean that they will not still be used on emergency tour plots for United Nations duties, other duties, the rapid reaction corps and so on. The fact that they will no longer be needed in Germany does not mean that we will need fewer soldiers. The fact that they were there in the fore on paper—they were never there in fact, although they were there in paper strength—was a weak reply to our point about infantry numbers.

The same can be said about the emergency tour plot interval to which I have already referred. There is no doubt that we need to retain that as one of the criteria to examine when we assess whether the Army has adequate strength. The Government did not appear to be happy with that in their reply to our second report.

We welcome a broader approach to that matter because, if the emergency tour plot gap is taken globally, it does not reflect the true facts. Indeed, it understates the problems faced by individual soldiers, many of whom are on attachment from one unit to another and, therefore, have a shorter emergency tour plot gap than they would appear to have on paper if they had always served with the unit to which they are appended. I should like to see figures for nights out of bed on a much more specific basis than any that are available at present.

I refer to the add-back of 3,000 which was announced earlier. Of course, that add-back is extremely welcome. When we look at the details, it is difficult to find out exactly how those 3,000 come to exist. There are 1,300 added back for the two battalions and there is no dispute about that. However, if we look further, we discover that the 300 who will do public duty as increments to the guard battalions were already promised before the add-back, so that 300 is double counting. There are another 300 to cover an increase in the establishment of armoured regiments. That was already agreed in the autumn, so once again there appears to be double counting.

It is not clear whether we will reach the level of 119,000 that was promised. I seek an assurance from my right hon. Friends that that will be the case. I ask them clearly to tell the House whether those 119,000 are supposed to last beyond 1995 or whether it is planned to revert to 116,000 after 1995, because there seems to be no sign in any plans of any funding for the additional strength beyond 1995. That covers most of the major points that I wanted to make.

Before I finish, I shall mention the "Panorama" programme on the Atomic Weapons Establishment—in case anyone saw it. That was the most appalling piece of television that I have seen for some time. The programme grossly misled those who watched it. For example, there was a magnificent picture of members of the Committee getting out of their cars and going into Aldermaston. Members of the Committee were not being photographed—it was a lot of slimmer and much fitter gentlemen who leapt out of their cars, or, obviously, a lot of out-of-work actors. They ran from some smart limousines into a building that was alleged to be Aldermaston. In fact, my colleagues and I limped out of a large bus and hobbled gently into Aldermaston. There is no proper comparison at all.

Much more seriously, the programme makers claimed to have seen a leaked document to which the Committee was in the process of agreeing. It is true that the sentence that they produced was accurate. However, they photographed a document which, clearly, was not the report that it was alleged to be, but was a mock-up of a much earlier report from the Committee. Furthermore, I do not believe that the programme makers had seen the Committee's report, because, when it is published, they will find that there is more interesting reading in it than the innocuous sentence that they put in the programme.

[Sir Nicholas Bonsor]

The most significant point is that the programme makers had another actor, who was purported to be a civil servant, announcing that the Committee had been deliberately misled by the Government. I am satisfied that we were not deliberately misled by anyone.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett (Denton and Reddish) rose——

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: I shall give way in a moment.

I accept that there is a reluctance sometimes on the part of people giving evidence to us to disclose everything that we want to know. However, I can assure the House that on that visit there was absolutely no attempt deliberately to deceive the Committee and I am happy to report that to the House. Although there are matters in what we found that we will certainly continue to investigate, I am satisfied that there was no attempt deliberately to mislead the House.

Mr. Foulkes: I also saw the "Panorama" programme. I immediately knew that it was a reconstruction because of the slim figures who were meant to be the members of the Committee. Does the hon. Gentleman agree, nevertheless, that the reconstructions with actors making some serious statements, the Health and Safety Executive official and the person reading a statement by a civil servant, and all the allegations about health and safety, raised some genuine concerns? It is clear from what the hon. Gentleman said that those concerns will be reflected in the report. In the light of all that, is not it unfortunate that the Minister of State for Defence Procurement did not take the opportunity of appearing on "Panorama" and dealing with some of those serious allegations?

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: To deal with the hon. Gentleman's first point, it is right that some of the comments made by the Health and Safety Executive have resulted in further questions that need to be asked. The Committee reviews Aldermaston on an annual basis and we shall continue to do so. We will examine any serious points in detail.

To deal with the hon. Gentleman's second point, my hon. Friend the Minister of State for Defence Procurement was absolutely right not to appear on the "Panorama" programme. I would not have gone anywhere near it. Indeed, I suspect that one of the reasons why the programme came out in the form that it did was that the request by the programme makers to be allowed to accompany us into Aldermaston was turned down unanimously by all members of the Committee. I do not think that the "Panorama" report was fair, accurate or properly researched. I hope that that answers the hon. Gentleman's question.

I have detained the House long enough. I have been the Chairman of the Committee for almost a year. I thank my colleagues on the Committee, all of whom work much harder than other hon. Members would undoubtedly give us credit for. It has been a useful year and I look forward to continuing the work of the Committee. I especially thank the staff who have worked extraordinarily hard to produce good and well-constructed reports for the Committee to vet and table in the House. The work that is done by the staff of the Select Committee on Defence and, indeed, all Select Committees is something to which the House should pay great tribute.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett (Denton and Reddish): I too watched the "Panorama" programme, which seemed to raise a whole series of quesions that should be answered. I hope that the Committee's report, when published, will answer some of them.

It seems a little ironic that, increasingly, television programmes suggest that Government Departments and others are misleading people, yet the programme makers do not stick to what seems to be a basic principle—that they should make it clear that they are using library film from the past or reconstructions. It would be simple to show that at the bottom of the screen. If the programme makers expect other people to tell the truth, they should do the same.

There is an odd contrast in the House tonight between now and what happened earlier. During Treasury questions, there was a great deal of scrutiny of public expenditure and the Government's willingness to examine in great detail how much money is being spent on things such as invalidity benefit.

When we turn to defence, the Government's approach is wholly different. My hon. Friend the Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark) gave a long list of cases of mismanagement in which the Government seem able to throw money at problems without the same scrutiny. If we want good defence forces, as I am sure we all do, it is important that we exercise the same level of scrutiny over expenditure on them as over all other Government expenditure.

I turn now to the way in which the armed forces have reviewed the pay office. Part of it is within Tameside, in which part of my constituency falls. There was considerable concern at the Government's decision to centralise the pay office. I understand the Government's logic in saying that it is better for civilians to deal with pay. It is also logical to deal with it in one office rather than in five or six centres around the country. However, it is odd that the Government did not think through the whole process from the beginning.

The Government started to civilianise the activity in a series of different centres, and then centralised it in one place. To have recruited people for the past two years to the Ashton office, admittedly to process allowances rather than pay, and then, part way through the recruitment process, to announce that a new national centre was being considered alarmed my constituents.

Obviously, Tameside council was particularly concerned at the possibility of losing jobs from the area. My right hon. Friend the Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Sheldon) and other Members representing Tameside made representations to the Government. The right hon. Member for Epsom and Ewell (Mr. Hamilton) kindly saw the deputation. We were courteously received and the council made a good presentation.

However, part way through the presentation, it became clear that the Government wanted not a new site but an existing building. Sadly, Tameside could not find a new building for the pay office. We left a little disappointed, but, as representatives of Greater Manchester, we were well aware that there were many other empty offices in the area.

Rightly, Roy Oldham, the leader of Tameside council, got in touch with other leaders of councils in Greater Manchester, and eventually the alternative of Europa house in Stockport was proposed. We submitted the proposal and, much to our surprise, the Government, having half decided that the office would go to Glasgow, announced that they were having second thoughts and were considering the proposal.

Mr. Archie Hamilton indicated assent.

Mr. Bennett: I am glad to see the right hon. Gentleman's agreement that I am giving a fair precis of events.

There was considerable concern among the people who worked in Ashton when, at the Scottish Conservative party conference, it was announced that the office would go to Scotland. It seems to me and the stewards concerned that, despite what was supposed to be a financial appraisal of the situation, suddenly a political decision was made. I do not complain if decisions are made on the basis of wheeler-dealing and politics, but I am concerned when it is claimed that decisions are made purely on economic grounds, and it seems to me that the present proposals are not based on economic grounds.

I particularly want to raise with the Minister the problem facing many of my constituents who work in the pay office. They have been told that they can relocate to Glasgow but often their spouse also works. Indeed, by the nature of the pay levels, it is likely that both members of the household would work.

It is not much use to offer one member of the household the opportunity to relocate to Glasgow if it means that the other must give up a job. If it is necessary to recruit extra staff for the relocated office, if it eventually ends up in Glasgow, the Government should consider offering the new jobs first to the spouses of people who may be able to relocate if both could get jobs. Otherwise, the offer of relocation and of paying for people to move is an empty gesture. I am not satisfied that the relocation of the pay office to Scotland is the most effective use of resources.

Today, the Stonewall Trust has been in touch with me. It is concerned about a document it refers to as "Defense Counsel Instructions ICRM 2/87", which is supposed to deal with the question of homosexuals in the armed forces. The debate on this issue in the United States has not been particularly helpful, but if what the Stonewall Trust suggests in that document is correct, we are dealing with the issue in an even more squalid way here. Will the Minister ensure that there is a copy of the document in the Library so that Members can look at it? It may be more appropriate to deal with the issue in the debate on discipline in the armed forces late on Monday night.

The hon. and learned Member for Fife, North-East (Mr. Campbell) raised the question of nuclear tests. It is amazing that the Secretary of State could go through a long speech without mentioning that matter. I understand that we are in direct negotiations with the United States of America on whether we can carry out three more nuclear tests. If we are in favour of the non-proliferation of nuclear weapons, the sooner we have an effective worldwide test ban, the better.

We have a moratorium which includes most of the countries involved. It is sad if there is pressure on the United States to start testing again. The danger is that, if the United States starts testing again, it will give an excuse to people in Russia and elsewhere who would like to carry out further tests. Certainly, some of the stories coming out of the old Soviet Union about the state of some areas where nuclear tests were carried out make it clear that it would be sad if more tests were carried out there.

There is no justification for it. We are told that President Clinton is proposing to Congress six further American tests and three further British tests. I do not know whether it is correct, but we are told that the Americans need to test the reliability of existing weapons. I cannot see why that is necessary. If they say that they will sign up to a comprehensive test ban treaty, there should now be sufficient scientific ways of verifying that weapons can do what they are supposed to do. Therefore, the tests are not needed.

Our argument is that we want not to verify the reliability of our existing weapons, but to develop the possibility of a new weapon of some sort or a modified form of the WE177. That is wholly in contravention of the non-proliferation treaty. I thought that we had signed it on the basis that we would not seek a new set of nuclear weapons.

It would be sad if the Americans agreed to start testing again. It would be particularly sad if they allowed us to carry out three tests, not to verify the reliability of our old weapon systems, but to develop a new system. If it is legitimate for Britain to plead that it needs a new system, surely it is legitimate for all sorts of other countries to plead the same. That would lead to the spread of those weapons. I therefore plead with the Government to stop begging the Americans to let us conduct more tests. Let us accept that, for the future of the world, no further nuclear tests are necessary.

We have Trident. Used with one warhead, it represents a sub-strategic nuclear deterrent. We do not need a new free-fall bomb. Let us say that, if we are to continue with nuclear weapons, the Trident system is sufficient, remembering that it can be modified for a sub-strategic role. In other words, we can stop wasting money on the development of more nuclear weapons.

I have always argued that we should go further and make it clear that, for non-proliferation purposes, we can do without nuclear weapons. In any event, let us say once and for all that we do not intend to put extra warheads on Trident missiles. The level of nuclear weapons we have, including Polaris missiles, is more than enough to provide us with a deterrent.

Given all the problems that exist on the Aldermaston production line, if we were committed to producing far fewer warheads, it might be easier to improve safety and production facilities there. We must consider decommissioning our Polaris and other nuclear submarines.

The way in which we are cutting expenditure on defence is bound to be causing distress to the defence industries. That is why we must search for alternative jobs for those who are, or have been, employed in those industries. If the Government will not agree with some of the Opposition's proposals for the alternative use of large numbers of people involved in the defence industries, they should at least consider decommissioning old nuclear submarines and the creation of new jobs.

We must give greater thought to the ways in which arms are proliferating worldwide. Particularly frightening are the number of arms from eastern Europe and the old Soviet Union that are being sold. As the hon. Member for Western-super-Mare (Sir J. Wiggin) pointed out, there are 28 wars going on in the world. The more we can reduce the quantity of second-hand arms being sold, the safer the world will become. Perhaps we might consider buying some of those arms and dismantling them. That would be a better use of our money than some of the other activities that we are undertaking.

A sad aspect of not having a comprehensive review is that we have not examined the need for defence land in this country. I have often referred to this subject. The Ministry of Defence still argues that it needs more land for training purposes. Although I do not believe that that claim can be sustained, a proper view would enable us to see how much defence land is being used for training and whether more could be released, in this crowded island, for the public to enjoy for recreational purposes.

Considerable parts of the north Pennines are no longer being used for manoeuvres. As a result of past exercises, many unexploded weapons must be dealt with. I hope that they can be cleared out of the way and the land made available for recreational use.

I pay tribute to my many constituents who served with the Cheshires in Bosnia. It is important for us to carry out humanitarian roles in the world. They worked in extremely difficult circumstances, and we can be proud of the way in which they carried out their duties. We can be equally proud of those who replaced them.

7.3 pm

Mr. Archie Hamilton (Epsom and Ewell): I am grateful to the Secretary of State for the kind remarks that he made about me and my service at the Ministry of Defence. It was a great pleasure for me to work with my right hon. and learned Friend and my fellow Ministers. I also thank the hon. and learned Member for Fife, North-East (Mr. Campbell) for his kind remarks.

I congratulate the Minister of State, who now has what I consider to be the best job in Government. He is ideally qualified for it. He has already had some experience of working in Northern Ireland with our troops, and the fact that he brings his expertise as an accountant to his tasks at the Ministry of Defence will prove useful to him when he looks hard at some of the investment appraisals that are put before him. I am sure that he will find the job as enjoyable as I found it.

I shall concentrate on the major argument over defence expenditure, which is the balance between resources, capabilities and commitments. Traditionally, in the days when the United Kingdom was positively threatened by the Warsaw pact, we began our consideration of the position with the commitments that we needed to defend these islands. Those commitments were, in great measure, tied up with our membership of NATO and the joint security that we received by co-operating with our allies. In addition, we had overseas commitments, so we worked backwards and considered how much money we should spend on defence.

As the Secretary of State pointed out, we spend about £24 billion on defence. A similar amount is spent by the Germans and French. We must not overlook the fact that their economies are larger than ours, so as a percentage of the gross national product, they are spending less than we are. I have no argument with the size of the defence budget. There are good reasons why we spend such a large sum on defence, not least because we have a nuclear deterrent and continue to have a number of overseas commitments. We also have professional forces, and they have proved themselves to be—for example, in the Gulf—most effective.

Nor should we overlook the fact that we are living this year with a public sector borrowing requirement of £50 billion. It is therefore unrealistic to expect us to spend more on defence than we are spending today. Here I question the attitude of my hon. Friend the Member for Upminster (Sir N. Bonsor), the Chairman of the Select Committee, who has constantly criticised decisions that the Government have taken. For example, he criticised the addback of two battalions and the fact that the increase in numbers of 3,000 was not funded.

There is no way in which any change in defence will be funded by extra money from outside, and it is unrealistic to expect otherwise. If we are to address the defence budget as a whole and claim that certain measures should be taken to increase our capabilities, we must find the money from within the defence budget. It would be unrealistic to consider the problem in any other way. The fixed point from which we should operate is that represented by the resources that are available.

What are we trying to achieve from our defence expenditure? It is important not to forget that the primary purpose of that expenditure is the defence of the United Kingdom. I am the first to acknowledge that the threat to this country has receded dramatically. The Soviet Union no longer exists, and the Warsaw pact has disintegrated. There are good reasons for thinking that the threats to Britain today are minimal.

But it is impossible to forecast the future, and we do not know what threats will emerge. For example, it is difficult to foresee where Russia will go—whether democracy will hold there, or whether it will become more threatening to its European neighbours—so the second priority of defence must be to keep our capabilities. That is a very expensive business indeed. I should be distressed if, because of other pressures in defence, we started to lose capabilities, such as our ability to wage anti-submarine warfare.

Anti-submarine warfare is no longer a great defence priority; Russian submarines are patrolling much less frequently, so the need to try to find them has radically reduced. We do not know, however, about future submarine deployment. We know very well that other countries are buying submarines, so we may be faced with great threats that we cannot foresee. I would be extremely concerned if we lost our anti-submarine warfare capability.

The Navy and the Air Force have great air defence capability—for example, the low-level bombing capability of the Tornado GR1s. Such capability is critical for the defence of the United Kingdom and that of our interests elsewhere.

We should remember that, when we talk about commitments, we are talking not about our commitment to defend the United Kingdom, but about our commitments to try to bring peace to different parts of the world and those to the United Nations. Our commitments are like a piece of string—they are as long as one wants to make them.

It is widely acknowledged that British troops are probably the best in the world. They are undoubtedly the best to undertake a peace-keeping, peace-making operation, because their experience in Northern Ireland enables them to deal with extremely difficult situations.

That is why they were described in Bosnia by a well-known reporter as being "stunningly" the best troops on the ground.

Everyone wants British troops to play a role in the world, but we must limit our commitments, or they could serve in an unlimited number of theatres of war. Mention has already been made of the 28 different conflicts that are now going on. Are we to be involved in all of them? If so, our troops will be overstretched.

We must meet commitments according to our available resources. The defence budget of £24 billion will not increase. I certainly would not advocate, however, that it should be reduced dramatically. It is essential that we maintain our capabilities because, by the nature of defence, they are an insurance policy. We must, however, consider carefully the commitments that we may be asked to fulfil.

My hon. Friend the Member for Upminster criticised the decision to withdraw troops from Belize. If we do not constantly review our commitments, we will operate a ratchet—our troops will be sent all over the world. My right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State referred to Cyprus, where British troops have been stationed for the past 25 years. For some reason it is not possible to share the United Nations commitment in Cyprus with anyone else, but we have, finally, reduced the number of troops serving there.

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: I do not disagree in principle with my right hon. Friend, but he is slightly contradicting his own theme. He has told the House that we should assess our defence needs and act accordingly. In almost the next breath, however, he said that he considered that the budget of £24 billion was the one within which we must operate. Surely that must mean that we will have to cut our cloth to suit the financial limit that my right hon. Friend has artificially imposed upon it.

I accept that we must review our commitments regularly, but we are a member of the United Nations Security Council and we have enormous responsibilities in that role. Our international status and standing depends to a great extent on the magnificent work of our armed forces. My right hon. Friend should accept that we must have a degree of flexibility in a changing world. One cannot allow a Treasury ceiling of £24 billion to be the controlling factor on the size of our forces.

Mr. Hamilton: I am glad that my hon. Friend has raised that point, because that is the nub of my argument with him. It is totally unrealistic to expect any more money for the defence budget. A major outside threat to the security of the United Kingdom would have to arise for that budget to be increased. I do not foresee that happening in the next 10 years. It is therefore unlikely that the defence budget will increase beyond £24 billion. We must accept that figure and work back from it. The result is a tremendous pressure on commitments.

It is interesting to consider who is contributing to the operations in Bosnia. The French, the Canadians, the British and the Spanish have sent troops, but none of our other European partners have done so. For some reason, they seem to believe that the conflict does not involve them. We are being asked to carry an unfair burden. We should remember that one is never paid the full costs of deploying troops on behalf of the UN, so that costs the Exchequer money. We must ensure that our European partners play a larger role in the peace-keeping operation, especially if it is considered to be a European one.

We should not forget our major peace-keeping operation in Northern Ireland. That operation takes up 19,000 troops, many of whom are rotated and are part of the emergency tour plot, to which my hon. Friend the Member for Upminister referred. For every one battalion in Northern Ireland, one must decide whether one needs four or five others to ensure that the rotation works.

We must take a hard look at our other commitments. I am sure that my hon. Friend the Member for Upminster would acknowledge that our undertaking in Bosnia contributes to the pressures on the emergency tour plot. It is another arduous commitment.

Quite apart from the pressures on the British Army, I believe that there is no military solution to the problems of Bosnia. The military can only operate there as long as they have the basic agreement of the warring factions to do so. The second that we try to impose our will on those factions by military means, we will be drawn into a civil war. I do not want to talk about numbers, because there is no limit on the number of troops who could be sent to Bosnia. That would only mean that we were drawn into a long, bloody war, which ultimately we would lose.

We must try to disabuse people of the idea that all that needs to be done is to use air power to shoot up a few Serbian artillery positions. They believe that that would result, somehow, in a change in Serbian attitudes. That attitude would change—for a week. The Serbs would then regroup and change tactics.

We must never forget that Yugoslav defence under Tito was based on guerrilla tactics. The plan was to withdraw to the mountains and use weapons kept in massive underground arsenals, which still exist, mostly in Serbian areas. The plan was to harry any Russian attack—that is what the Yugoslavs were worried about—from guerrilla positions in the mountains.

There is no way in which we can impose a military solution on Bosnia, and there are great dangers in thinking that we can. We have done a magnificent job of distributing aid under the present system. That has been achieved on the basis of the warring factions accepting the presence of our troops and not regarding them as the enemy. If we start thinking that, by reinforcing our troops, we can impose our will, we will be faced with an extremely disappointing reaction.

I thank my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary and my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Defence for having kept us out of Bosnia. Long may that continue.

7.18 pm

Mr. Ken Maginnis (Fermanagh and South Tyrone): I am always pleased to have the opportunity to speak in this debate, not least because it enables me to pay tribute to our security forces for the magnificent job that they do throughout the world, but particularly in my part of the United Kingdom—Northern Ireland.

I am privileged to have first-hand experience of the work that the Army does, both in and out of uniform. I never cease to marvel at the restraint that our security services display in the most difficult circumstances. But of course, Northern Ireland is not, as we have heard this afternoon, the only place in which the security forces face great danger.

We have just listened to the right hon. Member for Epsom and Ewell (Mr. Hamilton) speak about the Bosnian conflict. I want to mention the Royal Irish Regiment, which served as part of the force in Bosnia at the time that the Cheshire Regiment was there. It is sometimes forgotten that the Royal Irish Regiment has played a vital role in Bosnia.

My colleagues and I have a deep concern about our forces in Bosnia. We have been unable to detect any coherent policy governing how those forces might be able to protect themselves. We know that there is a fluid situation in Bosnia, and that it is hard to lay down specific terms under which our security services can operate. But it is wrong and dangerous for our soldiers to have to appear to improvise in situations such as occurred recently when British forces were protecting a large Muslim convoy.

When one hears of our soldiers being disarmed, one waits in trepidation for a real tragedy. Already, our forces in Bosnia have been forced to open fire. Yet we know that they are not there in adequate numbers to protect themselves in a similar situation. I fear an occasion when our forces will be overwhelmed, and I dread hearing each day about the situation in which they find themselves.

My party supports our nation's contribution to and participation in United Nations' operations. But that should not mean that we require our soldiers to operate in limbo. Nor should participation oblige us to guarantee further reinforcements for Bosnia. There are more wealthy nations than Britain which are not playing their part, and far too much of the burden has fallen upon our own forces.

It is always a grave matter to commit one's security services to a theatre of open warfare. It should not be done —humanitarian considerations notwithstanding—without a clearly defined military objective and adequate military competence in terms of their self-defence.

I listened to what the right hon. Member for Epsom and Ewell said. I agree with him that we cannot force the warring factions in Bosnia into submission. The point that I am making is different. If our forces are providing humanitarian assistance, we have a responsibility to ourselves and to those forces that I do not believe has been met.

I was particularly pleased, and I know that the voluntary reserves will be pleased, to hear what the Secretary of State said about their opportunities to volunteer again for active service. But I have considerable sympathy with the hon. Member for Canterbury (Mr. Brazier), who rightly speaks against the need for the reserves to have to volunteer twice. That is patent good sense. We all know the first thing that happens when one volunteers and gets into uniform—one is encouraged never to volunteer for anything again.

A country with a finite defence budget should not be paying for the training of what is hopefully that very small number of volunteers who will always depend on others to respond in an emergency. Under the Secretary of State's arrangement, they could enjoy an exciting social and—irrespective of what some hon. Members may think—tolerably well paid hobby without any real commitment.

I do not want what I have said to reflect on the vast majority of volunteers who have a solid commitment, but we know from experience that there are those who do not share that commitment. Under the Secretary of State's new arrangement, I believe that that problem will increase.

The hon. Member for Weston-super-Mare (Sir J. Wiggin) was more pessimistic, but I believe that worldwide conflict is unlikely to occur again within our lifetime on a scale that might have been expected no longer than four or five years ago. The likelihood of less widespread conflicts means that there is unlikely to be massive mobilisation. The volunteer reserves will not be called up in great numbers. Hence, a real and tangible obligation on every volunteer must be retained within the Secretary of State's arrangement for the reserves.

I shall briefly return home, to the situation in Northern Ireland. "Options for Change" specified the need to amalgamate the Royal Irish Rangers and the Ulster Defence Regiment. That caused considerable misgivings in Northern Ireland. My party and I as the person with responsibility to speak defence, looked carefully at the proposal and we saw many benefits for Northern Ireland in such an amalgamation. If the Royal Irish Rangers had been lost, Northern Ireland would have been left, for the first time in hundreds of years, with no tangible and total integration within the military system of the United Kingdom. We would have been left without a line regiment.

The leader of my party and I went to the right hon. Member for Epsom and Ewell, and discussed the amalgamation at some length. I received assurances that, when the amalgamation had taken place, the Ulster Defence Regiment as it was, or the Royal Irish Regiment as it is, would not be interfered with again, and there would be a period of stabilisation for at least a year. Unfortunately, the Ministry of Defence did not effectively get that message across to the General Officer Commanding and other senior officers in Northern Ireland.

The amalgamation was meat and drink to the armchair generals; those who have the ability to undermine the confidence of the people of Northern Ireland it signalled the diminution of the effectiveness and the size of what had been the Ulster Defence Regiment. Among sensible people, there was certainly a feeling that at least the part-time element within the regiment would be run down. That did not help matters.

A broken promise, even if it is done with the best intentions or through necessity, will diminish the confidence of certain sections of our community in Northern Ireland, and that section of the community will begin to look elsewhere for its protection against terrorism.

I do not want to exaggerate, but to some extent the present unease within what is loosely termed the loyalist population derives from the fact that people are not assured of their protection. It does not matter what we say or how often we tell them, they see things in practical terms. They see the diminishing of the part-time element within the Royal Irish Regiment, and they start to be afraid and wonder whether they should seek protection elsewhere.

The Minister must quickly ensure that the regiment, and particularly the part-time element, is sustained. One of the immediate ways he can do that is by finding a means of recruiting to the officer corps within the regiment, as it has been neglected.

It is a problem of 23 years of continuous service. The first paragraph of page 27 of the "Statement on the Defence Estimates" relates to the amalgamation:

"A major objective is to create in the home service battalions an even more professional, effective and flexible security force, operating in support of the RUC and in the interests of the whole community in Northern Ireland."

I suggest that the person who wrote that is extremely naive. What better professionalism, effectiveness and flexibility in terms of security can anyone show than to survive 24 hours a day, seven days a week, year in, year out, for the past 23 years in the face of determined terrorism with no rest and relaxation and no respite at home, at work in one's civilian job or on duty? That is what we face in Northern Ireland.

Unfortunately, serving officers are being marginalised because they cannot do the battle training course or the assault courses the way they could 23 years ago when they first joined the regiment. Very few of their duties require assault course soldiery. They have to be mentally alert and place themselves directly between the terrorists and the ordinary law-abiding community and carry out their duties without alienating the extremely sensitive community in Northern Ireland.

It is wrong to say that, to make the Royal Irish Regiment home battalions more professional, they have to become Royal Marines, paratroopers or Royal Anglians. They need the confidence to continue on a day-to-day basis to do what they have done effectively for the past 23 years.

If the Minister will take note of what I have said and will consider the desperate need to recruit able young men to lead the regiment as we need officers, he will be doing a service to the military in general, because the Royal Irish Regiment plays a very important part in the day-to-day security of Northern Ireland. He will also be doing a particular favour to the people of Northern Ireland, for which they I can assure him will be more than grateful.

Mr. Patrick Cormack (Staffordshire, South): I am sure that the House listened with respect to the honourable and gallant Member for Fermanagh and South Tyrone (Mr. Maginnis). I deliberately use that traditional form of address because he is an honourable and gallant Gentleman. I am sure that my hon. Friend the Minister will have listened to his speech with respect and with careful attention because he spoke from the heart and with great knowledge and obviously he must be taken extremely seriously.

The hon. Gentleman ended his speech on a parochial note. I shall begin on one. The last time that we debated defence in the House, my county regiment, the Staffordshire Regiment, was under threat. I am delighted to take this opportunity to pay tribute to the Secretary of State for Defence and to my right hon. Friend the Member for Epsom and Ewell (Mr. Hamilton) for at long last listening to the pleas which we made time and again from the moment when that ill-advised merger with the Cheshires was announced until finally my right hon. Friend came to the Dispatch Box and announced that the regiment was reprieved. It was most frustrating for me as I was off sick that day and could not respond. But I can do now and say how glad I am.

I have rarely been more moved or impressed than I was when I went in April with the hon. Member for Walsall, South (Mr. George) to a special lunch put on by the Staffords to say thank you to those who had campaigned in Parliament and outside. One met there a group of young men who were remarkably dedicated. They were thorough professionals in the best sense of that word. I was not only thrilled that the Staffords had been reprieved, which was absolutely right and necessary, but I also saw those young men—officers and men—as the very epitome of British manhood.

There are few institutions in this country today that are regarded with unreserved pride and admiration. This place is not always held up for the admiration that it might be. There are very few in the professions who are regarded with unrelieved and unreserved pride. But I know very few people who have anything other than respect and admiration for our armed forces; for the professionalism and dedication with which they perform the most difficult of tasks, for the quiet, understated and restrained courage and bravery that they invariably display, which we have seen so graphically demonstrated in Bosnia in recent months. It is good to begin by paying that tribute.

I am sorry that my right hon. Friend the Member for Epsom and Ewell is not here. He explained to me that he had to leave and he knew that I would be referring to him. But it is a pity to approach any defence debate from the point of view of Treasury figures. The absolute overriding duty of any Government, regardless of its political complexion, is to secure the defence of the realm. Our armed forces are second to none.

My right hon. Friend referred to a reporter. It was Kate Adie. I was in the Committee Room when she talked about the bravery and professionalism of our British soldiers and said quite unashamedly that no one could hold a candle to them. If one accepts that we are singularly fortunate in having such brilliant armed forces, always the arm of civil power and never anything else, and if one accepts that it is the overriding duty of any Government to secure the defence of the realm and its interests, one cannot and must not begin with a figure and fit everything within that figure.

Of course I was as delighted as anyone in the House at the end of the cold war; at the demise of the monolithic communist bloc. But I am as aware as anyone in the House that those old monolithic dangerous certainties have been replaced by something perhaps even more dangerous. Already it has been referred to this afternoon. Where once the Soviet Union existed as a monolithic nuclear power, regimented and controlled, there are now four nuclear powers, not very well regimented and controlled.

The danger implicit in that for the fragile peace of the world, a danger compounded by the fact that, within the decade, we may well see Iran and Iraq as nuclear powers, should make anyone realise that it is essential not to be dictated to by figures when one comes to work out the defence budget and the defence of the realm.

The Conservative party has much to be proud of in the way in which it has sustained the defence of this realm. We have a great deal to be proud of in the leading role that we have enabled our country to play in NATO during the past 14 years and before. But we must recognise—this was referred to in an intervention by my hon. Friend the Member for Upminster (Sir N. Bonsor), who is Chairman of the Defence Select Committee—that Britain is a great power. It is a leading member of NATO. It is, after all, one of five permanent members of the Security Council. It is a member of the Group of Seven, the most important economic nations in the world. It has an important and pivotal role in the European Community.

Whichever way one looks at it, Britain is a great power and that brings with it responsibilities. I should like to make that the background of some remarks about a subject that has cropped up in every speech—the situation in the former Yugoslavia. I make no apology for raising that yet again. The House is a little fuller than it was at 3.30 am one cold December morning in 1991 when we first debated the situation in the former Yugoslavia. It was the first time that the House had discussed it.

To say "the House" is perhaps a slight exaggeration. I was here, as was my right hon. and learned Friend the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office. The hon. Member who had the next debate on the Consolidated Fund was here, sleeping gently on a Back Bench somewhere. Mr. Deputy Speaker was in the Chair because Mr. Speaker Weatherill had had the good sense to go to bed. Someone was reporting from Hansard and I think that two people were asleep in the Public Gallery, and that was it.

Mr. Irvine Patnick (Lords Commissioner to the Treasury): And a Whip.

Mr. Cormack: And a Whip.

I make that point because I want to say that at that time I and a number of others were saying that if only a united and resolute show of forceful resistance to what was going on in Yugoslavia were made, the problems that were then occurring in Dubrovnik—it was then a Croatian problem—would probably have been brought to an end and there probably would not have been an outbreak in Bosnia. What was needed, of course, was not massive forceful intervention, but a naval and air blockade. If they had been instituted we might have avoided all the carnage and horror and all the rape and distress that has followed since.

We must recognise that what has happened in the former Yugoslavia during the past 18 months is an indictment of the western powers, and the European powers in particular. Yes, we triumphantly won the cold war. Yes, it was a stunning victory. But in the first real test in this new disordered order that replaced those old certainties to which I have referred, we have failed.

There is no point in rescuing our reputations merely by heaping much-deserved praise on the troops. Yes, our troops have discharged themselves with marvellous fortitude and bravery. I have already referred to that. That no one can gainsay. But it is no good a politician saying that that is wonderful and all is right, because it is not. There has been a lack of cohesion and a failure to respond. An uncertain message has been sent about the effectiveness of the United Nations and of the European Community in dealing with such a crisis. The message that that conveys to warlords in many countries and to those who might become warlords in many parts of the Soviet Union is fraught with dire danger for us all.

There are various things that we can and should do. On 25 May I tabled, with the support of several of my hon. Friends, early-day motion 2082, which refers to the background to our failure and to the Washington accord, which had just been signed. We said that we had no confidence in that agreement.

"because it recognises, and thus rewards, unprincipled and brutal aggression and offers neither adequate protection nor reasonable hope to the victims of the worst crimes against humanity since World War Two."

I commend that motion to right hon. and hon. Members in all parts of the House because it sets out the position fairly well and makes the point that, with each failure, the situation has become more difficult to deal with. Something that began as an act of Serbian regression and that was not a true civil war has degenerated into a civil war, with Muslim and Croat fighting each other.

I have never advocated and I do not advocate massive ground involvement and unnecessarily putting lives at risk. However, I may say in parenthesis that when one talks to young men in the Staffordshire and in other British Army regiments, they say some very sobering things. I asked one group what they would do if they were sent to Bosnia. They replied, "We joined up to serve, and if we are sent we will go. We only hope that we will not have one hand tied behind our back, like our mates in the Cheshires." One of them said, "Sometimes, you get killed—but if you didn't recognise that, you would not join the Army any more than a young man would join the police." It is not that they court disaster and danger, but they know that it is there. I regret the emotive talk about body bags and so on, but I have never advocated mass ground involvement.

What can be done now? We can make one last supreme effort to get the parties together, but we can only do that successfully if the Serbs in particular know—although this applies now to the Croats also to a degree—that we are prepared to take more punitive action than the mere imposition of sanctions. One tragedy of the situation has been the invalidation by ourselves of the doctrine of deterrent. For many years we taught that one deterred by having something that one was prepared to use. In the case of the Serbs, we signalled from the word go that we would not use force of any sort against them. We should have kept them guessing and we should have been resolute. Hence my advocacy from the beginning of an air and naval blockade.

I do not know whether we can rescue from that carnage and despair something identifiable as a nation. We recognised it as a sovereign nation and we still do—its president was with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs at the beginning of this week. Some 200,000 people, and perhaps as many as 250,000, have died, and 2·5 million have been displaced. The statistics are overwhelming in their grotesque horror.

We can and must draw a lesson from that appalling catastrophe—that the old philosophy of NATO does not apply in the new world order. We have talked of rapid reaction and deployment and of fire brigade-type operations and forces. We must develop a new strategy to deal with situations which are far short of the threat of a world war but which are perhaps the beginning of cancerous conflicts that can destroy a nation. It is essential that we establish a group of Ministers from each of the NATO countries who should meet over the next few months, charged with the job of working out a strategy for the new, disordered world order.

Britain has a remarkable contribution to make in that context, based on the brilliance of our armed forces, long traditions and ability to react. That tradition has never been and should not now be dictated to by Treasury figures. Of course, harsh decisions must be made on public expenditure—every right hon. and hon. Member recognises that—but the last thing to be cut should be that on which we all ultimately depend, which is the safety and security of the realm and its interests, which depend fundamentally on effective armed forces.

I was disturbed when I listened to my hon. Friend the Member for Upminster speak about the findings of his Select Committee, the length between tours that our troops are obliged to observe, and the young women in Cyprus who were left behind while their husbands went to the Falklands. I know that my hon. Friend the Minister of State for Defence Procurement is a man of sensitivity and imagination. I hope that he, too, was disturbed and will consider carefully the implications.

I hope also that my hon. Friend the Minister above all realises that real imagination and vision is called for in dealing with the problems that now beset us. I make no apology for giving my hon. Friend a boost and plug, because earlier this year he published one of the most remarkable, successful, well-written and brilliantly researched biographies of any living political figure. I refer to my hon. Friend's biography of Nixon. I read every word of it because I had to review it and I thought that it was excellent.

My hon. Friend the Minister analysed a man who, whatever his domestic and personal shortcomings, was in the international sense a colossus. We lack a colossus on the international stage at the moment. Perhaps my hon. Friend, through his important place in the Government and close proximity to my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, will be able to play a part in fashioning just such another colossus because—by jove—we need leadership of that high order now in this dangerous world. If we are to supply it, or help to supply it from this country, we cannot do it with a defence budget that is so Treasury-dominated that real emergencies are neglected and real contingencies cannot be met.

Mr. Andrew Welsh (Angus, East): The hon. Member for Staffordshire, South (Mr. Cormack) spoke with his usual sense and honesty in probing beyond NATO into a much more complex world. Such searching after the truth will pay dividends. The hon. Gentleman began by hailing his success in retaining his local regiment, and he is justly proud of its history and traditions. Such things simply cannot be bought, and the hon. Gentleman will sympathise with and understand the Scottish view of our regiments and their importance within Scottish culture and the Scottish way of life.

The cliche that we live in a rapidly changing world has now proved absolutely true. Cataclysmic events of historic significance have seemed to pile up over the past few years; only now have we an opportunity to stop and take stock of the significance of what has happened. The old, ultimate cold war opponent has disappeared, to be replaced by a multiplicity of potential trouble spots. Problems of an entirely different nature have arisen throughout the world. In that context, surely we need a new and fundamental review of defence requirements and configurations.

The old United Kingdom strategy, dominated by the cold war and nuclear weapons, must now be either justified or altered to meet changed circumstances. Is the Minister entirely satisfied with the current nuclear defence strategy, or does he admit that those changed circumstances now demand a root-and-branch review of our defence requirements? Let me again make a direct plea to the Government to scrap the plans for regimental amalgamation in Scotland: given the increased demand for conventional forces, it makes less and less sense to destroy Scotland's highly successful regiments by amalgamating them. I support the contention of Lt-Gen. Sir Peter Graham that the British Army is already overstretched with its current commitments, let alone any extra duties that may arise after the implementation of the proposed cuts.

This is very much an avoidable error. Sir Peter says:

"There is a need for more Infantry in the British Army. There is acute overstretch and the proof is that the interval between operations should be 24 months but it is actually down to 15 months! . . . We are facing heavy commitments within a world situation which has changed . . . If 47 battalions cannot cope, I cannot see how 40 battalions could cope!"

Sir Peter is a military strategist, and I am not; but even I can see that conventional forces are being required on an increasing scale throughout the world, for both peacekeeping and other duties. The Government's policy is to supply even more nuclear weapons which cannot be used, while at the same time dismantling infantry regiments that provide the only effective method of operation. That is a gross misuse of resources, and a major policy error.

The Government have never really answered the point about overstretching: I hope that they will do so this evening. Their first response to the outright opposition to regimental manpower cuts was to halt reductions at 119,000 men rather than 116,000, as originally planned. However, there has been no increase or addition in the strength of either men or infantry battalions; nor are any proposed. In fact, there has been a decrease only marginally less severe than those orginally scheduled in "Options for Change"—hence the problems of overstretch, stress and strain and grossly reduced intervals between duty tours. Those problems will continue, as will unnecessary family separations.

The price of those regimental cuts will be paid by the families of soldiers who will experience stress owing to the failure of Government policy. If finance is the Government's prime motivation, I should like to hear from them the extra costs and burdens that will be placed on individuals, local authorities and the local economies of the highlands and the north-east of Scotland. Will they do anything to help with new housing, employment and the retraining of the soldiers who would have preferred to remain in their chosen profession? At what cost will this take place, compared with the continuation of the battalions that are required by existing commitments?

Again, the price of the Government's policy will be paid by individuals, families and the local economy, which will be rocked by between 500 and 600 redundancies in an already depressed economic situation. I have not heard the Government deal with that. The highlands and the north-east of Scotland will pay a heavy price for unnecessary regimental cuts.

Let me remind the Minister that the planned amalgamations affect an area whose population is relatively small. One person in 3,000 joins the Army through the Queen's Own Highlanders each year: one in 19,000 does so in London. The impact of the redundancies, and the need for homes, will be disproportionate if the amalgamation goes ahead. I have never understood the logic of axing the Scottish regiments, which are popular and up to establishment—especially when, even in financial terms, recruitment is easier to achieve and retention levels are far higher.

I believe that the Government should play to the strengths of the Gordon Highlanders and the Queen's Own Scottish Highlanders, rather than destroy traditions and loyalties that have existed for centuries. Such things cannot be bought, and, once destroyed, they will be gone for ever.

In addition to all that, Scotland has another problem. Now, the economic and unemployment threat of the Rosyth closure hangs over the local population. Lord Younger of Prestwick has said:

"Before a final decision is taken, I feel I must remind all concerned of a matter of good faith which is involved here. I fought long and hard, first as Secretary of State for Scotland and then as Secretary of State for Defence, to persuade public opinion in Scotland to accept, however reluctantly, that Britain's base for the nuclear deterrent would be at Faslane on the Clyde.

One of the most powerful arguments which I deployed was that there would obviously be many jobs for Scotland associated with operating and maintaining the submarines. I know that many in Scotland would therefore feel badly let down if a major part of these jobs were now to be removed from Scotland.

I hope it will be understood that I would find it impossible to support such a move as my good faith would clearly be called into question."

If the Government close Rosyth, they will break their former colleague's word. They will leave Scotland with the worst of both worlds: a country that faced all the nuclear dangers will have lost any employment or economic benefits.

Mr. Mans: Earlier, the hon. Gentleman gave the impression that he favoured a transfer of defence resources from the nuclear deterrent to infantry battalions and conventional armaments. How does he reconcile that statement with his wish for Rosyth to be kept open to service nuclear submarines?

Mr. Welsh: I was quoting the words of Lord Younger, who was responsible for the policy. I am saying that, if there is to be a peace dividend and if it is to mean anything, Rosyth should be turned into a model of employment diversification and investment for the future. It appears that the Government have no such intention. I am saying that Scotland will get the worst of both worlds: we had the nuclear dangers, and it appears that, if this decision goes ahead, we shall lose the employment that such an installation would provide.

I am simply giving the Government a previous Minister's view. He believes that his honour is at stake. I hope the Government will listen to that view. I also hope that they will go beyond the nuclear issue, and ensure that there is real defence diversification and a real future for Rosyth. Closure of Rosyth would bring about economic devastation. I am very worried about the general trend in the Government's policy: they tend to close such installations, rather than maintaining a presence to allow change, employment and a future. Once they have gone, local economies are utterly devastated. The Government have employed that policy in many spheres; I consider it very short-sighted.

In December 1992, the Ministry of Defence issued a publication entitled "Information to Local Authorities and Emergency Services on Nuclear Weapons Transport Contingency Plans". The information was intended to help local authorities to plan for, and deal with, any accident involving nuclear weapon convoys. Ministry of Defence advice from that document is that people should be advised to shelter up to 5 km from the accident locus. According to Strathclyde region, it is simply not feasible to achieve that, given the methods available for informing the public. Similarly, MOD advice is that evacuation may be necessary up to 600 m. In heavily built-up areas that may pose extreme difficulties.

We are talking about a centre of Scottish population. There would be nowhere to hide if any such accident took place. The Public Information on Radiation Emergencies Regulations place a statutory duty on regional councils to provide information and advice to the public affected by a radiation emergency. I put it to the Minister that Strathclyde regional emergency and planning officer is so concerned about the implications of the MOD guidance that he has advised that he could not effectively carry out the advice or plan for the safety of the public in the event of an accident involving the transport of nuclear weapons. He asks that hazardous convoys be either removed or made safe. I should like the Minister to address this problem, because we are talking about the central belt of Scotland and the bulk of the Scottish population.

In transporting nuclear weapons through heavily populated areas of central Scotland, what guarantees can the Government give on the safety of the civilian population? Are they aware of the alarm felt, not just in Strathclyde but by other local government planning officers, about the impossibility of dealing with a real emergency? If local government officials cannot provide safe conditions or emergency help for their civilian populations, the Government must stop the dangers from arising. I remind the Minister that I am talking about officials without any specific political input. It is their duty to carry out such measures, but they cannot do so.

What steps is the Minister taking now to eliminate the dangers? His need to transport nuclear weapons is placing at risk the population of the central belt of Scotland. Before the end of the debate, will he make clear the response that he is making to Strathclyde and the other Scottish regions involved? Will he stop all such nuclear weapons transportation until it can be clearly and publicly demonstrated that the safety of the public is not compromised by convoy movements?

That is another illustration of Scotland facing the dangers of radiation, but not many of the benefits. [Interruption.] The reaction of the hon. Member for Canterbury (Mr. Brazier) explains why the Conservative party is being thrown out of Scotland. Our population has to live with those dangers and does not wish to do so. If the Conservative party listened to the Scottish population, this problem and the others associated with it would not exist. [Interruption.] The fact that the hon. Gentleman is not getting to his feet is symptomatic of why the Conservatives are being rejected by the Scottish people.

Mr. Brazier: The hon. Gentleman may be aware that, under the present distribution of regional aid, his country receives approximately 30 per cent. of the grants, although it has just under 9 per cent. of the unemployment. Talk about special pleading.

Mr. Welsh: The hon. Gentleman is on dangerous ground. The bulk of defence spending is in the south of England. Scotland has the gunnery ranges and other such facilities, but the real Government money and the real employment is in the south-east of England. The hon. Gentleman should not talk about subsidies. He has only to walk less than a mile from the House to London docklands to find out what subsidies really mean. I will not take such talk from the hon. Gentleman. His blinkered attitude towards Scotland is the reason why his party is being rejected by the Scottish people.

I know that other hon. Members wish to participate in the debate. There is a need for a fundamental review of United Kingdom defence policy to meet the changed circumstances and the needs of the late 1990s. My plea to the Minister is for the maintenance of Scottish regimental recruitment, the safety of the Scottish civilian population and the maintenance of employment in Scotland as the peace dividend allows new and unprecedented options for real change.

Mr. Andrew Robathan (Blaby): I sympathise with the hon. Member for Angus, East (Mr. Welsh) in his plea for the Gordon Highlanders and the Queen's Own Highlanders. I pay tribute to them, having served with both during my time in the forces. They are examples of Scottish regiments that have given long, proud and loyal service to the Crown of the United Kingdom.

To take up a point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Staffordshire, South (Mr. Cormack), I remind the House of the old adage that the first duty of the Government is the defence of the realm. I pay tribute to my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State. He is doing a difficult job in difficult times. I pay particular tribute to his steady handling of the Bosnian situation. We hear many calls for intervention, such as "taking out the Serbian artillery", as if it could be done in a neat surgical operation with a scalpel. However, anyone who knows anything about high explosive knows that its use is not a neat operation. It spreads its destruction all around. That is a reflection of the ignorance of defence that one finds in the House. That ignorance surprises me, having had a career in the Army. It is exemplified by those who call for intervention while, at the same time, calling for further cuts in defence expenditure.

That ignorance of defence is paralleled in the country. That is not surprising as it is nearly 50 years since the end of the second world war and 30 years since the end of national service. I should like to see the House raise the standard of debate and have a proper public debate about defence.

"Options for Change" radically reduced the armed forces in pursuit of what we call the peace dividend. We have had the dividend in terms of saving, but there has been a conspicuous lack of peace. Since the launch of "Options for Change", we have had the Gulf war, Bosnia and Somalia—another example of the "surgical" use of air power was seen there last night—and there have been many other United Nations operations.

Since the announcement of the planned reduction in the armed forces, we have been faced with an increasing number of potential tasks and commitments. As my hon. Friend the Member for Wyre (Mr. Mans) said, with hindsight we can see that 1989 was the wrong time to review what was going on. We had seen the collapse of the Warsaw pact and the Soviet empire, but we had yet to see the breakdown of the Soviet Union. The world is now becoming much less stable and this is not the time to reduce our defences. Many have seen parallels with the 1930s in the instability in central Europe and in the difficult economic situation. Some time ago, I heard "Options for Change" defined within the Ministry of Defence as an "internal defence review". I must tell my right hon. and hon. Friends on the Government Front Bench that we must look again at all the assumptions behind it.

Last weekend, I went to the Queen's birthday parade —trooping the colour—where the second battalion of my old regiment was, sadly, trooping its colour for the last time before marching off into the sunset. It was a sad occasion. I will not make any special pleading for my old regiment. The decision to reduce the number of Guards battalions may or may not be correct. However, it was sad to see that that set-piece affair had only six Guards battalions instead of the eight that it had last year and in the year when I took part. Some people say that they are just ceremonial troops. That is nonsense. While the second battalion of Coldstream Guards marched into the sunset, the first battalion was being warned off for service in Bosnia. I have seen those troops serve in the Gulf and Northern Ireland.

I am not saying that the decision to reduce troops is wrong, but it does typify the situation. In that Guards battalion, as elsewhere, morale is inevitably very low, for many reasons, but particularly because of uncertainty. There has been a huge take-up of redundancy packages, even in a recession when jobs are difficult to find. We have not had great success in recruiting officers. The armed forces has always been a respected profession, but we cannot now recruit officers even in a recession.

I know that my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State will say that his Ministry of Defence advisers tell him that all is well, and that we are experiencing a little local difficulty. I am reminded of the divorce between staff officers and troops on the ground, as appeared to happen in the first world war. We are not in such a war, but there is nevertheless a divorce between the thinking of the Ministry of Defence and many of those in the front line.

I shall expand a little on the standing of the armed forces, a topic to which my hon. Friend the Member for Staffordshire, South also referred. Although we may not all have read it, the police sent us a survey on the standing of the police in the eyes of the public. The police received a rating of about 60 or 65 per cent., a rating of which they are justly proud. The survey also showed that the standing of the armed forces—the approval rating, or whatever one wishes to call it—was about 87 per cent. I wish that the House had an approval rating of 87 per cent. The armed forces are an admired and respected part of British society. They are an admired and respected institution whereas other British institutions have, frankly, fallen on hard times.

What will happen to the armed forces if good-calibre recruits are not attracted to become officers or join the other ranks? Their standing will fall and performance will decline. Morale is already at rock bottom and in need of attention, and things will continue to get worse. What type of armed forces do we want in the future? Do we want high-calibre, professional armed forces? If so, we need to raise the level of debate and put the subject into the public domain.

I assure the House that I am not a radical, although I may sometimes look like one with my long hair, but I believe that we need an appraisal. I do not want radical change, but we must not allow a valued national asset to be lost by default. That valued national asset is definitely under threat.

In a changing world, my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State is moving to consider defence as part of security. I approve because security is no longer a question of NATO versus the Warsaw pact. We need to consider the totality of security: defence against terrorism—some of it state backed—and security in foreign policy. Of course,

"war is a continuation of diplomacy by other means."

Security policy should, therefore, be wider ranging than it has ever been. We need to consider the defence of the nation and of the national interest in that context. For those reasons, we must reconsider our strategic needs.

I fear that there will be further cuts in our armed forces by stealth. At the beginning of April, there was a reduction of 5,000 out of a total of 55,000 in the Navy. A 10 per cent. cut in the Royal Navy without proper debate is extremely disappointing. Last week, further cuts in the Royal Air Force were annouced, and today there has been talk of a reduction in the Royal Naval Reserve and the Royal Auxiliary Air Force. However one presents them, they are cuts in the armed forces, and we cannot ignore that. Our defences are deteriorating by stealth. We need an open, public debate.

I hope that the Minister will be able to answer several questions. Will future units be smaller but better, as we were promised in "Options for Change"? I hope that the Minister will asure me that, in the coming years, all units will be fully manned and up to strength. What are the implications for defence expenditure of the long-term costings for 1993 and the projected long-term costings for 1994? What are the implications of the current review of public expenditure? What will the public expenditure survey round bring? What effect will Treasury pressure have on the Ministry of Defence?

I deal now with the much vaunted Allied Command Europe Rapid Reaction Corps. Can we man it? Some people suggest rather glibly that it will be an arm of the Western European Union, but the WEU is an organisation without a command structure, control or communications, direction or intelligence. NATO has served this nation, western Europe and the world extremely well. For good or ill, the United States provides an enormous part of the command, control and communications network which runs NATO. I have visited most NATO headquarters in Europe, and I can assure the House that that is the case. The United States provides strategic lift. If we move to the WEU, will we provide the strategic lift. and from where will we get command, control and communications? My hon. Friends may disagree, but I suspect that the ARRC may be little more than a political statement, perhaps allied to the aspirations of some European politicians and some of our partners. It would be a tragedy if the ARRC were to become nothing more than words which can never be employed. There is little flexibility in it as currently constituted.

As I said, we should have a full, public appraisal of our strategic needs. The Army is overstretched because there is a mismatch of resources and commitments. We currently have 12 battalions in Northern Ireland. They are usually infantry but, following "Options for Change", we shall have only 42 infantry battalions and commandos, minus the Gurkhas, available for service in Northern Ireland. Maths was never my strong point, but I envisage some difficulty in managing 24-month tour intervals with 42 battalions. A 24-month tour interval looks increasingly unlikely.

My right hon. and learned Friend mentioned the reserve forces, but he should not regard them as an easy and cheap option. He spoke of professionalism and training. I welcome the further involvement of our excellent reserves in active duties, which can be offered to them as an incentive for their hard work. However, reserve forces are being cut. We won both world wars with our reserve forces and Territorial Army; they were not won by our regular forces. The British expeditionary force and the regular forces were slaughtered in the first world war and we then had to rely on our reserves, but they are now being cut. In these difficult times, it is essential that we do not cut them further.

My hon. Friend the Member for Weston-super-Mare (Sir J. Wiggin) noted how cheap reserves are, but they should not be regarded as a cheap option in peacetime. I agree that they cost much less than fully trained, pensioned soldiers, but if we want a professional Army and highly trained troops, we have to have professionals who are highly trained. That takes time; it cannot be done in a couple of weekends a year. I in no way want to criticise the reserve forces, because they are excellent, but they are not the solution to all our problems.

I heard that units would be half-manned by reserve forces. I have to say that that means that they will be undermanned. It is not a realistic option in which we should take pride. The reserves are not full-time personnel. Of course, some are on the dole and might welcome employment, but most of them are not. It would be disappointing if the Government wished to employ people without pension rights. They are not trained to the same standards, and it is futile to pretend that they are. If we want a reservist army, as some of our neighbours have, let us say so. We should look again at the whole question of our reserves and, for that reason, we should have a sensible, open and public appraisal of our requirements.

I believe that my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State has the interests of the country and its defence close to his heart, but I would consider it tragic if such an able and committed Secretary of State were to oversee further deterioration in the state of our armed forces.

There has been a paucity of suggestions from the Opposition, but if we had an open debate it would allow more suggestions to be made at a more sensible, raised level. We do not want a debate at a financial level; we want to discuss the country's defence needs. What is essential for our defence? What sort of armed forces do we want in the long term?

Currently, there are threats all over the globe—it is not a safe world. My right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State said earlier that we have just seen the most radical change in the armed forces since the 1940s, yet we have done so without looking properly at our commitments and resources. We are seeing not so much salami slicing as butchery behind closed doors.

Ignorance extends to the general public, who expect the armed forces always to rise to the occasion, such as in the Falklands and the Gulf. We need to educate the public about what we can and cannot do. We cannot march into Bosnia with all flags flying and expect to be taken seriously. I remind the House of Kipling's "Tommy":

"Oh, It's Tommy this, an' Tommy that, an' 'Tommy, go away'; But it's 'Thank you, Mister Atkins,' when the band begins to play."

We always turn to the armed forces in time of need. We hope that they will be there in future because the country will not forgive the House if the armed forces, including the reserve forces, are not able to rise to our need when the country is threatened.

The hon. and learned Member for Fife, North-East (Mr. Campbell) was absolutely correct to say that a strategic review is not the solution. However, at least after such a review we would understand the problems. I ask my hon. Friend the Minister to arrange a proper strategic review of the defence of the nation. Only then will we understand and solve the very real problems facing our armed forces today.

8.32 pm

Mr. Rhodri Morgan (Cardiff, West): I have listened to most of the debate, apart from essential visits out of the House, and was particularly interested in the last two speeches. I was interested to hear the hon. Member for Blaby (Mr. Robathan) saying that he did not think that the standard of defence debates was all that high and that there is some ignorance about defence issues. He joined the Secretary of State for Defence in criticising Opposition Members for what he alleged to be a lack of interest or of useful suggestions.

I certainly hope to put forward some ideas. Labour Members take a strong interest in defence, but Conservative Members sometimes misunderstand our interest. I hope that they will not take it unkindly when I say that perhaps they confuse their own interests in defence. From my experience of the armed forces, I know that they can certainly be said to represent the officer class, whereas for obvious reasons we tend to represent the other ranks. That is the nature of the way in which the Army is recruited—a point that was made by the hon. Member for Angus, East (Mr. Welsh) in relation to the Gordon Highlanders.

There is a relationship between levels of unemployment and deprivation and recruitment into the armed forces. It is partly tradition, but partly the lack of alternative jobs. In areas of high recruitment there is a lack of alternative jobs, so naturally we take an interest in the people who are recruited into the armed forces because we want to ensure that they are used properly. I hope that Conservative Members will not take that remark unkindly.

I refer to the clash between some of the claims that are made in the defence estimates and the realities as they have emerged in the past month during the saga, fiasco or foul-up at RAF St. Athan over the modification contract for F3 Tornadoes, which has reached the media following the termination of the Ministry of Defence contract to refit the 18 aircraft. My hon. Friend the Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark) referred to this and I wish to point out what conclusions the Ministry of Defence should draw from the way in which the exercise has gone wrong and how it conflicts with the claims that are made in Cm 1981.

Paragraph 322 of the estimates says:

"Contractorisation of support services continues to achieve savings in the RAF support area."

Paragraph 313 refers to the aim of "total quality" in the merger of the Defence Research Agency with the directorate of quality assurance, which has also played a major part in this saga, as I hope to show shortly. It refers to the fact that the Government have appointed Mr. Littmoden, formerly of Marks and Spencer, as head of the merged agency to try to achieve higher standards of quality.

I am a great admirer of some of the work of Marks and Spencer in raising the efficiency of its textile suppliers. It was always said in management that only two bodies take a hands-on interest in trying to improve the efficiency of their suppliers—the Ministry of Defence and Marks and Spencer. They often compared notes and told suppliers, "You could be producing these goods at half the price if only you bought better machinery and did it this way. These are the places where you should be buying that better machinery. These are the people who you need to run it, and you could produce the same goods for us at half the price, make a bigger profit and we would both be better off. We will show you how to do it." Marks and Spencer went further and took shares in supplier companies. The Ministry of Defence obviously could not do that, but they were the only bodies that injected a drive to improve the efficiency of their own suppliers through a proper, active, hands-on quality assurance directorate.

That was some 20 years ago when I was in the civil service, at which time I had interesting conversations with Ministry of Defence civil servants. The position seems to have deteriorated a great deal since because of the almost theological belief that the market will now do the job that active, hands-on, backside-kicking, engineering and value analysis expertise within the Ministry of Defence used to do. There is now total reliance on the market.

That was referred to by the Public Accounts Committee in its report, the first page of which says:

"We note that the Department generally rely on market forces to achieve value for money at the contract re-let stage and that they rarely prepare an in-house option to compare against bids from firms. We stress that this places a premium on maintaining effective competition between potential contractors, especially as the in-house staff who previously provided the service will often no longer be in post."

Fortunately, the RAF St. Athan and Airworks Services saga had not gone that far. As a result, in-house staff who were not allowed to bid for the modification contract for F3 Tornadoes have already started some remedial work on the two mildly damaged Tornado F3s of the 18 that were referred to by the shadow Secretary of State. Thank God they are still in post and have not been dispensed with in favour of putting everything out to compulsory competitive tendering, contractorisation, privatisation or some other variant of the Government's theology-driven alternatives to in-house capacity for carrying out improvements, modifications or life extensions to key equipment such as very expensive aircraft, which at the equivalent price today would cost £25 million each.

What happened at RAF St. Athan? When the Department decided to have a life extension exercise for the F3 Tornadoes, because of the amount of service that they had seen, to see whether their effective flying life could be doubled—that was a sensible idea—the initial contract was given to British Aerospace. Again, the RAF was not allowed to bid. The contract appears to have been completed successfully on the first 15 aircraft. But British Aerospace lost the contract for the next batch to Airwork Services from Bournemouth.

The RAF still had not been allowed to bid, although I understand that it did a ghost bidding exercise, just to test, and that its estimate came out about halfway between the rather high British Aerospace price and the low Airwork Services price, which has now turned out to be such a bad bargain—although litigation may remedy that. For obvious reasons, I shall not go into that possibility tonight, although the Minister may want to say something about it later.

The Government had gone in for a low-cost option and it appears that in the specifications for the contract there was almost no check on how Airwork Services, or any other lowest bidder, would carry out the contract. The contract had been given to the lowest bidder, with all the attendant dangers that that firm might neglect aspects such as supervision, craftsmanship and a quality assurance trail. Would there be any longstop to ensure that the aircraft were modified to the proper standard, without collateral damage being done in the course of the work? No, there was no quality assurance trail at all.

RAF St. Athan sent warning signs to the Ministry of Defence quality assurance directorate, which was told, "It looks to us as though something is going wrong on the contract." Having been notified, the quality assurance directorate staff went to RAF St. Athan and asked to look at the firm's quality assurance certificate, the ISO 9001—the international equivalent of the BS 5750 quality systems certificate. That certificate is proliferating like a plague throughout British industry; people refer to it as, "never mind the quality, feel the certificate". I do not think that I am being unfair; I am reflecting an opinion that is widespread throughout industry, including the service industries, about those certificates, which have little meaning.

The Ministry of Defence said, "If the firm has a certificate, we do not want to look at the aeroplanes. Has it got a valid ISO 9001? If the answer is yes, we do not want to look at the planes." The MOD staff went back to London satisfied that the certificate was in order. They did not look at the aeroplanes, so they did not see the damage being done by the inappropriate trade practices and inappropriate tools until four of the aircraft had returned to their operational bases at RAF Leuchars, RAF Leeming or RAF Coningsby. I am not sure exactly which bases were involved, but they were among the three bases where F3 Tornadoes are normally used.

The damage was not discovered until four aircraft had gone back, which means that by the time it was discovered the aeroplanes could have been used operationally, in training exercises over the Lake District or mid Wales, at 50 ft off the ground. I am told that, as the fasteners had not been properly refastened and so were loose, two things could have happened. First, a fastener could have worked completely loose and because damage had been caused around the engine intake area, a loose fastener could have been sucked into the engine and sheared off the blades of the turbine from the shaft, which would have resulted in catastrophic engine failure. Secondly, as there were a lot of loose fasteners around the engine intake area, the engine itself could have sheared off. The lives of the air crew and of civilians unfortunate enough to live in the area over which Tornadoes usually perform low-level training, and also the lives of livestock such as sheep, could have been threatened in those two ways.

I find that frightening, especially as it was an avoidable risk. As the hon. Member for Blaby and many other hon. Members have said, there are unavoidable risks in operating a defence establishment. People do not join the armed forces because they think it will be all ENSA theatre parties and so on. They realise the risks of getting killed. But one does not expect people, including civilians, to be killed because of inefficiency or incompetence, especially when warnings have been given halfway through the saga but ignored because of an obsession with dodgy quality certificates that were not worth the paper they were written on.

Eighteen aircraft have now been damaged. Four of them, which are at RAF Leuchars, RAF Leeming or RAF Coningsby, have been cleared to limp back to RAF St. Athan, rather like a squadron of Lancasters that hit heavy flak over Hamburg in November 1944 and just made it back to Britain. The Tornadoes can just make it back to RAF St. Athan. However, 12 of the aircraft at RAF St. Athan have been classified as "seriously damaged". Those words are from the Ministry of Defence official statement on the affair. Two have been classified as superficially damaged and those two will now be rectified by RAF St. Athan in-house staff. They are mostly civilian staff, but I believe that about 120 service craftsmen have been transferred from their duties back to RAF St. Athan to assist the staff there in the remedial works on the two aircraft that are mildly damaged.

The 12 other aircraft are so seriously damaged that I understand that they have not yet been cleared to be towed on the ground from the modification hangar into the storage hangar to be taken out of the way and left free for examination purposes so that other works can proceed. They are not safe to tow along the ground in case further damage occurs to the structure of the aircraft, the engine intake areas and the longerons—the lengthways engineering members of the aircraft around which it is constructed.

We understand that damage was caused by the classic type of corner-cutting that occurs when a contractor is under pressure to complete a contract taken on at a low price and he knows that there is no active quality assurances specified in that contract, because it is totally reliant on certificates of quality systems and no one will come along and say, "Never mind about the certificate. Are you doing the job properly?" The contract was totally reliant on the idea that since the contractor had the certificate he must be doing the job properly. However, if a contractor bids very low in order to get the work, under the pressure of competitive tendering, he is likely to skimp on supervision and on the quality assurance trail. Unfortunately, that is what has happened since the Ministry of Defence deliberately omitted, or forgot, to provide an effective quality assurance check of its own, despite the risks to air crew and civilians which could result from faulty work.

I understand that the faulty work arose from the use of power tools that were far too powerful in an attempt to dismantle the aircraft so as to get at the insides. Pneumatic guns were used to remove the fasteners that attach the side skins to the longerons and that created enlarged holes. When the fasteners were put back in there could not be a tight fit between the side skins and the longerons and that compromised the aeronautical integrity of the aircraft. An aircraft with loosely attached screws holding the sides on is not fit to do what an F3 Tornado is meant to do in combat—or in training, for that matter.

That is the alarming situation in which we now find ourselves. What can happen now? We have been talking about options for change, but what we now have is options for repairs at RAF St. Athan. We are told that three options are now being considered. The first is cannibalisation. We could use the F2 Tornadoes that are in storage because they have completed most of their natural flying life. Fortunately, their central fuselage section is almost identical to that of the F3, so the section of the F3 that has been damaged in the attempt to double its flying life could be ripped out and a cannibalised central fuselage section from an F2 in storage could be put in. That is cannibalisation. This would be done by the RAF Abingdon team, the so-called repair and recovery—commonly known as the crash and smash—team, which has moved down to RAF St. Athan.

Then there is reconstruction. This is probably the most expensive option and the one that, for obvious reasons, the German engineers who built the centre fuselage section of the Tornado F3 would prefer, because it would mean money for them. It would mean taking the aircraft or flying the centre fuselage section back to Germany and rebuilding it from scratch on the manufacturer's original jigs. Deutche Aerospace has recommended that that is what is necessary if the aircraft are ever to be restored to full fitness. Obviously, that is a very expensive way of going about it, but they say that that is the only way. One can say that the Mandy Rice-Davies rule applies here—well, they would, wouldn't they?—but they may be right; we do not know.

The third option is rectification, asking the skilled civilians and service men at RAF St. Athan to do the work. There are about 1,000 civilians, mostly skilled tradesmen and supervising technicians, and 3,000 service men of the same skilled type. It is not an operational RAF base; it is the RAF garage, as it were. They could be asked what they could do about the damage, which is that the depressions around fastener holes have been enlarged so that they are 25 times as great as the maximum tolerance allowed in the design of the Tornado F3. Maximum tolerance for damage round the screw holes is 0·02 mil, and the actual damage on these 12 aircraft, I understand, is 0·5 mil. The RAF could ask if there was a way of doing the job on the cheap, even if it took a long time.

We face other concerns as well, in that Airwork's own future may depend on certain matters on which the Minister may touch. It is not the purpose of this debate to throw accusations at the staff of Airwork, some of whom may be constituents of mine. Throwing terms such as cowboys at either staff or companies is of no interest to me. We are talking about policy decisions here tonight.

Is there a lesson here for the Ministry of Defence? I believe that there is and it falls into several categories. The first is how one judges whether a firm is the right sort to take on this kind of work. What sort of professional indemnity assurance against the contract getting into trouble do they have? If it gets to the stage of litigation against Airwork, do they have adequate insurance to cope with a bill for the writing off of two Tornadoes, costing £25 million when new, although they are certainly not new? Should one specify that a firm must be of sufficient financial standing or have sufficient indemnity insurance to cover that kind of damage? One has to be sure about that before giving a firm that kind of contract.

Can we also learn lessons as to how these contracts should be written? What sort of specification should be put in the contract in terms of quality assurance? One lesson is that we must not allow the further proliferation of, and over-dependence on, quality certificates, which tell very little about the quality of the job being done. Even though some consultant has given a quality certificate, hands-on quality assurance on the job is necessary to check that it is being done properly.

The greatest lesson is that it is silly not to allow the RAF to bid for that kind of work. I hope that that lesson gets home to the Minister. When all the decisions have been made about what kind of repairs to do, whether there will be litigation and, if there is litigation, whether it will get back the money that seems to have been lost over this, the most important lesson seems to be that common sense has gone out of the window in not allowing the RAF to bid against British Aerospace and Airwork.

In the whole thrust towards market testing, compulsory competitive tendering, privatisation and contractorisation, this was a market testing or contractorisation exercise that went one bridge too far. I hope that the Ministry of Defence has learnt its lesson from this fiasco.

8.55 pm

Mr. Julian Brazier (Canterbury): The hon. Member for Cardiff, West (Mr. Morgan) will forgive me if I do not follow him down that rather specialist road.

This debate takes place against the background of a considerable fiscal difficulty that has figured a number of times. Nevertheless, I shall follow earlier speakers in arguing for the matching of capabilities and resources.

I start by referring to a comment from a speech which my hon. Friend the Member for Thanet, South (Mr. Aitken) made in winding up the last debate on defence. He described in a very picturesque fashion visiting sites from which the Russian army had disappeared, and seeing great hangars for equipment that had been either demolished or taken away.

It is very easy to draw the wrong lesson from this. As far as I know, no serious military analyst believes that the forces of the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation were capable of fighting a conventional battle against the forces of the Warsaw pact for more than a day or two. Our conventional forces provided a trigger for the policy of flexible response, which involved at a very early stage the use of tactical nuclear weapons. Even an enormous reduction in forces on the other side of the iron curtain would have left vastly greater forces than the NATO forces could have afforded a war against.

It is in the light of that observation that we have to look at the political situation now on the other side of what used to be the iron curtain, where we see, not one nuclear country but four; where we see a series of instabilities, some of which are getting worse.

I do not know whether it is true that Ukrainians are selling nuclear technology or whether it is true that Khazakistan is passing on nuclear technology to Iran, but we know that the spread of nuclear technology into the third world is a serious problem.

[Mr. Julian Brazier]

If we look at the "Options for Change" exercise and, for a second, imagine that it is a properly balanced one—I do not want to argue either way now—we realise that since then three things have changed on the threat side. First, the Soviet Union has broken up, so now there are four countries with nuclear weapons.

Secondly, another seven countries are on their way to becoming nuclear powers. Some of them are as close as north Africa and the middle east, and include Libya, Algeria and Syria. Those countries are not on the other side of the world. They are run by unstable dictators and will not necessarily respond easily to simple deterrence. They have not only nuclear weapons—they have built up chemical inventories and are developing biological weapons. Some also have enormous conventional forces. For example, Syria has more tanks than Britain and France put together. I mention those countries simply because we must not lose sight of the fact that they are close to home.

Thirdly, the commitments of the United Nations have grown. Ironically, this is the one that matters least from the point of view of the home base and the possible threat to the United Kingdom or our partners in western Europe. It is taking up most of our attention and a great deal of planning time of NATO and, indeed, the Ministry of Defence.

Since the options exercise, the problems have grown substantially. Resources have had one more round of cuts, and many of us are afraid that there will be another. I do not want to dwell on percentage reductions, because one can play all sorts of games against them—it depends on what one thinks they should be.

It is clear that the beans do not add up at present, and I shall give two succinct examples to show what I mean. The first is the rapid reaction corps. Its most important and most expensive training facility is at Suffield in Canada, where they practise combined training. The first three exercises this year turned into fiascos, because they were all done without infantry. We cannot talk about a rapid reaction corps: it cannot rapidly react if its troops are away doing other things, so they are not training for the role.

The other example is our amphibious forces. There is a case for having a strong amphibious capability. There is a case for saying that we, as a small country, cannot afford the capability to do such things. It is manifestly absurd to have the 80:20 ruling reversed and have all the overheads associated with the Royal Marines and the commando training facilities—I understand that there are six generals. It is absurd to invest in a helicopter carrier that will have no capability at all. Without the two landing platform docks are the centre of any possible amphibious action, but which are completely clapped out at present. One of them is so clapped out that it would take the best part of a year to get it back into some sort of order.

We are finding all sorts of small problems. Cuts have been made to the money available for war stocks, which are already at an extremely low level. For example, in the Gulf, we exhausted our entire reserve of shells in a short time. The real problem is not peacetime overstretch, although it is a serious problem and I do not underestimate it. When I was canvassing on our married quarters patch during the local elections, I met a number of wives of senior NCOs who are leaving the Army shortly, having taken voluntary redundancy.

That is not the biggest problem. The biggest problem is the overstretch in capabilities. We are trying to maintain the capabilities to fight potential high-intensity wars against some of the serious threats on the one hand and resources on the other.

I follow other hon. Members on both sides of the House in saying that we need a genuine strategic review of defence policy and diplomatic policy. My simple question is: what alliance would tackle a nuclear threat in north Africa? Would it be tackled by some hastily cobbled together ad hoc combination? No rapid forces other than those of NATO have the capability at present. But under its charter, NATO is not allowed to tackle it. We need a strategic review. I know that other hon. Members want to speak, so I will not pursue that matter.

The changes to the reserves are welcomed in principle. For many years, many of us in the Territorial Army have said that reserve forces should be used in peacetime. However, there is a right way and a wrong way of doing it. If it simply means that regular units that need to be all regular will be padded out by volunteers, some of whom are simply unemployed, that is not a proper use for them, and they will not help the territorials in the long term.

The Canadians, who do a lot of this, have a Territorial Army that is in extremely poor shape. Its level of recruiting is worse than ours and its turnover is as great. The right model is the one used by the United States national guard and the Australians. Both of them have a much lower turnover than we do.

I shall make four specific points. First, roles for Territorial Army units must be sensible, not half-baked. It is absurd, for example, that a recce regiment in the rapid reaction corps is Territorial Army. Of course, such a regiment could not be there quickly enough—it would have to go first.

Secondly, all units must have the same liability. The situation into which we have slipped with some high liability soldiers and some with lower liability is absurd. The paper that has been produced suggests that we should go further, but that is unworkable. It will simply create a sea of paperwork and will mean that the command structure in Territorial Army units will be bypassed.

Thirdly, units must be kept at a reasonable size. There is no earthly point in having mini, three-company battalions, with no support weapons—nothing. It would be far better to have fewer TA battalions embracing the existing number of companies so that each unit is a worthwhile size.

Fourthly, the arrangements for call-out are critical. As I said in my intervention in the Secretary of State's speech, if one lesson is clear from the Gulf it is that if we need a substantial number of TA soldiers, it is unfair to ask them to volunteer a second time. The call-out must be done as the Americans do it, which is to call out a unit. It saves individuals problems with their employers. It is understood in countries where it is used. Nevertheless, I see the possibility of progress in his statement.

I end where I began. Yes, we have economic difficulties but, my God, we also have political difficulties abroad. There is, indeed, a frightening similarity with what happened in the 1920s. Then there was no serious threat visible, but there was a huge amount of political and nationalist instability. The difference between now and then is the nuclear element in the cocktail. We must not make the mistake of disarming too quickly and without a properly planned strategic review.

Several hon. Members rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Geoffrey Lofthouse): Order. In the 15 minutes available before the Front-Bench replies, two hon. Members hope to catch my eye. I sincerely hope that both are successful. I call Mr. Andrew Mackinlay.

9.5 pm

Mr. Andrew Mackinlay (Thurrock): I take your point, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

First, I associate myself with the tributes paid by hon. Members to the men and women of our armed forces. I include in that reference the high regard that we all have for the parents of the soldier whose inquest was held at Wrexham earlier this week, who spoke proudly about their son and his service. We would want to associate ourselves with some tribute to him and to their courage and dignity.

I wish to raise one relatively small matter in the Statement on the Defence Estimates. It is a pity that annex A, which sets out the details of the fleet, does not include ships which are used exclusively for harbour training. If it did, I could refer to HMS Caroline, which is the last surviving ship that served in the battle of Jutland. It is languishing in a remote corner of Belfast dock, when the nation should be reinstating it with pride because it is part of our maritime and national history. I hope that the Secretary of State will tell us that it will be restored.

There is an omission from the estimates. The Government are still not doing enough for ex-service men and their widows and orphans. One of the first things I did on being elected to the House just over a year ago was to table early-day motion 2 which has attracted 70 signatures. It calls for the appointment of a Minister for war veterans and their widows and orphans. I regret that only one Conservative Member has signed it, although service men and women and veterans support the idea of a dedicated Minister to look after ex-service men, veterans and their widows and orphans.

Such an appointment would be welcome in view of the conflicts that, unfortunately, our armed forces still have to face around the world and in Northern Ireland, with consequential casualties. Moreover, our parents' generation—those who fought at Dunkirk, in north Africa and the far east—are, in the nature of things, getting elderly and frail. It would be a good signal if there were a Minister charged with promoting and protecting their interests and working with the various voluntary organisations which, incidentally, also support the appointment of such a Minister. I am thinking in particular of the Royal British Legion. Most countries have a veterans Minister. I hope that will be taken on board by the Minister.

There is reference in the documents to the Ministry of Defence police. I am pleased to have touched base with the Ministry of Defence Police Federation, the members of which do gallant service in protecting military establishments, pursuing crime and reassuring members of the public, service men and their families who operate at Ministry of Defence establishments.

That federation is anxious on two counts. The first is the growth in the number of civil static guards who do not have constabulary powers. Not only does the federation see the use of those guards as a diminution of its members' role as police officers, but fear that it is a form of short-termism for which we shall pay dearly in years to come, particularly in terms of diminished security.

Secondly, the federation is concerned lest the changed demands on members of the royal military police following the decline of BAOR will act as a temptation for the Secretary of State to use them in lieu of Ministry of Defence police, although their functions are different, particularly in the United Kingdom.

The Ministry of Defence police deal with civilians and service personnel in relation to crime and other traditional police duties. The royal military police, certainly in this country, have powers to deal only with military personnel. I hope we may be assured that, even by slippage, there will not be a shift to using the royal military police in lieu of the Ministry of Defence police.

I intervened earlier in the debate to refer to HMS Fort Victoria. I raise the issue again because a scandal surrounding the building of that vessel has not been properly aired. That armed support ship was ordered in 1986 at a contract price of £127 million. It was to be constructed at Harland and Wolff in Belfast. Its cost has escalated out of control, to approximately £190 million, and its delivery is three years behind schedule. It is time for the House to be given a full explanation of what has gone wrong and who is to blame.

I mention it as one who is interested and proud of our naval and auxiliary fleet, as an hon. Member who is concerned with public expenditure and, unashamedly, as an Opposition Member. Had Labour been in power, Conservative Members would be going bananas at this scandal of delay and overspending. I hope that there will be full disclosure of what has gone wrong because the Government have presided over considerable waste in respect of HMS Fort Victoria. The vessel has not been equipped as was originally intended and Parliament and the public should be told why there has been a failure to deliver the craft in the way originally intended.

9.13 pm

Mr. Richard Spring (Bury St. Edmunds): There is probably no part of the United Kingdom where the impact of the second world war lingers on more than in my constituency. Thousands of American service men arrived in Suffolk in 1942. Their stay then continues to be acknowledged throughout my constituency. Remembrance day is a joint Anglo-American service, and in the past 12 months many hundreds of United States ex-service men have returned. I have had the privilege of meeting some of them, and it was a poignant and moving occasion. I take this opportunity to salute them for their bravery and nobility of purpose in coming here all those years ago to see off the forces of tyranny and oppression.

To paraphrase my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary, the long shadow of the cold war has been lifted to reveal smaller but intense shadows. No fewer than 21 civil wars are now taking place, even if television cameras tend to ignore most of them.

As important debate continues about the future of NATO and the Western European Union, the WEU. These are heady days. The former United States Secretary of State, James Baker, talked of NATO stretching potentially from Vancouver to Vladivostok. The simple fact, however, is that Europe suffers from significant military deficiencies, particularly in terms of intelligence and logistics. To put it bluntly, we have limited air transport capacity. We would not be able to mount a major airlift of troops. Last autumn, British troops were deployed to Bosnia in United States transport aircraft, because we do not have the required support capacity on hand.

It is true that my constituency enjoys significant economic spin-offs because of the 7,000 American personnel, plus dependants, at RAF Mildenhall and RAF Lakenheath, which my hon. Friend the Minister has visited. They put about £200 million into the economy. The relationship between those bases and the local community is, happily, not bettered anywhere in the world. The essential factor, however, is that that continuing United States presence in Britain and Europe is critical to our defence.

That relationship has had its tensions, but there is absolutely no question about the fact that, time and time again, it has been Britain and the United States that have promptly reacted, together, to events while, at times, our European partners have sat on the sidelines. The successful prosecution of the Falklands war would not have been possible without the considerable intelligence gathering support from the Americans.

Britain and Europe have legitimate security concerns in the middle east. The invasion of Kuwait threatened not only the stability of the region, but our oil supplies. Hon. Members may wish to remind themselves that Kuwaiti independence could not have been regained without American military power.

President Bush announced that United States forces in Europe would be halved to 150,000 by 1995; President Clinton is talking about reducing that number to 100,000 by 1996. The network of shared intelligence and signals appears, happily, to remain unaffected by those plans.

Part and parcel of this shared relationship, and still important to our security, is our independent nuclear deterrent. Whatever we think of the horrors of war, we cannot wish away nuclear weaponry. I hope that the British Government will continue to make it clear that, for us, a limited testing programme is important.

Most importantly, I urge the Government to press continually for recognition by the Americans of the importance of their presence in Europe. I am pleased that my constituency will, with the arrival of the new F15E fighter, host what many regard to be the most advanced tactical fighter currently in use. I am glad that we shall also continue to host the vital United States air force transport centre, now including the reconnaissance and special service missions. My constituents welcome that unreservedly.

Above all, my constituents recognise the importance of the American presence as a continuing guarantee of our security in a volatile and turbulent world. I urge my hon. Friend the Minister to seek to ensure a continuing and substantial American commitment to the security of Europe, particularly as the new Administration in Washington formulates its defence goals.

As every business man knows, the home market is an important spring-board to export success. The defence industry is a great success story in terms of employment and technology, both directly and indirectly. Firms in my constituency that provide high-technology goods to the defence industry have seen their sales to export markets treble in the past few years. That has also increased employment opportunities.

A good home market is not only good for a firm's business and thereafter its employment and technology, but increases its standing abroad. Overseas buyers feel comforted by the size of a company in many instances. Even during the recession, there have been success stories in the defence export business in my constituency. Those companies would suffer catastrophically if ever the Labour party's defence policies were implemented.

I do not exaggerate when I say that the world needs Britain with an adequate defence capability. The country needs the defence industry for jobs, and also for high technology with its range of important spin-offs.

Time and time again, the instinctive love of freedom and democracy of the British people has been tested in adversity. We have never let ourselves or the world down. With that in mind, we must pursue a defence policy that is equal to our strategic needs. We owe it to ourselves and to our children to do just that.

9.21 pm

Mr. Eric Martlew (Carlisle): The last time I wound up a debate it was a debate on the Army. I suspected on that occasion that the Minister had come under friendly fire. This time, with the exception of two Conservative speakers, everyone has been sniping at the Minister. The first reason for the sniping is the fact that the estimates that we are debating will be superseded in a fortnight by the new defence estimates for 1993. We have had to wait almost 12 months for the debate. I understand now why the Government did not want a debate. There may not even be a debate on next year's estimates after today's events.

The debate today has not been about money. We are not to vote on whether the defence estimates are correct —that has been done on the nod. The debate has been about the Government's stewardship of the defence of the country, and there is a credibility gap there that is every bit as big as the £50 billion budget deficit. The Secretary of State has not arrived in the Chamber yet—I presume that he will be coming back. He came to the House earlier today with a lot of bluster and attacked my hon. Friends and me. I was surprised that the Secretary of State was able to pin anything on me. I am classed as coming from the violent wing of the party, and he has done my credibility no end of good.

The only thing that the Secretary of State really said today was that there were to be cuts. When his remarks are distilled, they show that he said that both the naval and the RAF reserve were to be cut. He came to the House, attacked the Labour party and then cut the defence capability of the country once more. The Government do not want a defence review—that would never do, although nearly every Conservative Member and all Opposition Members called for one. We are talking about salami—slicing, as has been mentioned.

I had the pleasure of serving with the hon. Member for Weston-super-Mare (Sir J. Wiggin) on the Select Committee on Agriculture for many years. It was a special pleasure to hear the hon. Gentleman attack the Government. He did it very well, as one would expect from a former Defence Minister. He realised that there were going to be cuts in the reserves and he made it clear to the House that he found that unacceptable. The hon. Gentleman was also concerned, as are all other hon. Members, about the defence industry in the west country. It plays a major role in that part of England and the Government have no policy whatsoever for providing alternative jobs in the area. The subject of Westland helicopters was also mentioned, and I shall return to that later.

The Government have no idea of where they are going. The hon. and learned Member for Fife, North-East (Mr. Campbell) agreed with us on that point. Judging from what he said tonight, it would be difficult to get a bayonet between his policies and those of the Labour party. He must have been reading our manifesto. My experience of Liberals is that they usually carry bayonets anyway. I think the hon. and learned Gentleman was a little churlish to say that, although the Labour party wants a defence review, the Government are right to say that there would be leaks. I find it surprising that a member of a party that believes in open government should worry about leaks from the defence chiefs of staff. There should have been a defence review and the chiefs of staff should have known about it. There would have been leaks—they are part and parcel of the system—but if we say that we should not have a defence review because we are afraid of leaks, we shall never have one in future.

The hon. Member for Upminster (Sir N. Bonsor) attacked Labour nuclear policy, but that was a smokescreen because he then put the knife into the Government. When I first heard the hon. Gentleman, I thought, "If I were a Conservative, I would want him to be a Minister," but it then became clear that he does not agree with Government policy.

The hon. Gentleman said that the saving of £9 million on Belize was not worth it. Central America is a very unstable part of the world, but it is extremely important. If we pull out, we shall find ourselves with the same difficulties that we had in the Falklands. I have not forgotten that the Conservative Government were responsible for the Falklands war because they withdrew the naval ship.

The hon. Gentleman did not agree with the short-sighted measure to reduce the number of battalions. He knows that we cannot meet our commitments and I am sure that he agrees that we should have a defence review. He is concerned, as we are, that the 1·5 per cent. pay increase to the armed forces will continue.

The Secretary of State does as the Chancellor says, and it is no coincidence that there are now rumours that defence was not part of the review being carried out by the Chief Secretary to the Treasury who knew that the Secretary of State would give in without going to the star chamber. It would be wrong for the 1·5 per cent. pay increase to continue. As I explained in the debate on the Army, as those in the armed forces rarely have mortgages, that represents a cut in their wages over the years.

Other right hon. and hon. Members have made valuable contributions to the debate. My hon. Friend the Member for Denton and Reddish (Mr. Bennett) touched on a variety of important issues, some of them concerning his constituency. The only real support for the Government came from the right hon. Member for Epsom and Ewell (Mr. Hamilton), who is not in his place. We shall miss him towering over us at the Dispatch Box and I pay tribute to the honesty of his answers, which is not always the case with other Ministers. I disagreed with a lot of what he said, but we were on common ground with regard to ground troops in Bosnia. I wish him well on the Back Benches.

I agree with the comments of the hon. Member for Angus, East (Mr. Welsh) about the Scottish regiments. He seemed to think that radioactivity would stop at the Scottish border. I represent Carlisle, which is the last city in England. When I look out of my window I see Chapelcross, the last nuclear power station in England. The hon. Gentleman seemed confused about the nuclear deterrent and keeping Rosyth, but I understand his problem.

The hon. Member for Blaby (Mr. Robathan) was devastating. The arguments he used against his own Government were based on experience, but again he called for a defence review, as did other hon. Members.

My hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, West (Mr. Morgan) must be congratulated on bringing to light the scandal about market testing at RAF St. Athan. The company concerned has done more harm to the RAF in one year than the Soviet air force did in 40 years. That is the result of privatisation. It is dogma ridden and dogma driven. Market forces are paramount. Whatever base one visits, one hears about market testing. I remember going to a real market in Hong Kong at 6 o'clock in the morning because Chinese chickens for British forces based there were being market tested. It is nonsense. It is dogma driven and we should take this as an opportunity to stop and reconsider.

In the olden days, when Ministers were honourable Members, someone would have resigned over the situation that my hon. Friend has exposed. However, that is not the case now. Times have changed. Anyone who has read Alan Clark's book will realise that. I have been doing a little reading of his work as well. It is not so much the content that seems to remind me of Ministers as the title. I am, of course, referring to his book "The Donkeys". I borrowed my copy from the War Office library, which shows how old it is. That is his famous book, for which he will be remembered, with the famous quote about British troops fighting like lions but being led by donkeys.

My experience of the armed forces is that all the donkeys have now left. The generals have left and have gone to work for the Jockey Club. Donkeys are stubborn, stupid creatures. Some may find them lovable, but they remind me of Ministers on the Treasury Bench—they do not have the ears, but I am sure that someone finds them lovable.

I say that because the Government have refused to have a defence review, which has led to overstretch in many parts of the armed forces. For example, we know that the Government will cancel the tactical air-to-surface missile, the sub-strategic nuclear weapon. They know it, the Royal Air Force knows it, but the Government are too stubborn to tell us. We do not know the future. They are not prepared to tell us. The 1989 White Paper said that the WE117 nuclear bomb could not continue beyond the 1990s. A Minister has since said that it will go into the next decade. We know that TASM is doomed. Why do not the Government say so?

There has been much comment about the European helicopter 101. I recently visited the Westland factory in Yeovil. It is a good aircraft. A promise of an order was placed in 1987—six years ago—yet the Minister is still too stubborn to say where the Government will place that order. There is some opposition in the RAF, but sometimes Ministers have to lead; donkeys rarely do, but Ministers must. The west country needs that order if Britain is to continue to have a viable helicopter industry in the next century.

The Eurofighter 2000 is probably the most important technical and industrial project in Britain. The Minister told us in a recent parliamentary answer that the cost has gone up by some £250 million. We were told in January last year by Alan Clark—I presume that he was right—that it would fly at the Farnborough air show. It did not fly at Farnborough. It will not fly at Paris this week. We are not sure when it will take off. It has had two names, but it has not yet flown. If the Government do not get a grip on the project, bring the costs under control and bring it back on line, the enemies of that project, in this country and overseas, will come together, use that evidence and we shall lose it.

Will we get the larger share of the work? The Secretary of State said that an order would be placed for 250 aircraft, which will account for more than 50 per cent. of all orders that will be placed for it. According to the original agreement, that should mean that more than 50 per cent. of the work will be done in this country. I am not sure that will be the case, or whether the Government will buckle under German pressure.

It is a matter of concern that the Government are not prepared to listen and to re-examine issues. They seem to think only about elections. I am worried about the Government's statement today concerning reserves. I am a cynic when it comes to Government policy. They seem to be saying that they will use reserves instead of full-time troops. That is welcome in some ways, but I suspect that policy has nothing to do with giving the Territorial Army a greater role, but everything to do with making expensive professional soldiers redundant so that the Government can enjoy a cheaper option using part-timers. If I had not seen that happen in so many other areas, I might give the Government the benefit of the doubt.

The Secretary of State said that he would bring legislation before the House, and the hon. Member for Canterbury (Mr. Brazier) pointed out that a change had occurred. We do not want a repeat of the Gulf situation, in which reservists had to be asked twice to volunteer because employers would not release them. A Minister had to go into a huddle at Buckingham palace to ensure that those reservists could be sent. Legislation is needed to make it clear that reservists must go if required, be given leave of absence from their work and be guaranteed a job when they return. The unemployed who are called up to serve must be given a guarantee that they and their families will not lose benefits. The sooner that such clarification is provided, the better.

In the 1983 general election, a Conservative party poster depicted Labour defence policy in the form of a soldier with his hands up. Another used the headline, "Labour isn't working". In the next general election, a good poster for Labour would be one showing a queue of redundant soldiers, sailors, airmen, shipbuilders and workers from the west country with the headline, "Tory defence policy".

The Tories do not have a credible economic policy. Theirs is not the party of sound money or of law and order—and theirs is not the party of strong defence.

9.37 pm

The Minister of State for Defence Procurement (Mr. Jonathan Aitken): It is with some relish that I rise to wind up the first day of this two-day defence debate. It began five and a half hours ago with a wide-ranging speech by my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State, the highlight of which was his important statement on the future of our reserve forces.

The pantomime horse of the two Opposition spokesmen who began and ended today's debate could not think how to answer my right hon. and learned Friend's statement. At first, the hon. Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark) gave it a qualified welcome, but then fell back on a discreet silence after saying that he must wait and see. Winding up for the Opposition, the hon. Member for Carlisle (Mr. Martlew) seemed to regard my right hon. and learned Friend's announcement as a wicked Tory device to increase the dole queues. He had five and a half hours to work out that response. Between that gap of ignorant silence at the beginning and prejudiced misrepresentation at the end, it would have been a good idea to use the consultation period to learn the views of the public and of the reserves themselves.

We believe that our proposals represent a good way forward for the reserves in the new security atmosphere, which the reserves themselves will largely welcome because of the new tasks and roles that they will be given. Although I will not hesitate to give way to Opposition Members, I think that they should allow the consultation period to proceed: I believe that it will result in a welcome for the announcement made by my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State.

Mr. Martlew: How much will the proposal cost and how much will they save?

Mr. Aitken: I think that, in round figures, there will be a saving of up to £10 million, but all that will come out during the consultation period.

I am bound to confess that I have an advantage here. Because of ministerial defence cuts, the House now has only three defence Ministers; the Opposition, overstaffed as always, have four defence spokesmen. One Minister must therefore speak twice during this two-day debate and I shall be opening the Monday debate. It is possible that, because of the breadth and depth of some of the topics that have been covered today, they would best be dealt with on Monday: I am thinking particularly of nuclear issues, the European fighter aircraft and one or two other matters. However, I shall do my best to answer the points that have been raised today, in so far as that is possible.

The hon. Member for South Shields opened his speech—as he often does, courteously and correctly—by paying tribute to our armed forces and to MOD civilians. Naturally, I share his view. Apart from that common ground, however, I considered his speech a rubbish of an oration. It contained not a word of constructive thought or policy on the future defence of our country; it was one long whine and whinge about a so-called collection of scandals, which became markedly less scandalous on examination.

One of the first great scandals unearthed by the hon. Gentleman—it dated back to 1988; he was digging quite deep—related to the extra money that he thought had been wasted on submarine refits. Let me give the hon. Gentleman a history lesson. He will recall that, in the wake of dramatic events in eastern Europe in the late 1980s, we had to review the size of our planned nuclear submarine fleet. We concluded that a smaller fleet would be sufficient in the new strategic environment and I do not think that the Opposition disagree with that conclusion. In September 1990, following careful analysis, we decided to pay off two submarines, HMS Warspite and HMS Churchill. It was, of course, a difficult decision, in view of the expenditure already incurred on their refits; but our assessment showed that paying them off was the right decision and the best way of saving the taxpayer the maximum amount.

As the hon. Gentleman will recall, those developments were started by no less than the fall of the Berlin wall on 9 November 1989. That is a significant date: HMS Warspite's refit had begun in March 1988 and HMS Churchill's in April 1989. Planning for the refits had begun even earlier. I wonder if the hon. Gentleman foresaw the fall of the Berlin wall; I wonder whether he anticipated that we might need fewer submarines. I think that the Government made a sensible decision. There was nothing scandalous about it; in the long run, it was in the best interests of the defence budget.

So much for the hon. Gentleman's first scandal. His second was all about shipping fraud during the Gulf crisis. It would not have been the first or last conflict in which one or two people may have profiteered; I draw no conclusions, but that happens. Let us put the matter in context, however. The Gulf war deployment was the largest deployment of troops and equipment since the second world war, involving 46,000 personnel, 46,000 tonnes of freight, 87,000 tonnes of ammunition and 7,000 containers. It was our own internal audit investigation that uncovered evidence that there might have been some irregularities in the ship chartering process. We called in the MOD police fraud squad to investigate; the results of that investigation were passed to the Crown Prosecution Service in November last year. We cannot say more now for fear of prejudicing any prosecutions; but the notion that the MOD has been involved in some murky cover-up or scandal is not justified. I think that we did the only thing that we could do in the circumstances: we conducted a thorough investigation of what may have happened. I can say no more than that.

Dr. David Clark: As the Minister has denied my allegation of fraud, I presume that he is telling the House that there can be no prosecution.

Mr. Aitken: It is under consideration by the Crown Prosecution Service. For the hon. Gentleman to hold it up as some terrible scandal in which the Ministry of Defence is gravely at fault is nonsense and he should know that.

The hon. Member for South Shields may have been on slightly better ground with his third great scandal, which was the unfortunate episode of Airwork. [Interruption.] Before the hon. Gentleman gets too carried away with merriment, he will find that, at least partly, the laugh is on him. Both he and the hon. Member for Cardiff, West (Mr. Morgan) have misunderstood the situation. I do not intend to back away from its gravity, but we must get the facts right. It was blamed on market testing and theologically driven policies. The hon. Member for Cardiff, West seemed to be under the extraordinary illusion that we had put Marks and Spencer in charge of defence research. The chief executive of defence research is Mr. John Chisholm. Mr. Littmoden, to whom the hon. Gentleman referred, is the MOD's advisor on market testing.

The contract which has given us so much trouble was nothing to do with market testing. [Interruption.] The hon. Member for Carlisle said in his winding-up speech that it was about market testing. The contract is for a type of work that has been routinely undertaken by industry for many years. It has been our long-standing practice that a proportion of our aircraft repair and maintenance work is undertaken by industry. The RAF identifies those tasks which can sensibly be done in house and those—usually the longer and more specialised jobs—which can best be done by industry. Incorporating the fatigue modifications in the Tornado F3 fell into that category. Therefore, the question of an in-house bid from RAF St. Athan did not arise. It is off the beam to suggest that the aircraft industry cannot service the aircraft that it manufactures.

The hon. Member for Cardiff, West should not lose sight of the fact that it was our prompt action that terminated the contract as soon as it became evident that it was being performed in an unsatisfactory manner. That demonstrates our commitment to meeting the exacting quality standards that are so essential for defence equipment, particularly aircraft where flight safety considerations are paramount.

Mr. Morgan: There are three mistakes in what the Minister has said. I did not say that this had not been done previously and satisfactorily by British Aerospace. Secondly, the Minister is not correct to say that the Ministry of Defence took prompt action. The RAF at St. Athan called in the quality assurance directorate which, as I said in my speech, merely checked the certificate without having checked any of the aircraft. Thirdly, on the question whether this was theologically driven, the Minister must face the fact that the Government have a general policy of, if it moves, privatise it. In this case, they did privatise it and now the aircraft cannot move.

Mr. Aitken: The hon. Gentleman is exaggerating considerably. We acknowledge that this is an unfortunate episode. A small number of Tornado F3s have been damaged, but not as seriously as some press speculation and the hon. Gentleman have suggested. The necessary work of surveying the aircraft and estimating the cost of repairs is under way and my Department will be claiming against Airwork in due course. With a claim and legal proceedings pending, we cannot go into detail, but I can assure the House—this is the important point raised by the hon. Member for Cardiff, West—that the RAF's operational capability is not affected by the small number of aircraft damaged or the delays to the modification programme. There are sufficient Tornado F3 aircraft to meet all our present commitments for the air defence of the United Kingdom and the detachment to enforce the no-fly zone over Bosnia.

The fourth and last great scandal of the hon. Member for South Shields was that of the service chiefs who were not allowed to participate in the deliberations on "Options for Change" because of a fear that they may be the source of leaks. That was the hon. Gentleman at his most distorting. He must have read the letter from Mr. Mottram which appeared in the newspapers. It rebuts the hon. Gentleman's comments and makes the reverse suggestion.

[Mr. Aitken]

Some time ago the question was asked whether there were appropriate defence staff available following the 1984 reorganisation for the review. Mr. Mottram wrote:

"The answer is, it was. As my article briefly mentioned, the Options exercise was conducted under Ministerial and top management supervision by a small working group of central policy and programmes staffs. Three of its members were military and were selected on the basis of their jobs within the Defence Staff. This also produced a valuable spread of Service expertise involving a Vice-Admiral, a Major-General and an Air Vice-Marshal. Detailed analysis of possible options drew on the advice of the Service Plans divisions. The circle of those involved in the whole exercise in both the central and single-Service staffs was tightly drawn to enable a range of options to be looked at and often discarded on a confidential basis. This was intended to help to avoid the selective leaks to the media of the kind which can damage Service morale and indeed the reputation of the Services."

In plain language, Mr. Mottram is saying that the service chiefs were called in—not the chiefs of staff, but their major representatives—and that they were involved in all stages of the discussions. No one was excluded because they might be the cause of a leak; they were brought in to avoid leaks, so the hon. Gentleman has got it topsy-turvy. That was his fourth dud scandal. Much of his speech had nothing to do with defence policy, nor did it contain any constructive ideas. It consisted of trying to rake up scandals out of pretty thin air and was a failure as a result.

May I deal briskly with one or two issues raised by my hon. Friends and others who have participated in the debate. My hon. Friend the Member for Weston-super-Mare (Sir J. Wiggin) mentioned the EH101. I can assure him that we are actively thinking about helicopter procurement and support. We have, of course, taken note of what Lord Younger has said, but the paramount consideration is to meet the needs of the armed services with proper value-for-money procurement. He also mentioned the Paris air show. Although I do not rule out second-hand Pumas entirely as a small part of our requirement, it is well known in Paris and elsewhere that this Minister is a Puma sceptic. I have said as much at internal meetings and I repeat it to the House. To other hon. Members who mentioned the EH101, I can say that I very much hope that we can find the right price.

The hon. and learned Member for Fife, North-East (Mr. Campbell) had the intellectual honesty to say that a defence review would not mean the avoidance of difficult decisions. His words must have come as a terrible blow to the Opposition, who have for a long time used the defence review as a device to avoid forming a policy. I agreed with much of what the hon. and learned Gentleman said and I assure him that when taking decisions on procurement policy we of course take into account factors such as export prospects and industrial considerations as well as value for money. It has been helpful to have the views of the House on the wider issues in our discussions about the European fighter aircraft and other matters.

I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Upminster (Sir N. Bonsor), the Chairman of the Select Committee, on the Committee's report on the defence estimates for 1992. I agree that the threat of nuclear proliferation has been underestimated. I heard what he said about Belize and I look forward to receiving his report later this year. He was right to emphasise the fact that we shall be keeping a training presence and capability there. I shall deal in a moment with the interesting clash between him and my right hon. Friend the Member for Epsom and Ewell (Mr. Hamilton).

I am grateful for the tribute that the hon. Member for Denton and Reddish (Mr. Bennett) paid to the Cheshires who are his constituents. If I may, I shall write to him about his points about the pay office in Glasgow, which are primarily a constituency interest. I thank him for his contribution to the debate.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Epsom and Ewell made his first speech from the Back Benches for 11 years. He said in his resignation statement on 10 June, which I thought was a skilful blend of humour and loyalty, that his ministerial post from which he retired at his own request was one of the best jobs in Government. If I may return the compliment, I think that the Government were fortunate to have in that job for the past few years one of their best men. He gave us a timely reminder that defence is not an economic island isolated from the pressures of the economy in general or the public sector borrowing requirement. Defence tasks consist of the imperative, the desirable and the optional. One need only turn to the White Paper and read defence tasks 1, 2 and 3 to find that that is so. Yes, there must be limits.

There was an interesting debate, to which I shall perhaps return on Monday, between my hon. Friend the Member for Upminster and my right hon. Friend the Member for Epsom and Ewell. The Select Committee does the job of defence reporting without financial responsibility and therefore, in a sense, has an easy task. It is easy for a slightly financially unworldly note to creep into such reports. Where to draw the line and where to get value for money is a profound theme and I shall refer to it later as it runs with several other speeches. Finally, may I say what good sound sense my right hon. Friend the Member for Epsom and Ewell spoke about Bosnia.

I was grateful for the tribute that the hon. Member for Fermanagh and South Tyrone (Mr. Maginnis) paid to the security forces in Northern Ireland. I listened carefully to his constructive thoughts on the effects of the amalgamation and particularly to his point that recruits are badly needed for the officer corps. I know that my hon. Friend the Minister of State for the Armed Forces will heed those points carefully and we shall take note of them.

I was moved by the tribute that my hon. Friend the Member for Staffordshire, South (Mr. Cormack) paid to the dedication and professionalism of the Staffords, and he is rightly proud and pleased that they have been reprieved. I listened carefully to his analysis of the situation in the former Yugoslavia. He has shown consistency and great moral courage in his parliamentary stance. I have not always been able to agree with him. All of us are uneasy and unhappy about the dilemma that has faced the international community and we are profoundly distressed at our inability to bring peace to the killing fields of this civil war.

I agree with my hon. Friend that we must make one more effort to negotiate, but beyond that the new military strategy for the former Yugoslavia is very difficult territory indeed, as he recognised. He made me blush with his tributes to Nixon and he conjured up ghosts, but I was not able to hear a clear strategy that will be acceptable to the House and to the country, which is where we differ.

The hon. Member for Angus, East (Mr. Welsh) wants to scrap regimental amalgamations in Scotland. I am afraid that we cannot follow him down that path, but my hon. Friend the Minister of State for the Armed Forces will have heard his strong views.

Mr. Welsh: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Aitken: I have only five minutes and I am trying to cover everyone who has spoken.

My hon. Friend the Member for Blaby (Mr. Robathan) seemed to be under the strange illusion that we are conducting our deliberations by stealth and behind closed doors. He used a vivid phrase about butchery behind closed doors. To use a military metaphor, I think that he went slightly over the top. Far from there being any stealth, we have, not counting defence questions, discussed the matter in the House on no fewer than 32 occasions since last year. That includes three single service debates, the debate on the defence industry, this two-day debate and 12 Adjournment debates. We shall try to answer his wide-ranging points in due course, but I am afraid that I cannot accept his thesis that we are doing butchery behind closed doors and that a valued national asset is being destroyed.

My hon. Friend the Member for Canterbury (Mr. Brazier) chided me for my optimism about the diminution of the threat, as I perceived it, from having visited former East Germany. I beg to differ with him on that point. There has been a great change in the strategic environment, which affects enormously our defence and readiness posture. Our defence posture for many years was based on the notion that the Soviets were coming, and now they are not. Our reserve forces, our state of readiness and the level of our procurement are influenced very much by that thought.

My hon. Friend was on weak ground with his amphibious forces point. We have ordered a landing platform helicopter vessel and are carrying out project definition studies on the landing platform docks, about which he was concerned. More careful thinking is going into our defence posture for the future than he seemed to give us credit for.

I was glad that, in one of the final speeches, my hon. Friend the Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Mr. Spring) mentioned the great importance of the US-UK relationship. The constituency of Bury St. Edmunds, as he knows, is quite dear to my heart since I was born there and my father represented it for many years. Having lived in the arena of the American bases, I know what an enormous contribution they have made to the security of Europe and of the free world. On my way to my hon. Friend's constituency, I visited the American forces chapel in St. Paul's cathedral. There is a wonderful epitaph to those who gave their lives, which, if my memory serves me correctly, reads:

"They gave their lives defending freedom against the assaults of our enemies."

That is really what the American relationship is all about. Its purpose is not just, as my hon. Friend said, to lift capacity, intelligence sharing and nuclear testing, important though those matters are. The United States' presence in Europe has been of enormous importance to our security and I was pleased that one hon. Member brought that out so skilfully.

I do not think that I have quite answered the question asked by the hon. Member for Thurrock (Mr. Mackinlay) about auxiliary oiler replenishment vessels. It is true that they have had a somewhat chequered history. As was made clear at the time, the decision to build a second AOR vessel, Fort George, at Swan Hunter was taken on the basis of wider considerations of the kind being urged upon me by the hon. and learned Member for Fife, North-East —wider considerations than the bottom line on the tender.

However, in response to his specific question about the transfer of Fort Victoria to the Cammell Laird yard at Birkenhead, I can tell the hon. Member for Thurrock exactly what the cost to the Government was. It was nothing. A commercial decision was taken by Harland and Wolff——

It being Ten o'clock, the debate stood adjourned.

Debate to be resumed tomorrow.

Cleveland County Council (Abolition)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Conway.]

10 pm

Mr. Michael Bates (Langbaurgh): I am grateful for this opportunity to initiate a debate on the proposed abolition of Cleveland county council. When the Secretary of State for the Environment announced the review of local government boundaries last year, he said that the primary task of the Local Government Commission was to ensure that local service providers would "reflect the community identity", and to reflect the wishes and aspirations of the local people in its recommendations.

One of the first local authorities to be considered was the county of Cleveland, which was drawn together in 1974 out of Hartlepool county borough, Stockton rural district, Teesside county borough and the urban districts of Guisborough, Saltburn and Marske, Loftus, and Skelton and Brotten, in my constituency. The purpose of the debate is to place on record my strong disapproval of the tactics employed by Cleveland county council since 10 May, when the Local Government Commission presented four options for restructuring local government in Cleveland.

The preferred option was to abolish Cleveland county council and replace it with the four unitary district authorities of Hartlepool, Middlesbrough, Stockton and Langbaurgh. When the announcement of the preferred option was made on 10 May, the ferocity of the immediate reaction of Cleveland county council leaders left most people astounded. Yet it proved an accurate early sign of what was to come.

Paul Harford, the leader of Cleveland county council, described the announcement of the preferred option by the Local Government Commission as a "political fix". A week later, in "Personnel Comment", the internal staff newsletter of Cleveland county council, Mr. Bruce Stevenson, its chief executive and therefore a public servant, said:

"The Commission's arguments are weak, they appear to have overlooked many issues, failed to follow their guidance, failed to present their evidence objectively and their proposals to test local opinion verge on farce".

Things did not stop there. Councillor Paul Harford returned to the fray at a full meeting of the county council, calling the commission's initial report "deliberately misleading". Cleveland chief executive Bruce Stevenson said of the report:

"it had reached a perverse conclusion which could not be reached by any reasonable person".

Language of that nature used by those who hold positions of authority and responsibility is at best irresponsible and at worst seeks to undermine the integrity and independence of the Local Government Commission. One can only speculate as to why no such comments were made before 10 May.

Cleveland county council employs more than 20,000 people, and in May each of them received a letter from the council leader and chief executive calling on them to "lobby as a massive campaign team" for the council's future. The first example of this lobby of public servants was demonstrated on 11 May, when the Northern Echo decided to conduct a readers' poll, votes being registered by telephone calls to two different numbers, one for yes and one for no. The result of the poll was that 77 per cent. of respondents were against the proposed abolition of Cleveland county council, and only 23 per cent. were in favour.

Only afterwards did the full story leak out. I have here a memo sent to employees in the environment, development and transportation department of the council, which says:

"The Northern Echo is conducting a phone survey to determine people's opinion on the Commission's proposals. Bruce Stevenson"— the chief executive—

"has given the OK for the ban on 0800 numbers to be lifted so that we can phone 0891 515153 to register a vote against the proposals . . . so get phoning!!!!!!!"

Our concern at this action was not the misuse of public funds, at which I am sure that the Audit Commission will be looking closely, but rather that public servants should be authorised to use council taxpayers' money in an attempt to distort an honest attempt to gauge public opinion.

Next came a series of public meetings which had been organised by the commission, for the express purpose of listening to local people expressing their views about the type of local government that they wished to see. At the first meeting, held in Middlesbrough on 24 May 1993, the vast majority of the audience were employees of Cleveland county council. Speakers supporting unitary districts were heckled and barracked; those supporting the county were given standing ovations. Those few members of the public who had come along to give their views were intimidated into silence.

Such was the display of intimidation that Sir John Banham, chairman of the Local Government Commission, remarked in a television interview a few days later that people admitted to public meetings were "putting on the kind of display which I last saw when I was dealing with Derek Hatton in Liverpool."

What a sad indictment. I do not blame the employees for this behaviour. They have been submitted to the same campaign of disinformation as the rest of us.

In the May edition of "Direct Approach", the Cleveland county direct services newsletter, the front page leads with three bold headings:

"Services under threat", "Your job could be on the line", and

"Look inside and take action."

Under a section inside headed "Your job", it asks:

"What will a Middlesbrough Unitary Authority mean for staffing?"

and gives the answer:

"At least 15 per cent. job losses amongst permanent staff."

The Local Government Commission, in its report, states that it would envisage a reduction of staff under the four-district option of 2 per cent.

A similar tactic to mislead and deceive was attempted by the county council in its contact with the public. A booklet which cost £26,000 to produce and was sent to all homes in Cleveland stated on the front cover:

"Your Local Services are under threat—Read this leaflet, it could save you £100 per year or more."

Let us look a little closer at the claim that the Local Government Commission's preferred option could add £100 a year to the average council tax bill. The LGC, which, of course, had detailed access to the proposals of both the districts and the county, stated that it expected the result of reorganisation to lead to a £46 a year cut in the average level of council tax in Cleveland.

I have already referred to the deception of the council's own staff in the newsletter "Direct Approach", which warned of a 15 per cent. cut in jobs, yet, in communication with the public whom they are there to serve, they claim that the four unitary districts would cost an extra £23 million.

Normally, job losses would be associated with reductions in expenditure, not increases. It is expedient to claim massive job losses to one's employees, as clearly they will be motivated to work against reorganisation—understandably, because their prospects and security are in doubt. On the other hand, it is also expedient to claim that council taxpayers will have to pay more, as people are naturally fearful of increased bills and expense, and will react accordingly.

In short, one can make both these assertions, but they cannot both be true. Given that they come from the same source, Cleveland county council, one or both of them must be untrue. Therefore, Cleveland county council has blatantly sought to deceive either its own employees or, more seriously, the public whom it exists to serve. Such deception should be exposed and condemned.

Another example of this campaign of disinformation which I place before the House this evening concerns the future of a £28·5 million loan to Cleveland county council from the European Investment Bank. On 19 May, Cleveland county council issued a press release stating:

"a multi-million pound loan for major construction projects in the area is in jeopardy because the European bank involved is worried about the possible outcome of local government re-organisation in the area."

The National and Local Government Officers Association, in its local Cleveland county branch newsletter edition No. 3, said:

"the best attended branch meeting in years was addressed by County Councillor Paul Harford who in a detailed speech vigorously attacked the Local Government Commission's recommendations. He also revealed a shock decision of the European Community bankers who are not prepared to fund projects in Cleveland if the area was split up."

A recent meeting of the Cleveland county branch of NALGO voted to make £10,000 available for the fight to create a Teeside authority. I have been told that that money had been used to fund an organisation called Campaign for Teeside, which has been placing advertisements in the local press. In a letter to county branch members in Cleveland, the general secretary of the union, Alan Jinkinson, said:

"the union is gravely concerned at the county campaign . . . the action of some Cleveland County branch members has caused a great deal of concern locally. Many of this campaign's claims are unfounded and are only causing confusion and concern to people relying on local services and employees in local government."

This week, that stance was overwhelmingly endorsed by the NALGO national conference meeting in Brighton.

To return to the European Investment Bank loan on 19 May 1993, County Councillor Paul Harford wrote to his colleagues on the council saying:

"I enclose a copy of a letter received yesterday from the EIB showing their reluctance to support our £28·5 million roads programme if the Cleveland area is served by four authorities in future."

The headlines that followed must have brought joy to the eyes and ears of the Cleveland public relations team: "Threat of shake up", "Risk to £28·5 million construction loan", "Loan in jeopardy", and "Projects in jeopardy".

That night, the chief executive of Cleveland county council, Bruce Stevenson, appeared on BBC "Look North" and said:

"It"—

the European Investment Bank loan—

"can only be put together by combining the work which has been done in separate Boroughs."

Given that one of the three projects to be funded by that loan was the Guisborough bypass, which is vital to my constituency, I contacted the European Investment Bank in Luxembourg. The bank confirmed that it was content to offer the loan to the four unitary districts and said:

"There is no fundamental problem about reorganisation. This has been blown out of all proportion. It's a small legal problem, more of a technicality."

Having been caught out again, the chairman of the county economic development and transportation committee, David Walsh, had the nerve to say on local BBC Radio Cleveland:

"There is no doubt that the loan was at risk. But I can now confirm that, due to the hard and diligent work of county council officers the loan has been secured for the people of Cleveland."

One can only conclude from those examples that the whole episode had been designed to announce the bad news, destabilise confidence in the competency and ability of the districts and, when the truth is revealed, be prepared to announce the good news that the county had saved the day.

There are many more examples that I could give the House, such as the county's claim that the ring and ride scheme, which provides a vital service to the most vulnerable in our community—the disabled and the elderly—would be under threat if Cleveland county were abolished. In reality, the unitary districts had included in their submissions plans to improve the level of service in the scheme.

Ms Marjorie Mowlam (Redcar) rose——

Mr. Bates: The campaign contains the worst excesses of black propaganda. Political and civil service leaders have shown a propensity to deceive their employees and the people that they serve.

Ms Mowlam rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Geoffrey Lofthouse): Order.

Mr. Bates: Worst of all, by launching this campaign in a vital two months in which the people of Cleveland have had their first opportunity for 20 years to express their views on what form of local government they want, political and civil service leaders have sought to subvert the course of local democracy.

With only three weeks left in the consultation period, I appeal to the political and civil service leaders of the county council. If they have any faith in local democracy and public service, they should drop the campaign and let the people speak, or be prepared to face the consequences.

10.14 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Tony Baldry): My hon. Friend the Member for Langbaurgh (Mr. Bates) has made a powerful speech and I welcome the opportunity to respond to a number of the concerns that he has raised.

It may be helpful to recall that, in December 1990, we announced that there was to be a review of local government. Our reasons were that, outside the main conurbations, the system of two principal authorities in each area still prevails, the usefulness of two tiers is being questioned and the continued existence of certain authorities which were created by the local government reorganisation of 1974 but which have not succeeded in inspiring local loyalty is also in question. Another challenge is that the role of authorities is changing as they increasingly become enablers rather than direct providers of services. Therefore, we have an opportunity to think afresh about the structure of local authorities.

The Government do not see this as an opportunity to impose a new pattern of local authorities according to a national prescription; nor do we believe that it is necessary to have a uniform pattern of authorities in every part of the country. Therefore, this does not mean the wholesale abolition of either county councils or district councils, nor even unitary authorities everywhere; it means arriving at the right solution for each community. We intend to adopt a practical approach in response to local views and conditions.

The Local Government Commission was set up last year to review the structure, boundaries and electoral arrangements of the shire counties and to assess the case for unitary authorities. The commission has a statutory remit and is independent, but final decisions will of course be for Parliament to take.

Local government spending is significant. It is more than a quarter of all public spending—over £1,300 for every adult and child in the country. Local government needs to be in strong shape to make sure that it uses this money to deliver services effectively for local people.

There is a proper concern at the need to restore real community loyalty to local government areas, to reflect a sense of belonging based on where people live and work, and on a long-standing historical and geographical sense of identity. The task for the commission is to review local government and to recommend structures which reflect that sense of local identity and local interests, and to secure effective and convenient local government.

The commission is seeking to assess community identity in each area in a number of ways: through opinion polling, public meetings, freepost and questionnaires. Of course, it is receiving many, many letters from individuals and local organisations. In bringing forward its initial proposals, it is for the commission to decide what weight to give to the varied responses. Local interest has been substantial, with thousands of people writing to make their views known in the review areas.

The task confronting the commission is challenging. The conduct of reviews is a matter for the commission. It has been given guidelines which it is obliged to follow. It has been given guidance on policy and procedures set out in documents that are widely available free of charge from the Department of the Environment, Local Government 1 Division, Room N7/15, 2 Marsham street, London SW1.

This means that everyone should know the parameters within which the commission should be operating, and everyone concerned can make known their views on any commission proposals affecting their area. We want local people to get fully involved and make clear their views. This review is about the possible future map of England. Understandably, the review has provoked substantial interest in the local government press and among the local authorities concerned.

It is imperative that local people voice their concerns and let the commission know their views, individually or together, reflecting the views of local organisations such as chambers of commerce, women's institutes, doctors' practices and trade councils. Individually and collectively, the people of England should let the commission know what they think about the commission's proposals for their part of England.

We have sought to ensure that local people have plenty of opportunities to put their views forward. The formal consultation periods commence with a two-and-a-half-month initial period in which to put views forward. There will then be over two months in which to comment on draft recommendations, such as those recently published for Cleveland and elsewhere.

Simply because people have commented and made their views known at an earlier stage should not deter them from making their views known once the commission has made recommendations for their area. There is then a further six-week period in which to make representations to the Secretary of State on any eventual final recommendations. So a number of opportunities exist for local people to make clear their views.

On Monday, the commission will publish proposals for Humberside, Lincolnshire and North Yorkshire. Those proposals, like the others that the commission has put forward, are its proposals and not those of the Government. They are proposals for consultation; they are not immutable decisions. The House will appreciate that it would be impertinent of me to comment on any proposals on any area while the review by the commission is still being carried out.

Ms Mowlam: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Is it in order for the Minister to say that it would be unacceptable for him to comment during the consultation period remembering what is happening in other parts of the country, bearing in mind that, after a full contribution from the hon. Member for Langbaurgh (Mr. Bates), Opposition Members have not had a chance to say anything?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is for the Minister to decide whether or not to give way.

Mr. Tim Devlin (Stockton, South): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The subject is important for the whole of our county and some perceptive criticisms have been made by my hon. Friend the Member for Langbaurgh (Mr. Bates). It is important——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. That is in no way a point of order.

Mr. Baldry: I believe that it would be impertinent of me to comment on any proposals that the commission has brought forward. It would not be right for any Minister to do that at this or any stage, until people have had the fullest opportunity to comment, and I am surprised that the hon. Member for Redcar (Ms Mowlam) tempts me to comment.

However, I wish to speak about local authorities' publicity campaigns and their associated costs, which are, rightly, of concern to my hon. Friend and others. That is a proper matter on which I can comment at this stage.

Some might be tempted to think that publicity and frenetic advertising campaigns during the early stages of the review will influence local people's views of their own community identity, and even perhaps the views of the commission.

People should understand that the commission is, and will be, independent. Aggressive advertising campaigns and knocking copy against other councils will not influence the commission in favour of a particular local authority option. The straightforward and simple fact is that people know where they live and with what they identify. Slick advertising will not change that perception.

There has been no change in local authority permitted spending and grant levels to cover any extra spending on any local authority publicity and advertising campaigns to influence the outcome of the commission's review. So money being spent on such campaigns—such as those to which my hon. Friend referred—is money that is not being spent on providing services elsewhere. I suggest that the best way in which to build community loyalty is the effective delivery of high-quality local services, not frenetic advertising campaigns.

Local councils should not use public funds to mount a publicity campaign, the purpose of which is to persuade people to hold a particular view. Where councils overstep the mark and neglect their financial responsibilities, that should be brought to the attention of the local auditor, who has powers in respect of unlawful spending.

People can make their views known by writing to the Local Government Commission for England. The commission has made considerable efforts to let people know how to contact it. I shall give its address, because I think that it is important that, should any constituent approach any hon. Member with concerns about any aspect of the commission's work, that hon. Member should make it clear to that person that the commission wants to hear his views and that everyone is entitled to be heard. People should write to the Local Government Commission for England, at Dolphyn court, 10-11 Great Turnstile, Lincoln's Inn Fields, London, WC1. There should be no mistake about the fact that everyone has the opportunity to have his views taken on board throughout the review process.

Disraeli observed:

"England is the only important European community that is still governed by traditionary interests."

The best guardians of those interests are the men and women of England. It is their map of England that is being redrawn. It is their voices that must be heard. It is their views that will count.

10.26 pm

Ms Marjorie Mowlam (Redcar): A number of crucial points should be raised in the debate.

I must respond, in particular, to one point made by the Minister which was completely unsubstantiated—that there was evidence to suggest that Cleveland county council, by advertising and publicising the services that it has, historically, offered to the people of Cleveland, is, by default, not offering other services. He suggested that money is being moved from one budget head to another for such advertising.

Mr. Devlin: Will the hon. Lady give way on that point?

Ms Mowlam: No.

That argument has been put on numerous occasions, but each time Cleveland county council has provided evidence to prove that the money has been spent from the publicity budget. It has behaved just like any other local authority, which would fight its corner in exactly the same way. That the Minister suggested that Cleveland county council is in any way reneging on the services it offers to the local people is appalling.

The Minister said that the period of consultation will last for two months. Surely the debate is part of that consultation. It is unfair of the hon. Member for Langbaurgh (Mr. Bates) to cover one side of the argument, and I welcome the opportunity to put the other. Correspondence in my mailbag reveals that people hold the exact opposite view to that put by the hon. Gentleman. People would prefer one authority, on a Teesside-wide basis. At a public meeting in Skelton, in the hon. Gentleman's own constituency, the overwhelming majority of people voted for a Teesside authority.

Mr. Devlin: That meeting was packed with council employees.

Ms Mowlam: The hon. Gentleman may shout that, but the employees of Cleveland county council have as much right as anyone else in Cleveland to argue for the desired options that they want. Just because they are employees does not make them lesser human beings. They have as much right to go to public meetings, write to Members of Parliament and argue their case as anyone else. I am pleased that many have taken the opportunity to do just that.

Many issues worry people in Cleveland. They are worried that, if the option that has been put by the commission goes through, authorities will be created—quangos of the kind that have been created over the years by the Conservatives—to provide services, such as emergency services and economic planning, across the four district authorities. In common with the development corporations and the training councils, they would be unaccountable——

Mr. Peter Mandelson (Hartlepool): Will my hon. Friend give way?

Ms Mowlam: They would be——

Mr. Mandelson: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Ms Mowlam: They would be unaccountable to the people——

Mr. Mandelson: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Ms Mowlam: They will be unaccountable to the people of Cleveland.

Mr. Mandelson: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Ms Mowlam: It is very clear that I am not giving way.

Mr. Mandelson: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: There is no point of order. Ms Mowlam.

Mr. Mandelson: You do not know what the point of order is, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Ms Mowlam.

Ms Mowlam: People are worried that quangos will be set up, which will unaccountable to the people of Cleveland.

Mr. Mandelson: Will my hon. Friend give way on that point?

Ms Mowlam: That unaccountability worries the people of Cleveland——

Mr. Mandelson: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Ms Mowlam: That worries——

Mr. Mandelson: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It is obvious that the hon. Lady is not giving way.

Mr. Mandelson: I just wanted my hon. Friend to give way on that point.

Ms Mowlam: I made it clear that I would not give way on either point.

I shall continue, for the third time, to try to make my argument. If we are talking about democracy and the rights of people in Cleveland, many people——

PRAYERS

[MADAM SPEAKER in the Chair]

PETITIONS

Rents

9.34 am

Mr. Dudley Fishburn (Kensington): I beg leave to present a petition which

"sheweth that cruel and exaggerated rent increases are being awarded by rent officers and rent assessment committees to landlords of statutory tenants at a time of minimum inflation, falling property values, vacant property and decreasing construction costs, that these increases"— often 20 times the rate of inflation—

"go counter to the free market, and that they are especially severe in central London.

Wherefore your petitioners pray that your honourable House urgently review those sections of the law dealing with rent assessments for statutory tenants so that the original intention of these sections of the law, to protect statutory tenants be upheld.

And your petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray, etc."

To lie upon the Table.

VAT (Fuel) and Student Fees

9.35 am

Mr. David Young (Bolton, South-East): On behalf of my constituents and the people of Bolton, I wish to present a petition opposing the extension of taxation, particularly in respect of the extension of VAT to heating bills—attacks on the health of the elderly—and to student fees—attacks on learning and the quality of life.

"Wherefore your petitioners pray that this honourable House will do everything possible to prevent this increase in indirect taxation which particularly affects the old, the young and the poor of our country.

And your petitioners as in duty bound will ever pray, etc."

To lie upon the Table.

Dovelands Schools, Leicester

9.36 am

Mr. Greville Janner (Leicester, West): I beg leave to present a petition on behalf of the parents, governors and the teachers of Dovelands infants and junior school in my constituency because many of the buildings at that school are in a dangerous and intolerable condition. Many of them are insanitary and not weatherproof, and are in desperate need of improvement or replacement. Due to lack of funds, the local authority has not carried out that work, despite the fact that parts of the building, such as a piece that I have here, have fallen off and nearly killed children.

The petition asks

"that your honourable House will enable the children of Dovelands to be taught in safe, sanitary and worthy conditions and in accordance with the National Curriculum by ensuring that the necessary resources are made available for the works to be carried out now and before any tragedy befalls the school or any of its pupils as a result of these dangers"— and in spite of the leaked intention to downgrade school buildings and school classes. The petition contains 5,000 signatures.

To lie upon the Table.

Science, Engineering and Technology

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Patnick.]

Relevant document: The First Report from the Science and Technology Committee on the Policy and Organisation of the Office of Science and Technology, [HC 228 of Session 1992-93.]

9.37 am

The Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Mr. William Waldegrave): It is appropriate that the House is debating the White Paper together with the first report from the new Select Committee on Science and Technology, because, about a year ago, a process of national consultation was launched in the House. That led to the production of the White Paper, which has been broadly welcomed.

There has been genuine participation by many thousands of people all over the country—in the science and engineering communities, in the House, in another place and in the various institutions and associations representing scientists, engineers and science policy makers in this country and abroad. I say "abroad", because the issues in the White Paper have been discussed at some length with Science Ministers of the Group of Seven countries in the Carnegie meetings, which have now become a valuable feature of modern science policy making.

I think that I will be unchallenged when I say that the White Paper has been well received. Even the attempt by the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Dr. Moonie) to stir up some party-political fire was done slightly more for effect. He did not seem to have his heart in it, and his noble Friend in another place took a rather different view.

The beneficial effect of this national debate has been seen—if I may make one gentle party point—on the Opposition Benches, in that today we are to hear the first speech on science from the hon. Member for Redcar (Ms Mowlam), to which we look forward with great interest. Perhaps if we are allowed to offer any advice to the Labour Party, it should be that its science spokesman, the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy, should win his place in the shadow Cabinet. It seems odd that there is not one there already.

I shall set out the arguments in relation not only to the White Paper but to the broader themes of science policy, and to the valuable contribution of the Select Committee under four general headings, and shall discuss some of the comments made about those four general themes, which underlie the White Paper. I shall reflect with the House on some of the comments made by heavyweight commentators and contributors throughout the science and engineering community.

Mr. Patrick Thompson (Norwich, North): My right hon. Friend has referred to science policy. I am sure that he will agree that there has been a particular welcome for the White Paper from the world of engineering. This week, the Engineering Council and the four major engineering institutions—electrical, mechanical, chemical and civil—have said that the White Paper puts science and technology at the top of the political agenda. Can my right hon. Friend assure us that it will stay there from now on?

Mr. Waldegrave: My hon. Friend gets directly to the heart of the matter. The first of my themes is indeed that the purpose of the White Paper has succeeded, and science and technology policy are at the heart of Government policy. More importantly, it has begun to correct—although only begun—the imbalance between the prestige of engineering and science and the importance that the engineers have felt they have had in policy-making matters. My hon. Friend rightly quotes the support that we have had from the engineering institutions. I would add to that the warm support that we have had from Sir William Barlow of the Royal Academy of Engineering, which echoes what my hon. Friend has said.

The determination and impetus of the White Paper is to make closer connections between our science and engineering base in the universities and research councils and in the private research laboratories—they have not been overlooked, as they are major contributors, particularly to technology transfer—and those in industry who have the prime responsibility for the creation of wealth.

I direct the attention of the House to an important article that appeared a couple of days ago in the Evening Standard, written by the chief economist of ICI, Mr. Richard Freeman. I quote this not because it is unusual, but because it stands for quite a wide range of comments made about the White Paper and the drive that lies behind it. He wrote:

"It is difficult to overstate the importance of the White Paper as the success or failure of the science and technology policy it contains will be a critical factor determining the competitiveness of the United Kingdom in the 1990s and beyond. It is, after all, the first realistic attempt by Government for more than 30 years to formulate a coherent and science and technology policy."

He went on to welcome the policies specifically, quoting them in detail—the focus on wealth creation, the creation of the Technology Foresight process, the publication of an annual "Forward Look", the new mission set out for the research councils, bringing them closer to their user communities, and, as he put it:

"the long overdue change in science and technology policy in that it will be co-ordinated and monitored by one Department —the Office of Science and Technology."

He quite rightly made the further point, which is legitimate, that, in that sector, where the expenditure of industry is greater than that of the Government—as it should be—success depends on industry playing its part as well. All the responses that we have had show that industry is willing to play that part.

I shall quote one other endorsement that we have had, and that my hon. Friends will have seen before coming to the debate. That is the parliamentary brief published by the CBI to assist hon. Members wishing to take part in the debate. A press release says:

"The CBI's technology and innovation committee welcomes many of the features of 'Realising our Potential' particularly the recognition that science and technology should be more strongly linked to the needs of industry in creating wealth. The committee considers that the White Paper offers a framework and building blocks to achieve that and welcomes the commitment of all Government Departments to the overall objective."

It goes on to welcome specific aspects of the White Paper.

Let me remind the House of the building blocks that the CBI described. The first is the creation, for the first time since the late 1950s, of a proper senior council of science and technology, which I will chair and which will contain senior members from academia and industry.

The second is the creation of the foresight mechanism, which we have studied closely and which exists in many other countries. We are now in the process of carrying forward the work for the establishment of that. The third is the clarification of the mission of the research councils, and the fourth is the establishment of the new engineering and physical sciences research councils. Finally, there is a range of reforms on postgraduate training.

The White Paper has been broadly welcomed by one of the key constituencies at which it was aimed because one of its tasks is to bring the science base and the scientists and engineers in the research arms closer together with those who take industrial decisions. If we can achieve that, we shall have begun to spread more widely the success that we achieve in certain sectors in high technology industries.

The second theme is the reforms that we have proposed in relation to the organisation of the science base and its relationships with the Government, industry and the universities. I am happy to say that there has been a pretty united welcome for what we have done.

It is extremely important—I know that my hon. Friend the Member for Wantage (Mr. Jackson) is likely to remind me of this, as he did during the preparation of the White Paper—not to devalue the importance of good basic science. I think that he will confirm my understanding that, again and again during consultations, we had from big and small science-based companies a recommendation that the Government should not resile from their proper task of underpinning technology, engineering and the application of science by the provision of that which only they can provide—long-term support to a strong quality science base.

We decided to remove the uncertainty that had remained in relation to the dual funding system since the last higher education White Paper. We have reshaped the research councils, re-endorsing their structure in general and their efficacy. They are a good British invention. They bring peer group pressure to bear effectively and they have been increasingly well managed, although there are further reforms to be made to their management.

We have divided the Science and Engineering Research Council into two and have won general support for that on the grounds that it had become too big and was asked to make judgments that were so wide—between the most cosmological research at one end and the science and engineering underpinning industry at the other that those decisions on allocations should be taken through a process in which Ministers were involved, and by the new director-general whom we shall be establishing.

We have accepted the advice of the Royal Society and others, and of the Labour party on Tuesdays and Thursdays, although not on Wednesdays and Fridays, to bring the Advisory Board for the Research Councils within the Office of Science and Technology. We have won widespread support for that collection of evolutionary but sensible reforms of the management of the science and engineering base.

Sir Trevor Skeet (Bedfordshire, North): The director-general is, probably one of the most important personalities. Does my right hon. Friend have any idea who is likely to be appointed to that post and when he will be in place?

Mr. Waldegrave: My hon. Friend is right to say that his post will be a key to the success of the structure.

Ms Marjorie Mowlam (Redcar): His or her.

Mr. Waldegrave: The post should be openly advertised —and the female hon. Member for Redcar is right to correct me, because the holder of that post could be a member of either gender. I will set out at the end of my speech our time scales for some of those matters. I have no idea who will be appointed, but I know—as does my hon. Friend—that a number of high-quality people have expressed interest in the task.

We have won support from some who, in the consultation process, were suspicious that we would get it wrong. Sir John Kingman, vice-chancellor of Bristol university in my constituency—a former chairman of SERC and a distinguished mathematician—upholds the view that the Government should not damage the underlying science base. He comments:

> "The White Paper . . . is the first Government document that comes near to recognising the complexity of the science base, and its relationship to wealth creation, and it says many things about them that badly need to be Government policy. The practical steps outlined in the White Paper are all steps in the right direction. In particular, the changes to the Research Councils and their link with OST seem to me constructive and workable. . . . The White Paper has been rightly welcomed by the scientific community, and you and Bill"— the chief scientific adviser—

"deserve congratulation."

I greatly value winning support for the reforms from that quarter, as I do the explicit and warm support that we received from Lord Flowers, Chairman of the House of Lords Select Committee.

In a letter, Lord Flowers congratulated us warmly on the White Paper's content and tone and welcomed

"the internalising of the ABRC within OST and the appointment of a Director General".

The judgment of those most closely concerned with the management of the science and engineering base is that our reforms in the structure and organisation of British science were well made and will have the general support of the wider community.

The third theme came across in the consultation most clearly, understandably, from younger scientists and engineers at the bench—that this country has not been very good at managing and giving pastoral care to scientists and engineers in research laboratories. We have increased the numbers markedly over the past 10 or 15 years, but there has been a large increase in the number on short-term contracts. They are not always managed well by the institutions which are their employers—although often they are on contracts to organisations outside the institutions themselves.

After discussions with a wide range of representative institutions and with engineers and scientists at face-to-face meetings in laboratories throughout the country, we reached the conclusions that are set out in the White Paper, which have also been broadly welcomed.

A Government announcement made this week will be welcomed by my hon. Friend the Member for Bedfordshire, North (Sir T. Skeet). My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education announced further support for specialist bursaries for high-quality engineers who want to undertake undergraduate work. That shows that we are beginning to generate much more coherent policy across Government.

Mr. Michael Connarty (Falkirk, East): The criticism is regularly made that the average stipend for a postgraduate is £4,300 per annum, whereas a graduate can earn an average of £16,000. Neither the White Paper nor the Department of Education commented on that aspect. Is not that situation a fundamental flaw?

Mr. Waldegrave: The hon. Gentleman knows as well as I that there is no shortage of quality applicants. The counter-criticism is that, if anything, too many people apply for the available places.

The Wellcome Trust and other independent trusts reflect the view that those that we want to keep in the research base must have a sense of longer-term support, particularly when they are older. However, we must not resile from acknowledging that, if we are to do that, in a world in which it is extremely unlikely that there will be large increases in funds, fewer may have to be supported at a better level. The hon. Gentleman may have noticed the letter from Sir Hermann Bondi on that very point published in The Times Higher Education Supplement, saying that, if push came to shove, that would be a better way forward.

It is no use opting out and arguing that there must be more money for everything. The Labour party document rather grandly ticked off the science community for asking for more money, saying that it was impertinent of the community to go about its affairs in that way.

Dr. Lynne Jones (Birmingham, Selly Oak): It is good to hear of the right hon. Gentleman's concern for scientists, but is it right to accept that the only way forward is to have fewer scientists when we are falling behind our competitors? The White Paper's solutions for dealing with those on short-term contracts involve paying more money, drawing on additional resources to tide people over, and extra fellowships. Is that the right approach when research councils are already unable to support all the alpha projects that seek funding?

Mr. Waldegrave: The Labour party must make up its mind, as must the country, whether the solution to this, as to all other problems, is to spend a great deal more money. We have markedly expanded the total number of post-doctorates aged between 28 and 34 on short-term contracts since the days when Labour was in power. However, there is an unrealistic expectation that they can all remain in the academic base. They cannot and will not —and most likely, they should not. The pyramid must be sharply defined at that stage, because those who are to spend a lifetime in research should be of the highest quality and exhibit the skills required.

The number of people in this free country who choose —no one will stop them—to enter the research base at that point will need greater help and advice to develop their careers. If it is possible—and it is possible—we should continue to direct universities and research councils to imitate the work done by Wellcome and the Royal Society, with Government money, in providing longer-term support for those whom we want to develop and keep in research careers.

It is no use, either, imagining that they can all be kept in the research base. The Association of British Science told me that it was extremely important to have such people in general management, Parliament and the media. They should be given more assistance and pastoral care in finding jobs.

Our proposal relating to the MSC, which was strongly welcomed by Cambridge university—to take one familiar to the hon. Member for Cambridge (Mrs. Campbell)—and by Peter Swinnerton-Dyer at Cambridge, identifies the MSC as the natural first part of a postgraduate career, which will enable us to ensure that the council has a slightly wider educational base in relation to management and the research process, so that those who find that they are not to stay for ever in the research base will be equipped with experience that will prove really useful to them in industry.

Mrs. Anne Campbell (Cambridge): Much of the discussion about women in science has been sidelined to a working party, and no mention of that aspect is made in the report. What is the right hon. Gentleman's thinking on stopping women dropping out of science when they have children? Many studies have shown that women drop out then and do not return to the main stream of science, but later end up taking low-skilled, low-grade jobs, which is a great loss to the country.

Mr. Waldegrave: That is a problem. Over the years, evidence has shown that scientists—especially the purists, such as pure mathematicians—are at their most creative at child-bearing age, and it is not easy to reconcile two full-time careers. That is why I set up a committee of women scientists, some of whom—for instance, Dr. Nancy Lane—will be well known to the hon. Lady. I do not want to pre-empt the practical suggestions that the committee will make when it reports in the autumn, but I remain optimistic.

I am thinking back to 20 or 30 years ago, when exactly the same arguments were produced about the impossibility of women working in medicine. That has proved not to be impossible after all: although we have a long way to go before we achieve equality in senior appointments, about 50 per cent. of medical school entrants and doctors in training are women. I believe that the same can be achieved in science and engineering.

I am sure that the House will wish to congratulate Dai Rees, secretary of the Medical Research Council, on his well-deserved knighthood. He described our proposals on the reform of postgraduate education and the management of research staff in universities as sensible.

We are not without power to enforce those proposals: one of the criteria governing the direction of university funding via the higher education funding councils and the research councils will relate to the employment practices of the institutions concerned. The new committee over which the chief scientific adviser will preside is already beginning to meet; the funding councils will meet the research councils to discuss the broad issues of the management of the science base on a systematic basis.

The fourth great theme of the White Paper was the importance of public understanding of science, and of increased work to bridge the cultural divide that, after many years, still exists. Our proposals have been given an enthusiastic welcome by, for example, Sir Arnold Wolfendale, the Astronomer Royal, and COPUS—the Committee on the Public Understanding of Science of the Royal Society—the body which brings together many of the associations involved in the campaign for public understanding of science. COPUS said that it warmly welcomed the emphasis on, and recognition of, the importance of heightening public understanding and awareness of science and technology in the Government's White Paper on science. Sir Walter Bodmer, chairman of COPUS, strongly endorsed that view.

Another endorsement has come from someone very skilled—Neil Cossons, director of the science museum, whose name will be familiar to many hon. Members. He congratulated the Government on the White Paper, which he considers a significant step forward in the drive to increase the public understanding of science. He wanted to place on record his full support both for the general thrust of the White Paper and for our proposal for a series of mobile exhibitions, culminating in a national exhibition of science at the museum in the year 2001. We shall be asking for the museum's help with our campaign: its staff are internationally recognised as experts.

I have taken some trouble to identify the wide spectrum of support for the proposals in the White Paper. I believe that the Select Committee will find that many of the recommendations in its first report are reflected in our undertakings. I look forward with interest to the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Pudsey (Sir G. Shaw), who chairs the Committee. We have paid close attention to its recommendations, especially those relating to the role of the OST and the chief scientific adviser. I believe that my hon. Friend the Member for Pudsey and the Committee welcomed the raising of the adviser's status; although we should not worry too much about hierarchical points, I considered it a rather odd signal that other scientific advisers in Whitehall should be senior to him. I should add that Bill Stewart himself would be the last person to lobby for such a change.

Although there has been a broad welcome for the theme of the White Paper, there has been criticism of two aspects. Understandably, some have said, "Lots more money would help." Of course it would; that applies to nearly every spending programme. However, the pressure on public expenditure—which all hon. Members know to be real—redoubles the importance of ensuring that the money that we have is spent properly, where it really matters. Britain is not a particularly low spender; we are in the middle of the pack. It is crucial that Government expenditure—which constitutes less than half the spending of the country as a whole—is undertaken in the closest and most productive conjunction with spending by industry.

According to the score board of the Department of Trade and Industry, British companies' spending increased by about £350 million in 1992. The DTI also points out that analysis of the figures reveals a higher percentage increase among the biggest companies—a rise of about 8 per cent., which is comparable with the rest of the world—and a much lower increase among small and medium-sized enterprises. That led the President of the Board of Trade, in his recent reformulation of the direction of his own innovation budget—which, incidentally, has increased by 15 per cent. this year—to concentrate on small and medium-sized enterprises. I am sure that that is a wise priority.

Dr. Lewis Moonie (Kirkcaldy): Given that our leading companies have done so well, will the right hon. Gentleman tell us how many of them have improved their standing in the world rankings in the past year?

Mr. Waldegrave: The hon. Gentleman is right to ask that question. Our long-term task is to enable all our industry to achieve the best. I am sure the hon. Gentleman will agree that some of the industries with which he has been successfully associated in the past are doing very well. Perhaps we quote the views of the pharmaceutical industry too much, but I believe that the relationship between that industry and the scientific and engineering base are good, and should be duplicated elsewhere.

Mr. James Wallace (Orkney and Shetland): Will the Secretary of State give way? [Interruption.]

Mr. Waldegrave: I will give way, despite the objections of the hon. Member for Jarrow (Mr. Dixon), the Opposition deputy Chief Whip.

Mr. Wallace: The right hon. Gentleman mentioned the increase in the DTI's innovation funding. No doubt he, like other right hon. and hon. Members, has seen the notes from the Save British Science campaign, which claims that the funds have been cut from £135 million last year to £125 million this year, and that that has been presented as an increase. I am somewhat confused by that figure; can the right hon. Gentleman shed any light on it?

Mr. Waldegrave: The innovation budget has increased by 15 per cent. this year. I do not know where the Save British Science campaign got that figure. The argument that calls for huge new expenditure is a cop-out; we must consider the proper management of the enormous sums that are now being spent.

The other criticism is, in a sense, not a criticism at all. Many people have rightly said that the White Paper is not the end of the story, but the beginning: what matters is how we use the new structures. It is essential that we press on quickly with the implementation. I have set out a clear programme for the establishment of the new arrangements, and the first report of the Technology Foresight programme will be produced by the end of 1994. "Forward Look" will be published each April, starting in 1994. The Director-General for the Research Councils—this meets the point that was made by my hon. Friend the Member for Bedfordshire, North—will be in place no later than 1 January 1994. The establishment of the six research councils will take effect from 1 April and the publication and dissemination of data on the stocks and flows of scientists and engineers will begin next year.

In one respect, I want to speed things up. I have decided, following discussions with Sir Robin Nicholson, that the next meeting of the Advisory Committee on Science and Technology should be its last and that we should establish the new Council for Science and Technology by the end of October. We should get on with that, as quickly as possible.

In the words of The Times Higher Education Supplement,

> "The White Paper is the latest and probably the best attempt to address a key problem about British cultural and economic life, the intellectual distance, and the difference in approach, between our ingenious scientists and engineers and the people who run British companies and British governments."

That is the challenge. We have set a framework, which has been very widely welcomed, and I commend the White Paper, backed, as I believe it is, by the helpful work of the Select Committee.

10.10 am

Ms Marjorie Mowlam (Redcar): We welcome the chance to debate science and technology policy. Amazingly, the Chancellor finished with the comment that it is the latest and best attempt to discuss science and technology: in fact, it is the only attempt to discuss science and technology policy for many years. By default, it can certainly be the latest, and possibly the best, attempt.

I was surprised that the Chancellor did not cover an important piece of scientific information that has been in the public domain in the last month. It has been discussed in the national press and the Chancellor has written an article on it. A new scientific law has been invented, which the right hon. Gentleman defined as Waldegrave's law. I shall succinctly describe it for hon. Members who have not had the chance to read about it. There is an inverse relationship: the more important the political matter, the less parliamentary time it is given.

Waldegrave's law clearly holds in relation to science and technology policy, which we have not had an opportunity to debate in Government time in the past 14 years. The only debates in 1988, 1989 and 1991 were all as a result——

Mr. Waldegrave: What about 1992?

Ms Mowlam: If we go back a year and a day, the consultation was announced. The substantive debates were all in Labour time. The last debate, which, again, was on a Friday, was introduced by my hon. Friend the Member for Jarrow (Mr. Dixon).

The Minister said that this is the first realistic attempt at a coherent science policy for 30 years. I would expect him to criticise policy pre-1979. The right hon. Member for Mole Valley (Mr. Baker), who spoke in the previous debate, would not be happy with that comment.

Mr. Waldegrave: I am interested in the hon. Lady's first speech on science and technology. It is true that we have to go back nine years to find the last debate that Labour initiated on science and technology. This is the second debate within 12 months that the Government have introduced.

Ms Mowlam: The debate nine years ago was on a balloted motion, but the debates in 1988, 1989 and 1991 were held in Labour time. It is an important point, given the importance that is attached to the issue, but the Minister cannot get away with pretending that his Government have placed emphasis on science and technology in the past 14 years.

In view of the interest that is being shown in the House this morning in science and technology, I should like to deal with a number of points that the Minister made about the White Paper. I welcome some parts of the White Paper, but my worries are shared by much of industry and they concern not what the White Paper contains but what it patently does not contain. We were subjected to quotes for the first 15 minutes of the Minister's speech. Yes, industry welcomes the plus parts, but I can assure hon. Members that it is deeply worried that the White Paper is merely a structure without the meat to deliver.

Let us look at some of the ingredients that are missing, but are necessary to secure the right infrastructure for science and technology. Labour would like to know that science and technology policy is central to the Government's thinking—that it is at the heart of what drives them forward when the economic situation is as bad as the Minister outlined. The timing of the publication of the White Paper showed the importance that the Government attach to science and technology. As everybody knows, it was published on the same day as the Green Paper on road pricing, taking the debate on science, which many hon. Members would have welcomed, out of the press and the media. That shows either incompetence by Government business managers, which is possible, the importance that Government attach to science policy or the Minister's inability to deliver the crucial centrality of science to Government policy.

The second matter lacking from the White Paper is a coherent strategy across Departments. As the Minister said this morning, coherence across different Departments is essential. Our concern is that the Office of Science and Technology is not strong enough to co-ordinate and lead that national strategy. The Minister has often said that we should debate the meat of his proposals, and we are willing to debate our genuine concern that it is not strong enough to play a co-ordinating and leading role.

Does the Office of Science and Technology have sufficient power to meet the objectives of the White Paper? We must accept that power still resides with many individual Departments. We cannot get away from the fact that 60 per cent. of Government spending on science and technology remains with the Departments. Therefore, can the OST perform that role?

Mr. Waldegrave: There is some lack of clarity in Labour policy here. Is the hon. Lady saying that all the science spend should be concentrated in one Department —that the 60 per cent. of the budget for research and development by, for example, the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food and the Ministry of Defence should be concentrated in one central Department? [Interruption.] The hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Dr. Moonie) is briefing her. I do not think that she means that, but perhaps she would clarify it.

Ms Mowlam: My hon. Friend the Member for Kirkcaldy (Dr. Moonie) is whispering in my ear, but I can happily answer the Minister without that. I like my hon. Friend whispering in my ear; it is a very pleasant experience.

The answer to the Minister's question is that we want more co-ordination between Departments. There must be an overview, which is lacking at present. Let us take two Departments to prove my point.

Mr. Gyles Brandreth (City of Chester): Is not the distinction that we have a Cabinet Minister to co-ordinate policy, whereas the shadow science spokesman is not in the shadow Cabinet?

Ms Mowlam: I am responsible for science and technology in the shadow Cabinet. I also shadow the Minister's responsibilities for the civil service, open government and a range of issues. I believe, although it is not often apparent in the Government, that we should delegate and work as a team. We have to ask, if the hon. Member for City of Chester (Mr. Brandreth) wants to get personal, why the hon. Member for Wantage (Mr. Jackson) left and why he wanted to spend more time on his German lessons than in the Department. We believe in delegation and working together. Yes, there is a voice in the shadow Cabinet on science and technology, but I believe in sharing duties with other Front-Bench colleagues.

A number of Conservative Members nodded in agreement with my point about the Office of Science and Technology. We believe that it should play a co-ordinating and leading role. I do not believe that the White Paper delivers that. The Ministry of Defence is a prime example. There is no mention of "Forward Look" in the White Paper's chapter on the Ministry of Defence. The Government have said that there will be a Government strategy for the better utilisation of defence research and development and for diverting resources from defence to increased civilian spend.

Where is that in the White Paper? Of the many Government documents I have read, the section dealing with the Ministry of Defence strikes me as a blatant example of the Ministry of Defence parachuting in the paragraphs that it wants, without the co-ordination and lead that we had hoped would be forthcoming from the Minister responsible for the OST.

The Minister said that he has ensured greater co-ordination between Departments. In that connection, the LINK programme is emphasised in the White Paper. Supposedly, it has increased the responsibility of the OST by being moved from the DTI. The OST should be undertaking such co-ordination, but, if we examine the detail of the White Paper, it becomes clear that the programme still reports jointly to the two Departments. That is another example of the OST not having the power or bottle. If the Minister doubts that, I refer him to a written question on Wednesday. The answer states:

"The Department of Trade and Industry, like other participating Departments, uses money from its overall research and development budget to support LINK programmes and projects where these provide a way of meeting departmental objectives."—[Official Report, 16 June 1993; Vol. 226, c. 583.]

Clearly, the administration has come to the OST, but the meat of the project remains with the DTI. There are many bold statements in the White Paper, but none of the necessary mechanisms. In that sense, it is not really a White Paper because it does not contain the necessary mechanisms to deliver the science and technology policy that we all want.

As the Minister is not happy with that argument, I cite another example to support my point. Let us consider Technology Foresight. As I said, we welcome many parts of the White Paper, and the Technology Foresight programme is one of them. We are pleased that the practices followed by our technologically advanced companies, which are already followed by our competitors, are to become part of our forward planning. We are also pleased that the Government have got out of the ideological cleft stick of believing that such a programme would be seen as picking winners. I am pleased that the Minister has managed to jump that hurdle and is satisfied that Technology Foresight will point the way forward for industry.

The Government's problem with Technology Foresight is that, although many reports will be circulated, having Technology Foresight will not in itself deliver the necessary changes. We need mechanisms to involve industry to ensure that new technologies will result, but they are lacking. Although, because of time constraints, I do not want to get involved in arguments about why the public sector borrowing requirement is so high or about the economic problems that the Government have created, I accept what the Minister said. We are not arguing that a great deal more money needs to be thrown at the problem, but unless we resource and fund development programmes, what is the point of having Technology Foresight? Without the necessary funding and the mechanisms to involve industry to ensure that the new technologies are delivered, Technology Foresight will do nothing more than circulate good ideas.

It may be apposite to remind the House that while the Chancellor was launching Technology Foresight on the country, the President of the Board of Trade was closing the advanced technology programmes that were supposed to develop the technologies of the future. Is that Technology Foresight in practice?

What new technologies does the aerospace industry think are required? It produced a report calling on the Government to support some joint technological ventures. The DTI response was to ignore and suppress the report. We welcome the general ideas, but we are worried that the OST lacks influence and that the mechanisms do not exist to develop those ideas.

I believe that the same problem applies to the section of the White Paper dealing with near-market research. Submission after submission to the Chancellor during the consultation period called for a change of heart on near-market research. I think that it was Sir John Fairclough, the architect of the policy, who eventually acknowledged that it had not been working all along.

What does the White Paper say about near-market research? Paragraph 2.20 states:

"the Government recognises that circumstances can arise where market forces do not work in a satisfactory manner".

At least we have got that clear; the market alone cannot deliver. Paragraph 2.22 tells us that there is a general presumption that near-market work will continue to be funded by the private sector, but, where that approach breaks down, careful account must be taken

"of the circumstances of each individual case."

I should have more faith in the Government's ability to make a commitment to near-market research if the Chancellor made it clear who or what would be funded. The White Paper presents no criteria.

We and industry need to know whether there will be any avenues of support from the Chancellor's office or from the DTI for near-market research and development other than existing schemes or, as with Technology Foresight, are we to have only window dressing rather than the concrete specifics that will make a difference to science and technology?

I deal now with the advisory bodies announced in the White Paper and which the Minister dealt with this morning, and especially the roles of the Advisory Council on Science and Technology and the Advisory Board for the Research Councils. He said that ACOST is to be replaced by a Council for Science and Technology chaired by the Chancellor, and ABRC is to be wound up and subsumed into the OST. Before the Chancellor says, as he tried to do earlier, that that is what the Labour party wants, let me make it clear to him what changes we believe would have been workable and, in view of the Minister's "open government", would have been more successful in informing the scientific community and others.

ACOST often criticised the Government because it recognised the limits that the Government put on the future of science in this country. What was the Government's response? They internalised the committee and put the Minister in the chair. Ministers disliked the ABRC because it criticised the level of spending on the science base, and the Chancellor's predecessors suppressed some of its reports because they did not like the tone. What happened to the two committees? The ABRC is to be replaced by a Director-General of Research Councils and his expert group of external advisers. The Minister has gone from accountability to anonymity in one leap.

[Ms Mowlam]

We want a solution offering a bit of both worlds. We happily acknowledge that the ABRC needs to be abolished because resource allocation should be carried out internally, but the role of the Council for Science and Technology should be to make recommendations on the science budget to the OST and to hold the Chancellor and the director-general accountable for their actions. That cannot be done by a council to be chaired by the Chancellor himself. It is the lack of openness which worries us. If some hon. Members want to check, I refer them to Wednesday's edition of Hansard. In column 608 of the written answers, it is made clear that the Minister will not encourage the necessary openness.

The part of the document dealing with international subscriptions was also welcomed by the sections of industry listed by the Minister. However, the White Paper must be read carefully at this stage. We are told that the Particle Physics and Astronomy Research Council will "not have to cope entirely within its own grant-in-aid with short term variations in international subscriptions."

We welcome that, because short-term variations and currency fluctuations are a problem. It becomes clear from a closer reading of the document, however, that that will apply not just to one committee but to the entire set-up. In future, therefore, when the Government's economic policy goes awry, the whole scientific community—rather than just one committee, as in the past—will be angry. Many in the scientific community will not welcome that development.

The Opposition have long regarded the attitude to European Community funding as scandalous. This is another respect in which the Minister and the OST are not strong enough to deliver the kind of future that we seek for science and technology. The dead hand of the Treasury is very much in evidence in the relevant part of the White Paper:

"The system of attributing the cost of Community expenditure to Departments has given Departments a clear incentive to seek value for money from Community programmes."

We are interested in getting value for money from different programmes, but the practice of attribution has been universally condemned because it has removed much of the added value that could be gained from the finance from European programmes. The White Paper's reference to attribution will clearly please those who are worried about what the Chief Secretary to the Treasury will do, but if we are seeking value for money from the available financial resources for scientific programmes for the good of the future of science and the nation, this is not the way to achieve it.

I shall not go into the question of PhDs and MSCs in view of the time and the number of hon. Members wishing to speak. I am sure that others will touch on that subject.

The Minister referred to the importance of university education. In addition to 18 to 24-year-olds, however, we must consider those who are still at school. As part of the changes in the national curriculum announced by the Secretary of State for Education recently, it is proposed to remove technology from the list of foundation subjects that are subject to testing—simply because the quality of technology tests has been criticised and because they have been likened to what happens on "Blue Peter" with toilet rolls, egg cartons and the like.

Dr. Robert Spink (Castle Point): The hon. Lady is denigrating engineering.

Ms Mowlam: I am certainly not denigrating engineering. I am questioning the Government's ability to develop an education and testing programme for technology. The Opposition support such testing at age 14, although we do not wish the results to be made public. The Government have been sharply criticised for their lack of ability to deliver decent educational standards for the benefit of our country's children. If we are to prosper in 10, 20 or 30 years' time, our schools must provide the kind of training that will excite children, while giving them a scientific base. In his decision, the Secretary of State for Education has acknowledged the Government's inability to deliver on that.

I shall not refer in detail to privatisation and market testing, except to say that there will be problems if the Minister continues market testing of the kind that has been used so far in research departments in the civil service without stopping to think what the outcome will be. We have asked for a moratorium on market testing for the simple reason that it is driven by the desire to produce results rather by an interest in the future quality of scientific research. I hope that the Minister will have the intelligence to say, "Let us stop and evaluate what has happened. Don't let us go hell for leather." If he does not, he will ultimately destroy much of our scientific base.

The Labour party is fortunate enough to be represented in this place by a number of women and I am sure that, if they catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, my hon. Friends will seek to speak about women in science.

I am happy to welcome the positive aspects of the White Paper, but, as I hope I have shown today, a detailed examination of the document reveals a number of faults and weaknesses, which result, first, from a lack of power and cohesion in the OST and from the Minister's inability to co-ordinate across the Departments and, secondly, from the fact that the Treasury vetoes actions that would improve the position of science and technology. It is a combination of those factors which makes parts of the White Paper weak.

There can be no clearer illustration of the problem than the recently announced closure of the Warren Spring environmental technology laboratory. We have talked about "Forward Look" and about Technology Foresight. Will the Government's forward look really reveal that we need less research into the environment? Will technology forecasts say that environmental technology will not be a growth area in Britain in future? We must look not only at what the Government are saying but at what they are doing. The reality is that the DTI budget has been squeezed so far that it now has no choice but to destroy its own science and technology infrastructure—and there is nothing that the Minister or the OST can do to stop that.

The White Paper makes great play of the words "realising our potential". We should remember that the verb "to realise" has two meanings: it means "to understand" and it means "to achieve". After the long consultation period and the production of the White Paper, our understanding may be greater, which I welcome, but, for the reasons that I have given this morning, I fear that there will be a failure to achieve. That will be bad for the future development of Britain.

Several hon. Members rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Geoffrey Lofthouse): There are three hours 55 minutes available for the rest of the debate and no fewer than 21 hon. Members are hoping to catch my eye. I hope that those who are called early in the debate will bear that in mind.

Sir Giles Shaw (Pudsey): I am grateful for this opportunity to take part in the debate as Chairman of the Select Committee on Science and Technology, and I thank my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House for agreeing to arrange the debate early, and before too much time has elapsed following the publication of the White Paper.

Let me express my appreciation to my colleagues on the Select Committee on Science and Technology for allowing me to chair that Committee and for allowing us to produce a report in record time—as we did last autumn—to add to the discussion about the White Paper on science and technology. Sadly, I speak as a non-scientist—a matter of great regret to the members of my Committee, I understand. I have spent about 19 years in manufacturing industry, however, and can therefore claim that there will be some connection between my remarks and relevant experience. When the Committee prepared the report, we were dealing with proposals relating to the White Paper that we are now debating. We offer our approval to my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster for much of what he has done, but on other matters we remain critical and unconvinced.

I am delighted to follow the hon. Member for Redcar (Ms Mowlam). The hon. Gentleman——

Ms Mowlam: Lady.

Sir Giles Shaw: What a terrible thing my lack of science is, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The hon. Lady was being a little hard when she said that the publication of the White Paper could be taken as proof positive of the actions that would follow. She and I know that new policy directions outlined in White Papers are in practice never embarked on without further changes and further pressures. I assure the hon. Lady that, on many of the issues that we are discussing today, the Select Committee will act as a careful and critical observer of what happens and will push and shove to try to ensure that some of the developments that the hon. Lady rightly seeks come to pass. I am sure that that is what my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster would expect.

Changes to the advisory bodies—the Advisory Committee on Science and Technology and the Advisory Board for the Research Councils—have been recommended by many organisations, including my Committee. We welcome the proposals in the White Paper setting up the Council for Science and Technology. I do not share the anxiety expressed by the hon. Member for Redcar about the fact that it will be chaired by the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster. I regard my right hon. Friend's position in the Department as central if the Government are committed to raising the profile of science in the Government. That will strengthen the position of the policies that flow from the Government. We will be looking with great interest, as will outsiders, at the membership of the council and how that membership will be distributed between the various parties that must be positioned within it.

With regard to the reorganisation of the research councils, there is a general feeling among many organisations that the structure and mission of the councils need changing. My Committee recommended that the concept of a mission-oriented research council should be more fully debated, that missions should be more fully worked out and the cost-benefit studies carried through.

Frankly, it does not surprise me that there has been no opportunity for as rigorous an investigation as we might have hoped for during the preparation of the White Paper. However, I welcome the changes and I strongly hope that, when they are speedily established—my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster announced that they would be established very speedily—there will be a period of stability for the new system to allow it to take root and to flourish effectively.

I believe that Technology Foresight is probably one of the most important initiatives—albeit belatedly in relation to the United Kingdom—for the Government to undertake. Many people believe that the Government's efforts to support winners in science and technology are not always the best ideas. That is clear from projects such as Comet and TSR2. However, a co-ordinated programme of research foresight technology to select future generic technologies to make them applicable across a number of scientific disciplines is surely a very welcome step and one which many of our main competitors, particularly America and Germany, have used extensively for many years.

Research foresight activity on its own is not enough. Using findings in industry to make new and better products ahead of the competition is surely the key to wealth creation. I suspect that my Select Committee will want to monitor those developments extremely carefully to relate them to the actuality of the technology produced and, one hopes, see real improvements in competitiveness in our economy.

I want now to consider the "Forward Look". The preparation by the Office of Science and Technology of an annual "Forward Look", which greatly extends the scope of the current annual review of Government funded R and D, will provide more openness and will allow us to judge the OST and the policy that it pursues. Any Select Committee would welcome that degree of commitment by the Department that it is technically monitoring on behalf of the House. I believe that that will be one of the key changes that the Select Committee will want to expand and explore in the years to come.

Whether the policy will be implemented effectively will, of course, depend on the Department's willingness to comply. In that regard, I believe that one of the key points that I share with the hon. Gentleman, the hon. Member for Redcar—[Interruption.] I am sorry, the hon. Lady. I suppose that I score zero in the attainment test: eight for creative expression and zero for technical experience.

The important point is whether the policy to which I referred will be implemented effectively. The willingness to comply will be the crucial factor. There is anxiety because the way in which the Government's research is departmentalised at the moment will continue uninfluenced. However, I set considerable store by the co-ordinated regime set in place under the chief scientific officer, whose upgrading the Committee recommended and whose appointment I am pleased to welcome. In addition, I place considerable emphasis on the way in which, when these isues are debated, there will be genuine priorities that will be genuinely agreed and which will stick.

If that happens, I believe, unlike the hon. Member for Redcar, that that will lead to genuine prioritisation within the Office of Science and Technology. As my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster is aware, my Committee was clearly of the opinion that ultimately there should be a Ministry for Science which would develop and produce policy and outline and implement policy for the scientific and technological development of this country.

Education is obviously a huge theme in any discussion of science and technology. The White Paper's recognition of the critical importance of education and training is greatly welcomed. In my Committee's interview recently with expert witnesses, education and training of young people below university standard was revealed to be the area which gives major cause for concern. It affects the ability of companies to accommodate changes in work practice to take into account new technologies with the same speed and flexibility as their overseas competitors. A very close eye must be kept on the way in which education in science and technology delivers the goods, and I am sure that my Committee will do that.

I suspect that defence R and D is the biggest problem with which my right hon. Friend the Chancellor has to deal, and I know that he is a man of considerable patience. It is clear from the White Paper that although the words may be useful and amiable in their way, they do not betoken a significant shift of defence R and D to civil expenditure. Defence R and D is the greatest recipient of Government research funding at the moment and we have suffered, along with America and France, in relation to the amount of civil funding compared with that in Japan and Germany, which have negligible defence R and D.

On a global scale, the ending of the cold war must be the biggest influence on the way in which the structure and organisation of science and technology investment can now be changed. The demand for defence-specific R and D in the west is certain to fall and the United Kingdom will be no exception. That reduction should not be seen as an opportunity to reduce total Government spending. Instead, the funding must be transferred to civil R and D.

Furthermore, defence R and D should, unless there are cogent reasons against it, be designed with spin-off and spin-in measures with civil activity as a key purpose. I hope that the OST will look closely at that. Sadly, although the White Paper recognises that aim, it does not provide the OST with any control in that respect and it relies heavily on the co-operation of the Ministry of Defence. I expect that my Committee will look at that aspect very keenly in the years to come.

Innovation is surely the key to wealth creation in this country; it has been the subject of a House of Lords Select Committee on Science and Technology and it is a key component of my Committee's investigations. Without effective innovation, no amount of research foresight activity, international collaboration or other activities described in the White Paper will lead to the creation of wealth, which is absolutely essential to our future.

Japan has few basic research achievements if one considers the number of Nobel prizes that Japan has won. However, Japan has been inordinately successful in exploiting technology and creating wealth. As my right hon. Friend will know, my Committee is currently investigating the way in which the science base may be translated into competitive and innovative technology and we will be visiting Japan later in the year. Information to date leads to the view that there is an endemic problem in our education, training and culture which must be addressed.

The Committee recommended that it would be appropriate for the OST to have an overview of schemes intended to encourage innovation in industry to ensure that Departments worked to common policies and that all schemes were part of a coherent framework for providing industry support. I urge the importance of that activity and hope that there will be close co-operation between all the Departments concerned. We recommended that the OST and the Department of Trade and Industry should work to ensure that the near-market policy on research funding is re-examined. Reference has already been made to that and we welcome the signs that that policy will be relaxed. We welcome even more the evidence that it has been relaxed.

In respect of R and D funding, few would argue with the basic proposition that investment in science ultimately creates wealth. It is, therefore, becoming more apparent that wealth is often a precondition for that investment. The oft-lamented view that the United Kingdom does not invest enough in R and D is not just a problem for consideration by the Government alone; it should also be considered by industry. Of estimated United Kingdom civil research funding in 1990 of £9·4 billion, just under 60 per cent. was funded by industry and 28 per cent. by the Government. That figure for industry compares with 60 per cent. in Germany, 70 per cent. in Japan—the highest of any nation—and 40 per cent. in France.

While we have our current public sector borrowing requirement problems, it is unlikely that significant additional Government funding of civil research will be forthcoming. However, we must ensure that savings in defence R and D are transferred to the civil side. At the same time, industry must be encouraged to increase its expenditure and the City and shareholders must be pressed to face up to the importance of such expenditure to companies and, thus, to the country. Sadly, no action is proposed on that in the White Paper. What is needed now is a follow-up to the White Paper which considers industry and sources of finance and the investigations that my Committee might undertake to ensure that there are proper routes by which long-term funding can be directed towards industrial development in R and D.

On the international side, the extent to which the same new or generic technologies are reflected in each country's list of priorities is remarkable. Together with the significant levels of investment often required in setting up research facilities, that means that collaborative research is increasingly taking place, and I welcome that. That may involve the setting up of common facilities like CERN or the European bio-information institute which we are pleased to see will be located here, or it may just involve collaboration between organisations in different countries, as happens in the framework programme.

Whatever the situation, the OST must ensure that the interests of the United Kingdom are fully reflected in such collaborative projects, that United Kingdom organisations are aware of and fully participate in such projects, whether or not the United Kingdom is directly involved. We must take every opportunity to host international scientific facilities when they are germane to United Kingdom interests. Although the Economic Community is a prime region for collaboration, we should not neglect opportunities with other countries.

We are pleased that the dual funding policy is to continue. We consider it important, as do our colleagues on the House of Lords Select Committee, that universities continue to be regarded as whole institutions.

Let me refer to one or two broader themes. It is widely recognised that the United Kingdom's science base is competitive and internationally respected; indeed, our clutch of Nobel prizes are strong, but it is a fact that the tendons of technology are less well developed for a major industrial economy such as ours. I respect the view that manufacturing industry itself must be the lead influence for turning science into innovative technology. Customer pull, in the jargon of marketing, must be the preferred route.

There is no denying that for long periods there has been industrial decline in this country. The 19th century smoke-stack industries became obsolete, or failed to generate funds for investment, or failed in the free competition that faced them, or failed when imperial markets disappeared, or failed in countless recessions or economic difficulties, or failed when those who owned or managed them had not the talent so to do—a whole range of reasons, a whole range of excuses. That has passed. But with the demise, our industrial culture also departed. To revive our industrial culture must be our first priority. It starts with education. How we welcome the development, albeit belatedly again, of a proper design and technology and science and technology base for all children passing through our education stream.

The emphasis must shift back towards the importance of industry in general and the making of things in particular. The link between the creation of new materials and products on the one hand and the creation of wealth on the other hand must also be re-established. We must lift, too, the status of our engineers and our producers, as they do in Germany. The belief that "profit" is a dirty word must give way to the recognition that risk should be rewarded and that commercial success in the marketplace has to be applauded.

I am glad that non-vocational qualifications and the various derivatives therefrom are being rapidly developed to stand alongside other academic qualifications. Let us never forget that small or medium-sized enterprises will be looking to schools rather than to universities to provide the skills that they need to make things happen in the marketplace.

If we are serious, too, about regaining the jobs that were so tragically lost by recession in recent years, the creation of new small businesses is much more likely to help than the expansion of larger ones when it comes to a decision on increasing jobs. New investment in new technology in large companies is frequently based on a reduction in manning levels. The preferable basis for a decision to invest in new manufacturing technology is to add values to the product and to improve quality for the consumer. Ultimately, science and technology must be judged as ingredients—important, but ingredients only—in improving consumer satisfaction. It is the consumer in the marketplace who ultimately determines all commercial success. Any restoration of our industrial culture and any improvement in our technology must be matched, too, by an improvement in our capacity to market products effectively.

The White Paper is forward looking. I trust that it will be a catalyst for change to help to secure Britain's place in the intensely competitive and challenging environment in which our future lies.

10.53 am

Mr. Gordon Oakes (Halton): I warmly welcome what the hon. Member for Pudsey (Sir G. Shaw) has said. I agree with almost every word, and I applaud the way in which he delivered his sentiments. Whether or not the hon. Gentleman has scientific qualifications, the Select Committee on Science and Technology is in very safe hands if speeches of that calibre emanate from its Chairman.

As the hon. Gentleman said, this subject is absolutely vital to the future of our nation. Look at Britain—we are a small, fairly overcrowded island, and we have few, if any, natural resources. However, we have the skill and inventiveness of our people. The White Paper might further enhance and co-ordinate the inventiveness of our people.

If this matter is the Government's top priority—the Secretary of State indicated that it was—why, oh why, have this debate on a Friday? Friday is the only working day of the week when hon. Members can have contact with their constituencies. They need to be either in their constituencies or on their way to them on Fridays. Twenty-one hon. Members are present on a Friday—probably the highest attendance ever on a Friday for non-Maastricht business—in order to contribute to the debate. I should have thought that we could have had prime time for such an important subject.

Like my hon. Friend the Member for Redcar (Ms Mowlam), I agree with much of what is in the White Paper, but I am worried about its implementation. The White Paper says all the right things—some of them new, some of them pious—with which few people could disagree, but how will it be implemented? As my hon. Friend asked, where is the co-ordination between Departments?

What happens when there are breakthroughs in science and engineering, particularly engineering? We are a nation of inventors—look at the number of Nobel prizes that this small country wins, and, in particular, at the pharmaceutical industry and the number of lives that have been saved because of inventions in this country. How often are British inventions developed abroad? The White Paper does not address that problem. The Secretary of State might say that that is a problem for the Department of Trade and Industry—indeed it is—but I want co-ordination.

The fault lies not with our scientific research, our inventors or even our company managements, but largely with the banks. The banks cannot see further than their noses or further than a week's profit. When something is invented or a breakthrough occurs, the company and inventor concerned want to develop it in this country, but they cannot do so because of a lack of funding from our banks. No country—certainly not the United States, Japan or most of our European competitors—would allow brilliant inventions and breakthroughs to be developed in other countries. The list is endless, as all hon. Members know.

Did the Secretary of State have discussions with, or make representations to, his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health when the limited list was considered? There is no doubt that if the limited list is accepted in the form in which it was proposed, it will kill stone dead research in the pharmaceutical industry, one of our most profitable industries.

When the limited list was introduced in such a rough-handed way, in every sphere in which it applied, research and development were stopped in the relevant branch of medicine. The Association of British Pharmaceutical Industry spells that out in detail in an advertisement in The House magazine.

I am not saying that cuts do not have to be made in drug expenditure—they do. However, there are other ways to tackle it. I hope that the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancanster, who has special responsibility for science and technology, will have a word with the Secretary of State for Health and say, "Look what you will do to research in the pharmaceutical industry if you proceed in that way."

My hon. Friend the Member for Redcar mentioned the fact that no extra money will emanate from the White Paper, especially with regard to defence. Of course, defence expenditure will decrease. Thank God it will. It was bound to decrease, because our biggest defence threat is rapidly disappearing. We still need forces, but we do not need the same amount of research that we had at one time because of the sophisticated equipment that our potential enemies might have had. Where has the money gone? There will be a net loss to research and development when the defence budget is reduced.

I quote from a briefing document from the Save British Science campaign that puts the matter excellently and more succinctly than I could:

"The MoD is the government's biggest spender on R and D, a massive £2·6 billion p.a. But it has clearly kept a considerable distance from the White Paper and has contributed nothing of significance to the overall approach.

There are no plans, similar to those for example in the USA, to employ MoD facilities to aasist industry of the S and EB.

None of the past reduction of defence R and D expenditure, now about £0·6 billion less p.a., has been transferred of civil R and D."

That is a glaring omission from the White Paper—it has not been properly tackled. The funding that has hitherto gone to research and development will be lost for ever.

I have another concern—it is a niggling point because, obviously, my base is on the chemistry side of research and development. There is considerable concern in the Chemical Industries Association and the Royal Society of Chemistry about the way in which some of the funds and research councils are being set up, which could act to the detriment of chemistry as a subject.

I quote from an excellent document produced by Mr. Stephen Benn of the Royal Society of Chemistry:

"For example, take the case of biological organic chemistry which is crucial to the new developments in the pharmaceutical industry. The Society is concerned that funding for this important and exciting new area will fall between two stools. Why? Because (a) the Chemistry Committee (or equivalent) of the new EPSRC will not fund such research on the grounds that it seems like biology; (b) The new BBSRC will also not fund this work because they will give preference (naturally enough) to more obvious biological research. In summary: while biologists have three RCs to approach for funding . . . and physicists have two RCs . . . chemistry is in danger of not having one single obvious RC to call 'home'."

That is a real problem. I hope that the Royal Society of Chemistry will be one of the organisations that sit on the advisory bodies as it can give invaluable independent advice to central Government.

Environmental research will probably replace defence research at the top of our agenda. Environmental research is a new frontier science, because, if we are to advance as a nation with the standard of comfort to which we are accustomed, the only sphere of activity that can clean up the planet are those who have polluted it. The only salvation for this country—or, indeed, the world—lies in what our chemical industry can do to redress the imbalance of the past and ensure that it does not happen again.

I am proud of ICI in my constituency and its research and development. I am proud of the fact that it developed an ozone-friendly substance called KLEA which does not contain chlorofluorocarbons. The company has had nothing but coals heaped on its head after spending £100 million and making a breakthrough that led the world. Greenpeace still attacks it, and says that the substance is not the answer. I do not know what Greenpeace wants instead of KLEA.

That is an example of a company spending a vast amount of resources, making the breakthrough and producing the substance in my constituency across the river at Runcorn but getting nothing but abuse for its activities. We must stop behaving in that silly way towards our industries and criticising them.

I have so much that I want to say, but many hon. Members on both sides of the House wish to speak. I do not want to be accused of abusing my position as a Privy Councillor by giving a long speech or being called early in the debate. I agree with what the White Paper says about the importance of science education at an early age: it is an age-old problem. In those far-off days before 1979 when we had a Labour Government, I was the Minister of State responsible for higher education and science. At that time, the problem had been there for 20 or 30 years and it is still there now. It is not a party-political problem.

The problem is the lack of attention that is given to science as it is pushed lower down the curriculum in our schools and the preference that many of us and the media have for the arts. People will look at a cathedral, say that it is a wonderful structure and ask: "How could the mind of man devise this?" They never look at a machine in that way, yet it is just as important as far as the practical lives of people are concerned.

We should face the fact that science is more difficult at examination level. Science subjects are more difficult than the arts and that deters some people. Science costs more. Certainly, the higher one goes up the scale, the more a science degree costs, compared to an arts degree. That may be a deterrent to hard-pressed local authorities, hard-pressed opt-out schools, and so on. They will clip the money available for science, because it is expensive.

The real problem does not lie with science teaching, or lack of it. It lies with another subject—mathematics. We cannot have an innumerate scientist, whether it is archaeology, astronomy or zoology and right through the gamut of the sciences. If a youngster does not have a mathematical base, he can never become a scientist or an engineer. It is important that although the White Paper stresses science, it does not stress mathematics sufficiently. People who want to become scientists but do not have that mathematical foundation are doomed to failure, because they cannot advance in their subject.

Mrs. Anne Campbell: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the new system of university funding, which effectively downgrades mathematics compared with other practical science subjects, is damaging the provision of mathematicians and, ultimately, our science base?

Mr. Oakes: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend. It was bad enough before—as my hon. Friend rightly said, it is now going in the wrong direction altogether.

This subject is not a party-political one—it is too important. As I said at the outset, it is vital to the whole future of this nation. It is essential if we are to create jobs. But it is more than that. If we are to keep the jobs we have at present, there must be a co-ordinated foundation of research in science and engineering.

When the Minister sets up the research councils and undertakes his future activities in Cabinet, I beg him to fight his ministerial colleagues for science and research development and not let them blindly damage the structure of research and development, whether it is the Ministry of Defence, the Department of Health or any other Government Department. I urge him to fight for the future foundations of science in this country.

11.9 am

Mr. Robert Jackson (Wantage): For me it is a welcome coincidence that this debate comes so soon after I left the Department dealing with the issues that we are discussing today. Ex-Ministers retain some relevant inside knowledge of their former Department for perhaps a month after leaving it, so I am still just within my sell-by date. I assure my right hon. and hon. Friends that I do not intend to follow recent precedent and turn what I have to say into any sort of personal statement. [HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."]

I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Boothferry (Mr. Davis), who has taken over from me as Parliamentary Secretary to the Office of Public Service and Science. I hope that he enjoys, in his first departmental office, what Macaulay described as

"that closely watched slavery that is mocked by the name of Power."

I was pleased to have had the opportunity to take part in the discussion within the Government that led up to the publication last month of the White Paper on science and technology. I shall always remember with special pleasure and real affection the officials and leading scientists with whom I was privileged to work.

I want to speak essentially about the Government's role in general support for science and technology, especially through the research councils. Another large topic concerns the role of Departments as customers for research, upon which I hope that the House will be allowed to have a debate in good time for the conclusion of the further review that is announced in the White Paper. Many constituencies will be affected, and hon. Members should have an opportunity to consider the issues.

The White Paper embodies a carefully constructed balance between what are perceived to be two distinct concerns: the concern that Government support for science should be directed to the most intellectually significant work; and the concern that the public funds devoted to science should show demonstably useful returns for the people of the country, especially in terms of wealth creation.

The House will notice that I say that those two concerns are "perceived" to be distinct. That is certainly, I am afraid, the case within Whitehall. In my experience, however—my right hon. Friend reported this in his opening speech—the more informed and far-sighted industrialists recognise that the best way for the Government to support wealth creation is for them to nourish the science base and the ideas and highly trained people that it produces.

The main message that I want to leave with the House is that it is critical that, in the implementation of the White Paper policies, a proper balance should be maintained between those two concerns.

It is important that Government spending on science and technology should have a clear, easily recognised and explained rationale. Otherwise, matters that should be treated on a long-term basis will be overwhelmed by the whims of Whitehall fashion, or lost to sight in the all-too-brief half-life of the passing parade of Ministers.

It is also important to recognise that, while the role of Government in support of science is of critical importance, it is, inevitably and necessarily, a limited role. Putting on one side, for another occasion I hope, the question of how Departments should manage the direct procurement of science for their departmental purposes, the central role of Government in supporting science and technology, as the White Paper clearly argued in chapter 3, is to remedy what economic analysis identifies as a "market failure" in research and development.

Fundamental, speculative science and strategic generic science and technology are necessary for the progress of any science-based economy. As the White Paper clearly says, because of the speculative nature of that work, the long lead time involved and the inescapable openness of most research involving academics, market-orientated operators cannot be expected to fund that kind of work in any comprehensive or reliable manner. The essential role of the Government in supporting science is to fill that gap.

It must not, however, be the role of the Government to second-guess business in respect of the application of R and D to commercial ventures. Paragraph 2.20 of the White Paper makes the point clearly that the Government are not equipped to make commercial decisions. More fundamentally, the effect of too much Government involvement in business decisions about R and D is to diminish the sense of responsibility for R and D within business.

One of the most hopeful achievements of the 1980s, making for greater competitiveness in British business, was the growing recognition in our boardrooms that such matters as R and D and training are too important to be left to the Government. I hope that we will do nothing in the 1990s to undermind that dawning enlightenment.

One of the reasons, above all, why the Government must limit their aspirations in the matter of supporting R and D for business is, quite simply, that the resources that the Government have available for general support for science and technology are, regrettably, extremely limited. The scale of investment required for R and D for business in a science-based economy quite simply dwarfs the resources that are allocated in general support for science by the Government.

Moreover, it is a simple fact that, in an economy whose leading companies are more and more global in their scale and aspirations, the name of the game in R and D has long ceased to be to exploit the intellectual resources of only one country.

If it is true that the Government's investment in general support for science is simply too small to have much leverage upon R and D for business, it is also true, however, that those limited funds are already more than overstretched in fulfilling what I have described as the central role for the Government in this matter—support for fundamental and strategic science.

The bottom line, as they say, is that any significant shift of Government R and D funding to support what are taken to be business objectives will, in the first place, never be enough to make much difference to business and, secondly, could have potentially catastrophic effects upon the availability of resources for basic and strategic science.

To be more concrete, let me give some figures to illustrate what I mean. Twenty per cent. of the annual research councils' budget amounts to some £240 million. That sum equates to no more than 4 per cent. of the estimated annual spend by British industry on R and D. Yet that £240 million covers just about the whole of the cost of the Medical Research Council, on which we spend currently £257 million, or it equates to the cost of supporting all the work done in astronomy and particle physics, at a cost of £190 million, together with the whole of the sum devoted to the Economic and Social Research Council—£53 million.

I have spoken of the White Paper as embodying a carefully calculated balance between the concern for good science and the concern for wealth creation. I hope that what I have said so far explains why that balance is important. Now let me say something about some of the critical points on which the maintenance of that balance will depend and concerning which I believe that the House would be right to exercise great vigilance. I hope and believe that the Select Committee on Science and Technology will play a leading role in that.

First of all, and perhaps most fundamental, there is the question of the balance between OPSS-funded activities and those funded by other Departments, notably by the Department of Trade and Industry. I regret that the White Paper was unable to furnish evidence of a conclusive understanding on that point.

I hope that my right hon. Friend will pay close attention to decisions taken by other Departments that might create pressures for compensating activity on his part. I hope that neither he nor the research councils will feel it necessary to divert their efforts to make good gaps that may be created by decisions, especially the unilateral decisions, of other Departments.

Next, there is the question of the general direction of the research councils, which has already been mentioned today, and on which I received a reassuring answer from my right hon. Friend at Question Time recently. My right hon. Friend recognises that he assumed a great responsibility when he persuaded the Prime Minister to create a Ministry for science. That major step towards centralisation has had the inevitable consequence of the end of the Advisory Board for the Research Councils—the ABRC—as a quasi-executive body, at arm's length from the Government, operating as a buffer between them and the research councils.

The role played by the ABRC is now to be played within OPSS by the Director-General for Research Councils. It is critical that the person filling that position should understand the world of fundamental science, and that he or she should have an understanding of the role that reflects the rationale for research council funding and the balances that are set forth in the research White Paper.

Each individual research council has a new mission statement, promulgated, no doubt constitutionally, in the White Paper. Those mission statements are carefully balanced, along the lines that I have described. It is critical that the new chairmen of the research councils, drawn as they all will be from business, should honour that balance, together with their council and chief executives. I hope that they will never be allowed to forget that they are independent organisations operating under royal charters, not Departments or dependencies of the Government. Their accountability is essentially for how they spend the money allocated to them, not for what they spend it on within the terms of their charters.

One of the White Paper's welcome features is the creation of the new Particle Physics and Astronomy Research Council, which should help to sustain support for the important fundamental sciencies by reducing the extent of direct competition for their funding with other research council activities. However, it is essential that the words of the White Paper and the new mission statements about the continuing responsibility for basic science of all the research councils should be respected. The PPARC must not be allowed to become an alibi for a general retreat from fundamental science.

Another key point of balance relates to universities. The White Paper proposes to retain the dual support system. I am glad about that, because, within reason, decentralisation and pluralism and the multiplicity of decision centres are necessary for success in supporting speculative science. But it is important to emphasise two implications of retaining the dual support system which are not sufficiently recognised in the White Paper.

First, because they constitute only one side of the dual support system, the research councils cannot develop new funding policies without reference to the universities. The university research economy depends on inputs from the research councils and, because of the limited funds available for those purposes, even a quite small redirection of research council funding could have serious effects on research in universities. That is another point of balance which will need careful watching.

There is a second and wider issue relating to the dual support system, which involves the new machinery for co-ordinating research councils and higher education funding councils described in the White Paper. Just as the balance in the White Paper between concern for scientific excellence and concern for science and technology in support of business must be carefully honoured and respected, so the same balance must be reflected in the working of the university side of the dual support system.

While it is a vulgar category mistake to suppose that applied research and development cannot embody excellent science, there should be no departing in university or research councils from the principle that the limited funds provided by the Government for research must be applied only in support of scientifically significant and valuable work.

Critical mass in research is important. It has been recognised, at least since the ABRC study in 1987, that the research money provided to universities has been dispersed too much and insufficiently concentrated on centres of excellence. Current HEFC research policy is producing a desirable shift to the best research departments in the leading research universities. It would be a matter of great concern if that policy were to be reversed in the name of relevance to wealth creation.

I have given merely an outline of a few of the difficult balances that my right hon. Friend and my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Secretary, and those who work with them, will have to keep in mind as they implement the White Paper. I am sure of their good will for science in the task, and hopeful of their success—and that of their successors—in it. However, I do not think that all parts of the Government have either understood or accepted the rationale for Government support for science and technology which I have described and which I believe is embodied in the White Paper.

Ultimately, we all have to recognise that the Whitehall machine is a pretty crude operation, and there is always the danger that the nuanced and subtle elegancies of policy balance in a White Paper will in practice be boiled down into simple and potentially destructive operational conclusions. I know that my right hon. Friend will want to ensure that that does not happen.

On this, perhaps rather minatory, note, let me briefly add a few concluding words about one of the great gaps in the White Paper—that relating to defence, on which I share the perceptions of my right hon. Friend the Member for Pudsey, the Chairman of the Select Committee. I do not want to sound like the Irishman who, when asked for directions, answered that he would not start from where his interlocutor found himself. I well understand the Government's dilemma in relation to defence research. Defence industries are already under great strain, and the motto "Let's not make the situation even more difficult" has consequently been the order of the day.

However, the true starting point for the debate must be the recognition that, as one of the big three after the war, aspiring still to sit at the top table, Britain has now for four decades taxed herself for military purposes beyond the strength of her economy.

One of the most serious aspects of that overtaxing is the absorption of scarce scientific and technological talent in defence-related work, with little or no civilian benefit and with high opportunity costs from the diversion of efforts from civilian purposes. The result is that far too many of Britain's leading industrial concerns are defence-dependent—an effect reinforced by generations of industrial strategists in high places investing in the existing and politically influential, and confusing success in subsidised exporting with the achievement of real and positive economic returns.

I shall suggest an alternative industrial strategy for those who are so rightly anxious to promote competitiveness and innovation in British industry. The cold war has ended, the requirement for sophisticated weapons is collapsing and, after the Iran debacle, international arms registers are the order of the day. The military bias of British and American industry in the post-war period no longer makes political sense—just as Japanese competition has long shown that it does not make economic or industrial sense.

What is needed is an industrial strategy designed to facilitate the most rapid shift of resources freed from a contracting defence industry to be used in competitive industries serving civilian markets. I make no judgment about how it would be best to do that, except to say that market mechanisms will work most effectively.

The hon. Member for Redcar (Ms Mowlam) has been showing approval for some of my remarks so far, but I have to say that I am deeply sceptical about Labour's idea of a defence conversion agency. Whatever way is chosen, I have no doubt that it is in that sphere that the present generation of Ministers has the best hope of improving long-term British industrial competitiveness.

If that effort were to be undertaken, not the least important of the resources to be freed would be the huge resources of scientific and technological brainpower that are still tied up in our defence industries. It is a pity that the Government have missed the opportunity to address that topic in all its depth and scale in the first major science and technological statement for 20 years, which comes at a time when the end of the cold war has so self-evidently created an occasion for a fundamental rethink on the subject.

A dangerous fallacy is still lurking in the air—that some way can be found to erect a strategy securing British industrial competitiveness on the basis of the Government's support for science and technology. I hope that I have shown why that idea is both misconceived and deeply threatening to one of Britain's remaining areas of undoubted world-class excellence—its excellence in fundamental science.

The Government's White Paper provides a basis from which that fallacy can be combated. Buy my last word today is that the influence of that fallacy will be successfully resisted only if my right hon. Friend and my hon. Friend, and those who work with them, stand by the settlement embodied in the White Paper and hold fast to the rationale for their work which it sets forth.

Mr. James Wallace (Orkney and Shetland): I am sure that the House is indebted to the hon. Member for Wantage (Mr. Jackson) for his contribution. He may not be a member of the Front-Bench team now, but the insights that he gave in his analysis of military research and development and its consequences, and the importance of the science base, are valuable. I am sure that he will continue to make such contributions from the Back Benches.

Although the hon. Gentleman said that his speech was not a personal statement, it contained echoes of other personal statements when the hon. Gentleman slightly lifted the veil on what has been going on within and between Departments. That confirmed many of our suspicions.

In order to catch the last plane to my constituency this evening I shall have to leave before the end of the debate. I have written to Madam Speaker about that and told the Front-Bench spokesmen. I shall read the report of the debate in Hansard.

The Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, who has explicit responsibility for science and engineering technology, is not just any Cabinet Minister but one who, by his performance today and in the past, shows clear enthusiasm and commitment. Contrary to what we have heard from the Opposition, this is the second such debate that we have had in Government time in 53 weeks. The White Paper heralds the biggest shake-up in the approach to science for two decades.

In view of all those ingredients, we should be excited at the prospect of a serious attempt to come to grips with a hitherto neglected and undervalued area of our national life. However, I fear that all too soon the excitement will disappear and we shall be left with the feeling that we have missed yet another opportunity for British science. The extent to which the Chancellor of the Duchy used quotes to try to buoy his case suggests that he also appreciates that.

As some hon. Members have already said, problems will be produced not so much by what is in the White Paper as what is not. However, it would be wrong to be wholly critical because the document contains positive proposals. The Technology Foresight exercise offers the prospect of a more purposeful sense of direction. Its embodiment of the annual "Forward Look" and the emphasis on a more open approach are welcome developments. I hope that there will be a more open approach and that we shall not see narrow objectives and straitjackets. The document is an opportunity to bring science and technology, Government and industry into a much more constructive partnership.

The Chancellor of the Duchy identified one of the criticisms of the White Paper, although he would claim that it is misplaced. It is the White Paper's failure to address funding. That is not a matter for another time and another place, because the issue is crucial. We take the view that the White Paper fails adequately to address industry's poor record on innovation and what can be done about it. I welcome the comments by the hon. Member for Pudsey (Sir G. Shaw), who is the Chairman of the Select Committee on Science and Technology, about the current investigation into innovation. We look forward to the conclusions. Both those failures point to an underlying failure by Government Departments to get their act together. The speech by the hon. Member for Wantage confirms that.

Almost every hon. Member who has spoken so far has mentioned the Ministry of Defence. The White Paper contains no strategy for conversion from military to civilian research and development. Jobs are at stake the length and breadth of Britain from central Scotland to —dare I mention it?—Siemens Plessey Systems in Christchurch. If there is no strategy, many talented people will take their talents abroad, and that will be a great loss to the nation.

It is important to acknowledge past achievements, not least in basic science research. That has been generously funded over many years, but, although the Government may claim that during their 14 years in office there has been an increase, the application of a proper deflator to increases in salaries and in the cost of equipment shows that there has been a real reduction in resources for science over the past 14 years. During that period of reduction in our country, most of our competitors, recognising the importance of science in supporting modern industry, have been increasing their commitment to academic research.

There is a need to inject more resources and to make sure that we offer attractive careers to our young scientists. That means tackling low academic salaries and providing a career structure. I regret that, in response to an intervention, the Minister seemed to take a complacent attitude to that, reflecting the White Paper's attitude of passing the buck to the universities to let them sort out the problem. Anyone who knows about the difficulties faced by universities over their funding knows that it is a forlorn hope to expect them to undertake that from within their own resources.

It is disappointing that there is inadequate support from other Departments, especially the Department of Trade and Industry. When the President of the Board of Trade was stalking the country in his Back-Bench days, he made many speeches about reversing the trend of the decline in science funding. When he took up his present post we had great expectations of his doing something positive and imaginative. Instead, on the day of the White Paper's launch, the DTI announced its withdrawal from a range of new technology initiatives.

In the past week, the closure of the Warren Spring Laboratory was announced. That was mentioned by the hon. Member for Redcar (Ms Mowlam). As the right hon. Member for Halton (Mr. Oakes) said, many people identify the importance of the environmental challenge as the new frontier for science and research and development. There is a need to devise new, clean technologies, and Warren Spring could have been said to be at the cutting edge of that new environmental technology. Now it will be lumped together with the Atomic Energy Authority research station at Harwell.

Many of us recall how the dead hand of Harwell stopped Dr. Salter proceeding at Edinburgh university with his innovative ideas for wave power. Although Harwell is no longer dominated and obsessed by the amount of money spent on nuclear research, it has held back at least one project that could have led to an important development in renewable energy technology.

The attitude of the DTI is to limit support to the exploitation of proven rather than new and uncertain technologies. If that attitude prevails, short-termism, which has bedevilled British industry, preventing it from trying to innovate and establish a link between academic science and industry, will be made worse.

I should like to quote from a letter to my hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool, Mossley Hill (Mr. Alton) from Dr. John Isaacs of the department of pathology at Cambridge university. My hon. Friend wrote to him after he read an article about an important developoment, CAMPATH-1H, in the treatn ent of rheumatoid arthritis. My hon. Friend sought more information and in his letter Dr. Isaacs stated:

"Progress is slow primarily as a result of financial constraints. The nature of our research makes it extremely expensive, and whilst Government agencies such as the Medical Research Council do their best, they cannot provide all of the necessary finances. Sadly, science does not carry a high political profile in the UK and there seems little prospect of increasing central funding to the Medical Research Council for work such as ours. Indeed, the current Government has put clinical science funding squarely into the court of Industry. Not surprisingly, however, Industry is primarily interested in products which are close to major clinical applications. Thus we have been developing CAMPATH-1H and related compounds for more than 13 years, but an Industrial sponsor has only recently been found. Furthermore, such funding may remove one's 'scientific licence' during product development or block further novel developments for purely corporate reasons, and is therefore far from ideal . . . I apologise for venting our frustrations upon you in this way but we all feel very let down by the recent Science White Paper which does not tackle the fundamental problems of research funding."

That letter is from a person who has been very much involved in an important development in medical science. It is not the view of a politician but of someone in the field. I hope that, collectively, we will take his criticisms to heart as we address these issues.

It is clear that academic science cannot be translated into new products and processes without expenditure by industry. It is sometimes tempting to lay the blame at the door of Governments, but the problem is so endemic that the problem could be laid at the door of this Government or that of the last Labour Government or even the last Liberal Government. It has been a problem for at least a century.

Our poor showing in adapting expertise and brilliance at the basic scientific level and putting that into product development is a measure of industry's failure to pick up and exploit the creativity of British science. The Government blame the scientists and say that they are not coming up with the right kind of research, and use their usual panacea of putting business men in charge of the research councils. In other words, those who have failed British science—I direct this not against individuals but against the generality—are being put in charge of research and could infect it with the same short-termism that has bedevilled British industry for some time.

It is important to recognise that there is a cultural problem. The very fact that many hon. Members have spoken of the need to raise the status of scientists, engineers and technologists is indicative of the lack of proper status from which they have suffered for so long. It is also important to concentrate on education and training. The national curriculum addresses the need for pupils up to the age of 16 in England to be provided with basic teaching in science and technology, and that is welcome. However, a curriculum commitment is worthless unless there are the teachers and the equipment to make it a reality. With too few teachers of maths, physics and technology, it is clear that we shall need a crash programme to train teachers in those subjects and secure adequate provision of text books and equipment.

Beyond the age of 16, A-level specialisation, particularly in England, means that many bright pupils do not study maths or science. While I could not be held up as a good example, having been allowed by my school to give up all science except maths—I am pleased to learn from the right hon. Member for Halton that that redeems me—at the secondary 2 level, there is still an opportunity to pursue at least one or two sciences to a much later stage within the Scottish system.

We must also recognise the value of scientists and engineers and encourage the employment of graduate scientists and engineers. For some time, my party has been advocating a scheme that was pioneered in West Germany in the 1970s, whereby small and medium-sized firms were paid 50 per cent. of the salary of graduates on a sliding scale over five years to encourage them to take on science and engineering graduates. That scheme was wound up in West Germany in the 1980s, because it had achieved its objectives, but has recently been reintroduced in east Germany to try to bring on that development there. We should consider that here.

We must recognise, as the right hon. Member for Halton said, that there are also problems with the financial institutions, with the reluctance of the City to take a sufficiently long-term view, and its insistence on having an arm's-length relationship between financiers and industry. We should be promoting longer-term relationships and using non-executive directors in a continental-style supervisory board so that they have a much more supportive relationship with the company in which they have invested. Within those institutional ideas, there are examples of imaginative measures that should have been included in the White Paper if it was to address some of the fundamental issues.

I do not blame the Chancellor of the Duchy, who is clearly committed to his subject, but he is obviously not getting the necessary support from other parts of government. When he asked in his review why the United Kingdom seemed to be less successful than its competitors in translating inventions to the marketplace, his thoughts were in the right direction and his ambitions were high. His failure to deliver suggests that his hands have been tied by the Treasury, the Department of Trade and Industry and the Ministry of Defence. Therefore, he has had to concentrate on what he can do in his own empire and has rearranged some chairs in the research councils. That is not necessarily bad in itself, but when more glittering prizes were at stake, that remains a missed opportunity.

Sir Trevor Skeet (Bedfordshire, North): My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster has an horrendous task before him. I have seen a DTI report, published in 1993, containing a list of international rankings of companies by expenditure on research and development. One of our leading companies—perhaps the most leading—is ICI, which comes out at No. 47. The list is roughly as follows: in the first 50 companies there are 20 United States companies, 11 Japanese, six German, four Swiss, three French and a number of other European companies.

It is interesting to look at the participants in Germany. They include Daimler-Benz, Siemens, Bayer, Hoechst and BASF and Volkswagen. Before the war, IG Farben was broken into three parts—Bayer, Hoechst and BASF. They have all now grown larger than ICI and are spending much more money on research, so it is not at all surprising that they score so high in the international list. I mention that because that is the problem which my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster faces and the one with which he will have to deal.

The White Paper has some extremely useful recommendations, but one point stands out clearly: there has been a complete dispersal of funding. The Office of Science and Technology has no responsibility for research and development in the Ministry of Defence, the Department of Trade and Industry or the Department of Health. A large part of it is beyond the responsibility of the Chancellor. I make a plea for a more fully integrated science policy. When the Director-General of Research Councils, mentioned on page 32, assumes his responsibilities, he will allocate a much smaller sum of money than he should have received.

[Sir Trevor Skeet]

Civil responsibilities are important. Hon. Members have said that the defence budget will be cut. If Yeltsin falls in the former Soviet Union, I cannot imagine that there will be any such diminution, and I hope that the defence budget will continue as it is, but there must also be an increase in the amount of money for science.

There is a need for change in the public attitude to the profession of engineers, but engineers themselves also have a responsibility. They are fragmented and must get together in a more centralised unit. We must recognise the important contribution that engineers can make to wealth creation. I think that they can do it, but the attitude of the Government towards industry in general is important. Britain must take a leaf out of the French book and help our companies abroad. Commercial facilities of United Kingdom embassies throughout the world should be directed towards helping United Kingdom manufacturing companies that are seeking local market intelligence. If we support companies, not merely in the United Kingdom but abroad, we can rehabilitate a situation that has caused us great problems.

The crux of the report comes in pages 16 to 23 on Technology Foresight. That programme has been launched by the Technology Foresight steering group and will contribute to the thinking of the Council for Science and Technology, which will in turn influence Her Majesty's Government. That is a critical body and, if my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary can tell us, I should like to know what its composition will be. Will it be broad enough in its base to do its task? It is crucial that the right people are appointed to it and I hope that there will not be a reshuffling of the old pack.

Let me refer to one or two changes that have occurred. The Council for Science and Technology was called ACOST—the Advisory Council on Science and Technology—from 1987. Prior to that, there was the Advisory Council for Applied Research and Development. All moved on, one after the other. They did much the same thing—advised Governments on the course and picked the winners, and ensured that taxpayers' money was not wasted but put to good use.

In an intervention, I asked my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy to nominate who is to be the Director-General of Research Councils, because he will be vital and the arch-piece of the whole system. Sir David Phillips will have some responsibility, because he will deal with the science "boundary commission", which will allocate the boundaries between the six research councils. The chemical industry and biotechnology industry must also be satisfied about their placings.

The work of the Director-General of Research Councils was formerly done by the Advisory Board for the Research Councils, which succeeded the Council for Scientific Policy in 1972. Most of those groups were heralded with all the pipes that could be put behind them and were told that they could fulfil the future of United Kingdom scientific policy, but some petered out over the years.

The crux of the White Paper, which I support, is to determine at governmental level, through all the agencies available—including the Royal Society and people inside government—who will be the future winners. I believe that it is for industry to provide the answer, but the Government may take some of the responsibility because they will provide some of the cash. It is important that we do not appoint to those councils people who will not be able to discharge the highest responsibilities of state. We must not repeat past mistakes.

I feel obliged to pass over defence because that has been adequately covered—although it could be the subject of a full day's debate. About £2·6 billion per annum is spent on research in defence, and lengthy consideration should be given to whether a bigger allocation should be made to civil research.

As to executive agencies, I support the approach taken by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, although the hon. Member for Redcar (Ms Mowlam) does not. It has been indicated that Warren Spring Laboratory is to be closed. In my judgment, it will not, but will be merged with the AEA Technology at Harwell. A merger means not necessarily a closure, but the transference of one set of servants to another facility that will remain a government institution. As Harwell is a DTI institution, for the time being it will be a case of one function being added to another.

If it is possible to farm out such responsibilities to other bodies, which can probably undertake them much better, why not do the same in respect of the National Physical Laboratory, the Laboratory of the Government Chemist and the National Weights and Measures Laboratory—all of which are at Teddington and part of the DTI? The same question could be asked of the National Engineering Laboratory in Glasgow. Are they being lined up for launching at a future date? Could not their work be done adequately in the private sector? The House would be interested to know.

Several years ago, the annual subscription to CERN was about £55 million, which was large. Today, we find that the responsibility for international subscriptions will be borne by the science budget as a whole. However, as the Science and Engineering Research Council is to be split in two, we may find ourselves in great difficulties. The part that deals with heavy science may find its expenditure reducing over the years. Why should the whole of the science budget take it? Why not follow the practice in Italy, where funds provided through the Foreign Office become a charge on the state, particularly for foreign subscriptions?

As to research council boundaries, I understand the advantage of dividing one council into a number of departments, because, without referring to the House or anyone else, it will be possible to move a subject from one box into another very quietly—but when the councils are granted their royal charters and their boundaries are defined, they will each vigorously argue their case.

Chemists engaged in the development of proteins, genes, DNA and so on and in the application of biotechnology must depend more on chemists and on chemical engineers than on biologists. Biotechnology is fitted into three research councils. The Biotechnology and Biological Sciences Research Council will absorb the Agricultural and Food Research Council. The Medical Research Council will embrace health care, biotechnology and the food industries. The Natural Environment Research Council will be involved in the environmental area.

Biotechnology has been separated from the mainstream of chemistry funding located in the Engineering and Physical Sciences Research Council. The Institution of Chemical Engineers complains:

'biotechnology should, in the new Biotechnology and Biological Sciences Research Council, be separated from process engineering, which is logically placed in the new Engineering and Physical Sciences Research Council."

The institution feels that biochemical engineering is a vital aspect of biotechnology. Either the groupings should be modified or some way should be found of funding biochemical engineering as a section of process engineering.

I believe that chemistry has been misplaced and that anything affiliated with chemistry and biotechnology should have its frontiers re-examined, to ensure that those particular industries—which are most valuable to the United Kingdom—are not disturbed. Much work will have to be done on the six research councils to avoid fragmenting associated industries.

Over some years, I have seen the rundown of manufacturing industry in the United Kingdom, and since the war the virtual disappearance of our domestic motor cycle, bicycle, shipbuilding, machine tool, cutlery, glassware, electronic equipment and, to a certain extent, motor vehicle industries.

Mr. Ken Purchase (Wolverhampton, North-East): Is there anything left?

Sir Trevor Skeet: I assure the hon. Gentleman that it can be vouchsafed that many good industries remain in the United Kingdom. No one country in the world can have all the blessings and all the stars. I have been examining the allocation of employees in the United Kingdom. It appears that more than 70 per cent. are employed in the service industries, and between 20 and 25 per cent. in manufacturing industry. Our scientific base is too small. A figure approaching half the United Kingdom's budget is spent on welfare and health. The welfare of the nation, in its truest sense, lies in manufacturing industry, which has to support everything else; I feel that more should be contributed to it. I hope that we can debate this subject again soon, because it is vitally important. The White Paper has great potential as a framework, but I should like to know more of the details relating to, for instance, the selection of the experts.

I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, but I shall be very critical if the proposals are not implemented as I should like them to be.

12 noon

Dr. Jeremy Bray (Motherwell, South): The hon. Member for Bedfordshire, North (Sir T. Skeet), who is a veteran of science debates, has made another valuable contribution, and the hon. Members for Pudsey (Sir G. Shaw) and for Wantage (Mr. Jackson) have also made thoughtful, well-informed and constructive speeches.

The Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster says that there is little real difference between the parties on science policy. Before discussing that agreeable proposition, let me explore one or two areas in which I see substantial differences—not so much between Government and Opposition policy as between the Government's views and those of working engineers and scientists. The question of resources for science follows from the economic gain from technological competitiveness; technological competitiveness, in turn, follows from research and development and a command of the science base.

There is nothing wrong with the British economy that could not be put right by 2 per cent. per annum faster growth in the export of manufactures than is represented by our share of world trade and our relative prices. That means £2 billion more next year, another £2 billion on top of that the year after, and so on. What could be simpler? However, it needs an awful lot of doing.

It needs much more than technology transfer and research and development. It needs investors; it needs capacity to increase investment; it needs training; it needs intelligent corporate strategies; it needs whole-hearted participation in global development, with both inward and outward investment. However, we also need new and competitive technology. That means learning from others and working at the frontiers of development.

There is a wide misapprehension—not only in the Government—of the time lags involved in the profitable application of research and development. The heaviest development costs come near the point of production and pay-off; given an expenditure weighting, it is reasonable to look for the pay-off from research and development within three to eight years. We are talking about a complex interaction between research and technological development, rather than a sequential process from discovery to application. A vigorous growth in scientific and technological activity is an important factor in the achievement of economic growth within the current decade.

The Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster should have started his argument with the Treasury and the DTI by contributing to their success, or at least reducing the extent of their failure. The grimmer the prospects for the economy, the greater the emphasis needed on technological competitiveness. There is no sign that the right hon. Gentleman was able, or even tried, to get the Treasury and the DTI to understand the plight in which we find ourselves without a more technologically competitive industrial base.

Tactically—no doubt with the prodding of the hon. Member for Wantage—the right hon. Gentleman won the support of the Thatcherite Chief Secretary to the Treasury, against the barbarian President of the Board of Trade, who wanted to shut down basic science altogether and stuff the loot into helicopters for the Iraqs of the future. Tactically, however, he did not get the Treasury to understand the latest evidence from the United States on the effectiveness of intervention in industrial technology and research and development fiscal incentives, such as Bronwyn Hall's recent NBER paper; not did he clear up the muddle-headedness of the President of the Board of Trade, who spurns support for near-market research while demanding that Government-supported research be near the market.

As for defence research, although the Ministry of Defence acknowledges the "spin-in" to defence from civilian micro-electronic and information technology, the Chancellor did get the Ministry to understand that defence research is gravely weakened generally by not being thoroughly integrated with civil research and development.

I am no enthusiastic supporter of the security services. However, I cannot for the life of me see how MI5 and MI6, let alone peacekeeping to guard against communal strife, terrorism and industrial sabotage, crop, animal and human disease and natural and man-made environmental disasters—the security threats of today and tomorrow—can be adequately safeguarded by a 1940s-stye defence research and development establishment. Even those who deal with the things that go bang—the things that move fast and unerringly—have more to learn from integration with civil science and technology than from claustrophobic, exclusively defence-orientated work.

The Chancellor can influence departmental research activity by helping Departments to understand how, by using science better, they can achieve greater success in their main task. Directors of departmental laboratories have considerable insight in that regard; but what are they to make of an Office of Science and Technology that asks not, "How can we help your Department to understand how it can make better use of your science in this laboratory?" but, "Is what you are doing really necessary? Could someone else do it more cheaply? How will you subject your work to market testing?"

No wonder the Chancellor of the Duchy and his minions are sent packing with fleas in their ears by other Departments. Does that help the right hon. Gentleman to establish the authority he needs when he must deploy the full weight of scientific opinion with his colleagues—for example, to correct the mistaken belief of the Secretary of State for Health that the threat of an AIDS epidemic from heterosexual activity is diminishing?

As I have said, the grimmer the prospects for the economy, the greater is the country's need for competitive technology and research and development. That is what the Chancellor has failed to get across. He has all the arguments to hand: he can deploy them with the research councils and, in particular, with the Economic and Social Research Council. All he has managed to do, however, is secure a cut in the planned science budget, and in Government research and development generally.

When it comes to matters on which the right hon. Gentleman might claim to have achieved more agreement within the scientific community, I wonder whether he realises quite what he has taken on. I consider the restructuring of the research councils sensible: I am glad that biology is being strengthened so that it can build on the incredible advances that it has made.

The Chancellor, however, has now taken responsibility for such matters as deciding how much should go into the various research councils, and into "big science" in particular. It is no good his wringing his hands and saying how much more sensible if would be if American particle physicists scrapped their plans for a super-conducting super-collider, and put their money into CERN's more intelligent and cost-effective large hadron collider.

My view and, I believe, that of many scientists is that there is scope for fascinating and fast advance in particle physics theory, but it is by no means clear, however, that, starting in 50 years' time, physicists would still want to build large particle accelerators. Conceptually, there are ways in which high concentrations of energy might be created in the laboratory—by what the Chancellor might describe as wind surfing on laser beams in ways that they will explain to him at Culham.

The big science today, with the big, diverse, understandable and fascinating pay-off, is astronomy. Particle physics can get only so much science support worldwide, and if the super-conducting super-collider goes ahead, the large hadron collider does not. No science council and no Government-appointed or independent body will ever give the Chancellor that kind of advice. The Chancellor will have to do better than he has so far if he is to justify such a tough decision in the minds of most scientists and successfully divert the money to other sciences instead of losing it to science as a whole.

Mr. Spink: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that we should support the joint European torus project because it may give an engineering solution to fusion physics?

Dr. Bray: I understand what the hon. Gentleman is saying. The joint European torus is a different matter; it has nothing to do with high-energy particle physics. It is to do with methods of electricity generation in the future. I believe that it should be financed by a research levy on the generating authorities, but the Government have effectively closed research into electricity generation.

The Chancellor has started many hares: securing genuine career development for scientists; giving engineering the right kind of research; getting the research councils sufficiently to support overlapping; underpinning disciplines such as chemistry; making the Technology Foresight programme more fertile than a mule, a cross-breed between an academic science policy research unit and a Neddy talking shop. I hope desperately, for the sake of the country, that he can chase them all.

I shall not embarass the right hon. Gentleman by enumerating all those policies that he has lifted from Labour policy—from which, indeed, his office was hatched—but one that I shall mention, as a contribution to the vital public understanding and enjoyment of science, is a national exposition of contemporary science. Although that will culminate in 2001, the build-up needs to start now. If science is so fascinating because it helps us to understand the world—even the funny job that we try to do in this place—it is a fascination and understanding which must be shared with the community as a whole.

Mr. Spencer Batiste (Elmet): The White Paper, with its emphasis on the linkage between science and technology and wealth creation, comes after 150 years in which that linkage has been progressively weakened. It has been weakened not by deliberate intent or malice but by the lack of strategic overview of the impact of disparate policies and social trends throughout the period. That is the focus of what I want to deal with today, because we have evolved, as many people have observed, into an industrial society with an anti-industrial culture, which is at the core of the problem that we must now address.

In the 19th century, the heirs of the giants of the industrial revolution became country landowners. In his book, "Audit of War", Corelli Barnett described with frightening clarity how in the post-war period our manufacturing industry was unable to produce the products that our scientists had designed. In the post-war period, the low esteem and rewards for engineers have bedevilled recruitment of the very best people. Death duties and high taxation have inhibited the growth of family companies, which in Germany have been one of the triggers for long-term investment in research and development. Family companies in Germany have passed knowledge and wealth on from generation to generation through retained profits.

We effectively destroyed our domestic motor industry by using it as an economic regulator, subjecting it to repeated changes with which it could not cope, while the Japanese used their car industry as the launch pad of their industrial endeavour in the post-war world.

The irony is that there is no shortage of innovative ideas or world-class science and technology in Britain. But by the late 1970s, we had a real lack of world-class ability to manufacture the fruits of that science and technology base.

Dr. Spink: Will my hon. Friend acknowledge that there has been an increase in research and development in motor vehicle industries of 65 per cent. in the last decade? Does not he welcome that?

Mr. Batiste: I am coming on to that point.

I was talking about the position in the late 1970s. We had poor industrial relations and little management training. We had poor technology transfer from academic institutions. We had a lack of large personal discretionary wealth, which has been the main feature of innovative entrepreneurial investment in the United States. We had over-institutionalised financial structures and a growing lack of skills at foreman and technician level in industry.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point (Dr. Spink) pointed out, quite a lot changed in the 1980s. Taxation on companies has been reduced and industrial relations transformed. The privatisation process has put large chunks of our industry outside the constraints of the public sector borrowing requirement. The single market process is developing a marketplace for Europe of a size that will enable our companies to compete more effectively with Japan and the United States. Our universities have become more focused on the need to relate to industry.

The pharmaceutical industry has shown that it can draw money out of the stock markets for high-quality investment in a research and development based industry, which has enabled it to become a world leader. We have received massive inward investment from Japan and the United States, which has reborn our motor industry and has triggered world-class manufacturing practices in the component supply industry, which means that not only can we supply our own domestic needs, but, increasingly, we will be able to find new markets in Europe and elsewhere.

The reality is that things have improved in the United Kingdom in the 1980s, but they have improved everywhere else, too. The rest of the world has not stood still. The pace of change is increasing all the time. Our science and technology base is one of our greatest assets. We must face up to the challenge of drawing out the wealth-creating opportunities of that science base while maintaining its creative impetus and independence.

To achieve that, it is vital that the same tune is sung throughout government. The creation of the Office of Science and Technology and the appointment of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor was, I believe, an essential first step in creating the vehicle within government for focusing policy on science and technology. The White Paper is the second step in the right direction and has rightly received a positive and justified welcome.

Many colleagues have highlighted many of the features of the White Paper and I shall not repeat those points, save to summarise what I see as the most important—the recognition of the core role of science and technology in wealth creation, the identification of the United Kingdom's science and technology needs, the restatement of the need for dual funding of universities, the important strengthening of the role of the chief scientific adviser so that he can make a more decisive impact in the councils of government and the acceptance of Government involvement in all stages of the innovatory process, including near-market research.

It must be said that our history is littered with examples of our having carried forward the R and D programme to the point where it is about to achieve commercial success, but we have then withdrawn Government support and the programme has failed. A classic example of particular relevance today is that of communication satellites. We developed a world lead, withdrew resources just as the product approached the marketplace and allowed the United States to overtake us and to reach a position of dominance.

The development of the Government's role in Technology Foresight and the development of technology transfer are crucial, as is the restructuring of the research councils with mission-oriented focus. The identification of training needs in industry at large and the education of the public are also part of the process of making us a culture which is friendly to industry and research and development rather than one that is hostile to wealth creation.

The one aspect of the White Paper with which I had some difficulty is the rejection of the concept of Faraday centres. The Select Committee on Science and Technology recently visited Germany where we saw the excellent work of the Max Planck Society and the Fraunhofer and Steinbeis institutes. On reflection, I think that my right hon. Friend was right. Without wishing to diminish the considerable contribution that those institutes make in Germany, I felt that they diminished what went into the universities and, therefore, what could come out of the universities. I believe that the creation of the Smith Institute for Mathematics at Cambridge and Oxford was a better model for us than the German model which no doubt works extremely well there.

Mr. Andrew Miller (Ellesmere Port and Neston): I also went on that Select Committee trip. Does not the hon. Gentleman agree that institutes such as the Stuttgart Institute for Micro-Electronics are an excellent example of partnership between the state and private sector? Should not the Chancellor consider carefully such institutes which help to cultivate small and medium-sized enterprises?

Mr. Batiste: I entirely endorse what the hon. Gentleman says. Clearly, we saw mechanisms in Germany that provide funding to bring research ideas out of the universities, develop them that little bit further and push them into industry. It is important that we study and learn from those mechanisms, but my point was that in Britain it could be better done within the university structure rather than in institutions that drew strength away from the universities, as I felt was the case in Germany.

We must now consider whether the promise of the White Paper will be fulfilled and whether the powers of the Office of Science and Technology are adequate for the tasks it has set itself. There will always be an overlap between the responsibilities of different Departments of State. That is inevitable, but we are rapidly approaching a time when we need to carry out a radical reappraisal of the structure of government. We have not had such a reappraisal for a very long time. The nature of our society and the challenges we face are changing. It is inevitable that some of the structures of government would have to change along with them.

How, for example, can the Department of Health effectively be the sponsor of the pharmaceutical industry while being its largest customer? It is a conflict of interest which means that one side is not given adequate weight in Government debates. How can the Ministry of Defence, which is charged with the security of the nation and trying to achieve value for money, be responsible for promoting the civilian spin-offs of the technology that it develops? What does the Department of Employment do which cannot be divided more efficiently among other Departments?

Clearly, we need to introduce into government the same sense of mission orientation that we have introduced into the research councils. There needs to be a clear distinction between the roles of customer, supplier, regulator and provider. When we have a clear mission orientation within government, each of those roles can be performed more effectively.

If the needs of our science base and of the wealth creation process that arises from that science base are to be fulfilled, the OST must have a decisive voice in many of the decisions of government, even those with consequences far outside the strict confines of science and technology debates.

It is clear from the debate today that there is a wide welcome in the House and in the country as a whole for the White Paper and for the strategic direction it sets out. The House wishes the Chancellor well in the battles to come. Members of the Select Committee share that wish and we shall do our bit to promote his functions in government. We shall monitor his progress carefully and with the keenest possible interest because, as we approach the turn of the century, there can be nothing more important to the success of our country in the next century than that he should succeed in his job now.

Mr. Ken Purchase (Wolverhampton, North-East): In order to compete in the world economy, Britain must improve the performance of its manufacturing industry. As has already been said many times, the key is investment in research and development.

Where investment in research and development has been high, as in chemicals and pharmaceutical, we lead the world, although even in that instance our position is threatened following the first assault by the Department of Health on the list of drugs which may be prescribed on the national health service. Evidence already shows that fewer patents are being registered by British pharmaceutical companies since the assault. The Government may claim that their action has reduced the level of year-on-year increases in the drugs bill with, as yet, they claim, no discernible effect on patients treated with generic equivalents. The question is, what effect will the loss of sales of proprietary brands in the home market have on companies' ability to invest in research and ultimately to maintain the lead which creates the demand for new and developed products?

Let us be clear about the importance of exports, especially of high added value goods. Manufacturing accounts for four fifths of our exports. By comparison, manufacturing accounts for only one fifth of our gross domestic product, whereas in the 1970s, it accounted for almost one third. No wonder our balance of trade is in such dire straits.

As our industry has shrunk, the budgets available, company by company, for research and development and for training have withered. That is especially true in the small and medium-sized companies, where the first casualties of recession and cuts are inevitably training, R and D, marketing and all the activities that are not regarded as essential for survival. Now we are sucking in imports at enormous cost to substitute for what, just 15 years ago, we had both the technology and the capacity to make for ourselves.

As mainline R and D budgets have shrunk, so Britain has lost the value of simultaneously developed complementary technology. In the early 1960s, I worked on experimental parts for Concorde and TSR 2—hydraulic flight control and landing systems. A whole new body of knowledge was developed in respect of metal cutting and measurement control. Titanium has excellent weight-to-strength properties, ideal for the purposes of aerospace components, but it is an alloy whose use is limited because of the very high friction created during the cutting process, which created measurement control problems.

That led to a demand for new cutting techniques and to the consequent further development of cobalt and ceramic tools and new resins and abrasives. Those demands necessarily involved numbers of companies not directly contracting in to the Concorde project. In that way, all the knowledge gained and the techniques developed became the common currency of engineering technology. Unfortunately, these days every company that I visit relies on imports to bring continuous improvements to those processes.

The brilliant world-leading machine tool sector around Coventry, Birmingham and Wolverhampton—and a small group of high-tech companies in the south-east—has virtually gone. One is led to ask, "Is there anything left?" Fortunately, there is a little left, and it is working very hard. In the late 1980s, Ministers were declaring that the import of machine tools was a sign that our manufacturers were gearing up for recovery. To my mind, however, what was presented as good news sadly confirmed that our own machine tool sector was as good as dead.

Times move on and science will not be thwarted. Now the same company that I worked for has developed new smart fly-by-light control systems, using fibre optics to replace the typical mechanical systems currently used in most aircraft. The first flight using the system was on 13 February this year and the system was validated from flight data by the Civil Aviation Authority. However, some doubt—I hope only temporary—has been cast on continuing Government support. On 6 May, the Select Committee on Trade and Industry learned from the Minister of State at the Department that support for the civil aircraft research and demonstration programme is to be reduced by 20 per cent. per year over the next three years. I am not sure how fly-by-light will be affected, but the uncertainty created at all levels within participating companies is profound.

Just when reduced demand worldwide is resulting in major United Kingdom aerospace companies stepping back programmes and just when we have the even greater problem of companies in the far east that are determined to go into aerospace in a big way—Indonesia is a case in point—the British Government choose to shed doubt on their support for world-beating technology being developed in this country.

Hon. Members must ask how the prospect of stepping back from research and development can possibly be compatible with the claims in the White Paper that the science base is to be protected from cuts. If the Department of Trade and Industry can contemplate cuts in near-market research, what chance does blue skies research have? In any event, the White Paper contains no plans for vital increases in science-based funding over the next few years, without which there will be a negative effect on the confidence of scientists and engineers throughout the country.

The Government seem to think that their emphasis on shifting resources towards projects with the greatest industrial relevance will be greeted with acclamation—it may not be unqualified. The best United Kingdom companies have always realised the value of original research, without which the industrial vibrancy created by a successful programme of research to market innovation is lost.

The White Paper fails to tackle the need for long-term financial support for research. Its authors are confined to a market philosophy and necessarily take only a short-term view. That short-termism is especially a characteristic of pension fund managers' attitudes. They are under constant pressure to arrange their portfolios so that they can consistently out-perform the average return. As pension funds and other insurance interests hold roughly 50 per cent. of all shares in companies, they are in a powerful position to demand a return when, judging by company profits, none should really be available.

It is a feature of R and D investment that it is overwhelmingly funded by retained profits which diminish as shareholders demand a better-than-average dividend from cutting-edge companies that are desperate to invest in winning, long-term projects. That is a major problem for Britain which our rivals do not suffer. It is fuelled by the lack of loyalty felt towards our industry by fund managers and it contrasts with the very much greater level of individual and non-corporate ownership common in America, Japan, Germany and France, to which reference was made earlier.

That ownership yields a fierce pride towards the companies in which people have invested and that is lacking in Great Britain. Not too long ago, I recall a lord of the realm—Sir Jeffrey Sterling—saying, in relation to shipping and registration, that his first duty was to his shareholders and not to Britain. Such a statement is indicative of the lack of loyalty felt towards our indigenous companies and industries that seems to be common throughout the country.

The White Paper is silent on such matters, no doubt warned off by competing departmental interests. However, it is not so silent when it enthuses about new committee structures for the research councils. Some might say that that is simply an exercise in deck-chair management while no one is captain of the ship. Someone must be put in charge soon.

A genuine partnership between education, industry, finance and the Government is urgently required. However, only the Government can provide the catalyst for that to happen. Economic modelling suggests that significant national benefits are available if, as a result of real partnership, improved manufacturing performance can be achieved. Modelling also shows, despite some inefficiencies resulting from badly managed Government intervention such as the overly-bureaucratic procedures required to obtain finance, that a balance of advantage will remain and will result in improved industrial performance at a new higher equilibrium position.

We have some remarkable inherent strengths and advantages in many of our best companies. However, genuine understanding by the Government is necessary to ensure that support is available to encourage invention and innovation. Doing nothing except reorganising the research councils is not an option. Full European co-operation is too far away to prevent further deterioration in our global competitive position. Hoping for inward investment from Japanese companies enthusiastic to take advantage of British inventiveness is foolish in the extreme.

The way forward is to invest heavily in supply-side changes that favour the whole process of education, research and the manufacturing sector. Only in that way will the natural ability and potential of our people be realised and released. We must demonstrate our confidence in British-owned companies based in this country. That means that they must be allowed to develop with the use of a healthy level of retained profits and free from financial speculators and greedy takeover moves. In such an environment, our companies can grow at similar rates to those of our international competitors.

For the whole period of Conservative Governments, the emphasis has been on the acquisition, stripping out and selling of companies that have been the backbone of British manufacturing. Now, when manufacturing represents such a small part—one fifth, as I said earlier—of gross domestic product, far too many City fleas are getting a free ride and a free meal on the over-burdened, over-stretched body of British industry.

I regret that the White Paper fails to argue strongly for a cultural change which would value the scientists and engineers on whom the country is so dependent for sustaining our well-being. I regret also that it fails to recognise the opportunity to put the real added value of applied science and technology at the top of the agenda.

Because of that failure, the White Paper can be only partly welcomed. Perhaps in future it will be seen as an occasion when once again, the Government did not miss an opportunity to miss an opportunity.

Mr. Tim Rathbone (Lewes): Contrary to the innuendo of the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, North-East (Mr. Purchase), I warmly welcome the White Paper. I hope that the hon. Gentleman's criticisms and those of other hon. Members, in particular the pointed but intelligent comments of my hon. Friends the Members for Pudsey (Sir G. Shaw) and for Wantage (Mr. Jackson), will be taken to heart when the Government consider future action.

I also welcome the White Paper because I am honoured to be chairman of the all-party engineering development group of this House and of the other place. The White Paper is a further illustration of the Government's commitment to pushing manufacturing, engineering, technology and science up to the top of the political agenda. That would not have happened without the support and commitment of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, who was responsible for setting up the Office of Public Service and Science, for which my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster and my hon. Friend the newly appointed Parliamentary Secretary, Office of Public Service and Science are responsible.

The White Paper is also a significant indication of the determination to improve the competitiveness of British industry, and that determination was highlighted in the House only a week ago. It is an indication of closer contact and interaction between industry, academia and the Government. Training and enterprise councils are an illustration of that, as are company training schemes, both of which are mentioned in the White Paper. Only the other day, I had the privilege of opening the university of Brighton's teaching company centre—just outside my constituency but, of course, embracing it. We in Sussex are proud that it is already the largest teaching company centre in the country.

I welcome the creation of the Engineering and Physical Sciences Research Council, and I voice the same hope that has been voiced by some of my hon. Friends—that practising engineers from industry will be strongly represented on the council.

The White Paper is also a welcome reminder of the importance of setting high standards, particularly in engineering. Standard setting in Europe is now very influential worldwide, in contrast with years gone by, when most standard setting emanated from the United States. The United Kingdom, within Europe, is a world leader, and we should praise the British Standards Institution's job in that sphere.

From the engineering standpoint, the White Paper underlines the importance of engineering to the United Kingdom. That point cannot be overstated. It has been stated by Ministers time and again, yet somehow it does not sink into everybody's mind. In engineering, we have annual sales of £100,000 million, including £50,000 million of exports, output accounting for 42 per cent. of our manufacturers' gross domestic product, and the employment of about 2 million people. That also emphasises the importance of the White Paper to manufacturing and engineering within manufacturing in this country.

Like others before me, I wish to ask one or two questions. Will Government funding be adequate to the task that the White Paper identifies? For instance, are the Government pledged to protect the science vote as an investment in our country's future from any imminent Budget cuts? My right hon. Friend cannot commit himself on that point, but he can commit himself to the battle for it.

What additional help can be expected from the Treasury to encourage the financing and introduction of industrial innovation, especially through the Technology Foresight exercise? I and other hon. Members wonder whether the Treasury is close enough to industry to understand its real needs.

We must question whether more industrially relevant research can be undertaken without a serious reduction in support from the research councils for basic research, which is already mission-oriented. That research accounts for 20 per cent. of the research councils' expenditure. What can be done to encourage and help industrial managers to grasp the opportunities offered by British research and innovation, and to make the long-term investment that is needed to profit from it?

The central issue relates to how we regain Britain's position as a world-class manufacturer. That is not thoroughly addressed in the White Paper. The reason may be traced to a point made by hon. Members on both sides of the House about Government policy coherence through all Departments to ensure that science, engineering and technology are developed.

While I welcome the added emphasis on masters' degrees, I share the worries expressed by my hon. Friend the Member for Pudsey and the right hon. Member for Halton (Mr. Oakes) about basic education in terms of the teaching of mathematics and arithmetic in the national curriculum. Do we need to consider broadening the sixth form curriculum and giving students greater encouragement to continue their education and vocational training until 18, or even after?

The Department of Trade and Industry has been mentioned in that context. Should it be given the main responsibility for science, engineering and technology development? Having raised that question, I must say that the Department has cut its annual expenditure on research and development, and does not seem to be committed to the maintenance of support for innovation.

The future role of the Ministry of Defence was mentioned by my hon. Friends the Members for Pudsey and for Wantage. What Government help will be given to assist market forces in the switch from military to civil research and development? I suppose that it all comes back to a recommitment to developing engineering, science, technology and our manufacturing potential.

An anti-industrial culture still too often prevails. In all Government Departments, there is room for encouragement to change. The Royal Academy of Engineering and other institutions and federations in the engineering world will do their bit to help the Government bring about the necessary change. The contrast between our commitment to national excellence in science, engineering and technology and our relative weakness in exploiting it to economic advantage still remains. The White Paper represents a most welcome beginning to a process of change. Equally, that process must continue to develop.

Mrs. Anne Campbell (Cambridge): I enjoyed the speech of the hon. Member for Lewes (Mr. Rathbone) who made some valid points to which I shall return.

One statement in the White Paper, with which I entirely agree, states:

> "Women are the country's biggest single most undervalued and therefore under-used human resource."

It is perhaps no great surprise, but nevertheless a great disappointment, to find that just nine lines of that 74-page document were devoted to the subject of attracting more women into science and engineering.

The Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster has chosen to opt out by deferring any further discussion on that matter until the report of the working group and committee of inquiry into women in science and technology has been published. That inquiry was not established until March, nine months into the debate on the White Paper, and it is not due to report until September. I do not know whether that is a means of sidelining the problems faced by women scientists; if so, the opportunity to tackle those problems will be lost for a long time.

It says a great deal about the Government's commitment to science and technology that, only a few days after publication of the White Paper, they announced the closure of Warren Spring Laboratory, Britain's premier research institute for environmental technology. On the day that the White Paper was released, however, the Chancellor of the Duchy said:

"On Warren Spring, my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade has not taken any final decision."—[Official Report, 26 May 1993; Vol. 225, c. 932.]

I find that answer a little disingenuous.

The Government have reneged on the agreement reached last year to relocate Warren Spring at a site in Welwyn Garden City, bought for that purpose. The environmental problems facing this country are not diminishing, but increasing. This is not the time to cut the investment on environmental technology or to disband research teams with internationally renowned expertise.

Some of the White Paper proposals are sound, including the Technology Foresight programme and the annual "Forward Look". Many in the scientific community and in the Labour party have long argued for a national strategy for science. The progress in that direction is welcome. In general, however, the White Paper is a damp squib, which promised much and delivered little. In addition, I fear that some of what it has delivered is wrongheaded.

Paragraph 1.13 of the White Paper acknowledges

"the widely perceived contrast between our excellence in science and technology and our relative weakness in exploiting them to economic advantage."

Having acknowledged that analysis, however, the White Paper fails to comprehend the significance of it.

Many of the reforms to the administration of the science budget and research councils proposed in the White Paper imply that the problem lies not in exploitation of the science base for economic advantage, but with the science base itself. I strongly object to that analysis. The White Paper has tackled that problem by streamlining the research councils so that they will be staffed with fewer members overall and with more people from industry.

The research councils are being instructed to give greater emphasis to applied research. The implication is that the councils are currently allocating funds for the wrong sort of research, yet that misses the point entirely. I fear that the reforms, if applied literally, may stifle creative research in Britain. The applications of basic research cannot be anticipated, which is true almost by definition. The difficulty of picking winners is well established. It is not true that our scientists are failing to produce scientific innovations, which could be taken up by industry. Many of their innovations are taken up by industry, but the problem is that they are not taken up by British industry.

An excellent letter from Professor Roger Needham, who is professor of computing at Cambridge university and one of my constituents, was sent to the Select Committee on Science and Technology. He set out succinctly that the two things he creates are skilled people and ideas. He described, with some feeling, the difficulty he encounters in getting United Kingdom companies to realise that they should try to persuade good graduates to work for them. He described further difficulties that he has had in getting companies to accept good ideas. He wrote:

"When it comes to the exploitation of results, the situation is not much better. An extreme but nevertheless genuine case, is as follows. A research student came to see us after working for GEC for ten years. In the course of his PhD work he took out a patent on an invention and he talked to British Telecom and GEC about it. They were polite but uninterested although the subject matter was very relevant to their businesses. He published a paper in an international journal, sold his patent to a Californian start-up and is now with them as a respected engineer."

Other advanced industrial economies are keen to exploit the fruits of the labours of British scientists, but I fear that we will not realise the potential of British science until the British Government, British industry and British financial institutions realise the error of their ways. The White Paper contains nothing to encourage that process.

Page 15 of the White Paper states:

"the Government recognises that circumstances can arise where market forces do not work in a satisfactory manner and investments in commercial research and development which offer a good economic return to the nation . . . will not go ahead without some sort of public support."

The statement that market forces do not always work is a refreshing admission from the Government.

I shall describe a situation in which market forces are clearly not working. The United Kingdom research and development score board was published last week. It has already been mentioned by several hon. Members, including the hon. Member for Bedfordshire, North (Sir T. Skeet) who quoted from it at length. It showed that the 336 British companies surveyed spent on average 1·6 per cent. of their income on research and development last year compared with an average of 4·6 per cent.—almost three times as much—for the world's 200 top spending companies. Even the 11 British companies ranked among the top 200 for research and development spending on average spent just 2·5 per cent. of their income on research and development, compared with between 4 or 6 per cent. for the other companies. To cap it all, the average British company spends twice as much on dividends to shareholders as on research and development. That compares with the world's top 200 companies which spend two and a half times as much on research and development as they do on dividends—they have their priorities right; we have our priorities wrong.

Even the President of the Board of Trade described the figures as sobering. In a debate in the House earlier this year, the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster described the result of a similar survey as sobering. Perhaps the entire Cabinet find the figures sobering—it will no doubt find the results of next year's survey equally sobering. But the question is—what is the Cabinet going to do about it?

Once again, the Government have failed to take the opportunity to introduce additional tax incentives for firms spending on research and development. In rejecting tax incentives, the White Paper states that the Government's aim remains

"the avoidance of special tax subsidies which distort commercial investment decisions."

That dogma rings hollow. Against all the evidence, the Government remained mesmerised by their faith in market forces.

The United Kingdom, Turkey and New Zealand share the dubious distinction of being the only countries out of the 24 members of the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development that spent a smaller proportion of their national wealth on research and development in 1990 than they did in 1981. In Britain, responsibility for the decline lies squarely with the Tory

[Mrs. Anne Campbell]

Government. The proportion of gross domestic product invested by the Government in civil research and development fell from 0·72 per cent. in 1981 to 0·5 per cent. in 1990. Those figures come from the Save British Science society. That meant that the Government spent £1·2 billion less on civil research and development in 1990 than they would have done if they had maintained spending at the 1981 level as a proportion of GDP.

Much of the fall can be attributed to the rigid application of the near-market rule—another foolish element of Tory dogma. The White Paper refers to the relaxation of the rule, but it is a timid reference. It would be interesting if the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster could underline and strengthen the commitment to spending more money on near-market research.

The White Paper's failure to address the issue of resources and set targets for increasing the proportion of national investment in research and development is one of its greatest omissions. We read that Government spending on defence-related research and development will be reduced in real terms by one third by the end of the decade. There is no discussion of the possibility that, as a result, more resources will be diverted into civil research and development. There is no statement about how scientific expertise built up in the defence industry might be preserved for the nation. The diversification of the defence industry is not even discussed. It is a simple story of cuts. That is a great missed opportunity, well illustrated by my hon. Friend the Member for Motherwell, South (Dr. Bray), to divert resources into the areas that threaten the security of the western world.

Hon. Members have spoken about careers in science and technology. The chapter in the White Paper dealing with that subject is deeply disappointing. Worse than that, many scientists will find parts of it highly insulting. There is a consensus that a postgraduate setting out on a career in scientific research should have more formal training at the outset. In that sense, the proposal that postgraduates should normally undertake a year's tuition for a master's degree before embarking on a PhD course is welcome. However, I am deeply concerned—that concern is shared by many scientists—about the manner in which the change in the pattern of postgraduate training is to be achieved. There will be no new resources, which means that more people taking master's degrees will mean fewer people taking PhDs. Throughout the long debate leading to the publication of the White Paper, I have not heard anyone suggest that this country suffers from a surfeit of people with a PhD. We need more scientists trained to the highest degree if our economy is to thrive in the long term.

The White Paper makes little reference to the poor financial rewards of scientists compared with highly qualified people in other professions. I presume that that is because the Government are not willing to admit to a problem that they are unwilling to solve. When job insecurity is added to poor financial reward, it is a wonder that anyone chooses to pursue a career in scientific research in this country. I have been married to a research scientist for the past 30 years and therefore speak with feeling and some interest in the subject.

Far too many of our brightest scientists live a hand-to-mouth existence on short-term contracts. In that respect, the proposal that the research councils should fund more longer-term fellowships and that the universities should allocate funds to support some research staff between contracts is welcome. However, the White Paper is unapologetic about the plight of the majority of research workers who will still have to move from one short-term contract to the next and from one institution or project to another, always worried about where the next pay cheque will come from.

The White Paper is worse than unapologetic because it contains the appalling assertion that scientists themselves are to blame for being condemned to a series of short-term contracts. That is in paragraph 7.28 which says that they have unreasonable ambitions to pursue careers in academia when what they need is more career guidance to disabuse them of the idea that they can pursue the career of their choosing. That is complete rubbish. Short-term contracts are not the choice of the scientist; they are the choice of the employer and, effectively, the choice of the Government.

It is the lack of a career structure and of basic conditions such as maternity leave and child care that lead to many women moving out when they reach childbearing age. I shall not pursue that as I raised it in an intervention. According to Department of Employment statistics, although 56 per cent. of laboratory technicians are women, only 20 per cent. of chemists and less than 10 per cent. of engineers are women. Women are poorly represented in the research councils. The Advisory Board for the Research Councils has only one woman on its 24-member council and among the permanent staff there are no women at grade 4 and only one woman out of 23 at grade 5. That pattern is reflected in the research councils.

Gender discrimination is rife. A Royal Society of Chemistry survey showed that 29 per cent. of women encountered discrimination. Worse still, when the Institute of Physics conducted a similar survey, it found that 49 per cent. of women had experienced discrimination when applying for jobs.

In the introduction to the White Paper, the Government have the gall to quote the president of the Royal Society, Sir Michael Atiyah, another of my constituents. He said:

"Too much stress on organisational structures may obscure the basic fact that progress in science depends on the ideas, inspiration and dedication of individual scientists, not the machinations of councils, committees and Departments."

The problem is that the Government have not the wit to understand the meaning of those words. Far too much of the White Paper is about

"the machinations of councils, committees and Departments" and far too little is about fostering the talents of our scientists. The White Paper is a failure because it fails to address even the chronic under-investment by British industry in research and development and innovation.

In advance of the debate, I consulted another constituent of mine, Dr. Matthew Freeman, who works at the Medical Research Council's laboratory of molecular biology in Cambridge, and who is also on the executive committee of Save British Science. He said:

"There is nothing inspiring in the White Paper. Scientists in Britain are demoralised and uncertain and were looking for some hope. Apart from some stirring sentiments there is nothing to relieve the gloom. If you ask scientists at the bench what would help, none would say that an internal shake-up in the committee structure in Whitehall would be a high priority. As an ex-chairman of British Scientists Abroad, I am sure that there will not be a single scientist who will decide to return to Britain on the basis of this White Paper."

That says it all.

Mr. Nigel Forman (Carshalton and Wallington): I have listened to all the speeches in the debate so far and found them interesting and, on the whole, rather constructive. However, I am sorry to have to say that the speech of the hon. Member for Cambridge (Mrs. Campbell) was unnecessarily and unjustifiably sour in its terms. It took insufficient account of the fact that when my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy launched this exercise one year ago, he made it clear that it would be principally concerned with the machinery of science policy and the way in which those matters were approached and co-ordinated within Whitehall, and would not focus principally on resources, for the good and practical reason that, however powerful he may be, it is not within his gift to deliver great pots of money extra to the considerable sums already put into civilian science.

The speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Elmet (Mr. Batiste), using a positively missionary approach, was excellent and will repay close reading, not least because it demonstrated the way in which at least some opinion among those on the Labour Benches—if not that of the hon. Member for Cambridge—has shifted over the past 10 to 15 years under the influence of the hammer of Thatcherism acting on the anvil of new market and global realities. That is the world in which the scientific and technological community has now to operate.

In the spirit of bipartisanship, I noticed that the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Dr. Moonie) was agreeing strongly with my hon. Friend the Member for Elmet when he made a pointed comment, with which I also agree, about the Department of Health being in the ludicrous position of both sponsor and regulator of the pharmaceutical industry. Given that this is one of the few shining examples in the private sector of an industry that has done consistently well, without many handouts from the taxpayer, it is important that the Government should play their part by improving the bureaucratic arrangements. I hope that my right hon. Friend will take note of that.

The right hon. Member for Halton (Mr. Oakes) made a serious point about the insufficiency of people with a good grounding in mathematics and a good mathematical turn of mind, not only in the House but, more broadly, in the communities on which we depend for wealth creation. I draw to the attention of the House the work of Adult Literacy and Basic Skills Unit, which recently published a report, at the Government's behest, that contained some tragic and frightening figures. One in five of the large representative sample were, at 21 years of age, effectively innumerate and one in seven were effectively illiterate—excluding those with dyslexia and mental disabilities. We must address that problem in our schools and in the national cirriculum more urgently than we are.

The hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace), who has had to leave, spoke of cultural and attitudinal problems. He was right, for those matters are well documented back to the time of Prince Albert, who held well-developed views on them.

As a social scientist rather than a pure scientist, I believe that the essence of the problem is that British scientists are invariably held in respect, even in awe, by the non-scientific community. The difficulty has been and remains at the technical and technician level. Schools and further education institutions must do more to capture the imagination of a wide raft of young people and not just the most academically talented.

I apologise for diverging in that way, because I know that it is uncharacteristic these days to indulge in debate in the House, but I wanted to pick up on points that particularly struck me.

The White Paper is an excellent contribution to the progress that urgently needs to be made. It clearly recognises the vital importance of preserving and enhancing our science base, particularly via higher education institutions—which have an enormous contribution to make—and research centres, which are often in the private sector.

It must be acknowledged, however, that we in the United Kingdom cannot do everything here. We must not fall for the fallacies that everything must be invented here, or that everything must be done in this country. We must set priorities and ask who are the right people to take difficult priority decisions.

I believe that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy and others of my right hon. and hon. Friends on the Front Bench share the view that such decisions should not principally be taken by Ministers and civil servants.

That is largely because they do not have an adequate training and background, but also because they tend to be dazzled by the men in white coats. This country's scientific history in the post-war period shows the way in which nuclear boffins, for example, dazzled successive science and technology, education and industry Ministers over the years, because those Ministers did not start on anything like even terms with their advisers. That is a serious psychological point.

I welcome the concept of pluralism and diversity in decision making, because big mistakes are less likely to occur with a pluralistic approach. I welcomed the announcment made by my right hon. Friend some time ago of the decision to maintain the dual support system, which is important for institutional autonomy. That is the most important decision in the White Paper contributing to the maintenance and improvement of our science base.

Several references have been made to resources, including by the hon. Member for Cambridge. I put a more positive gloss than the hon. Lady on paragraph 1.17 of the White Paper:

> "The Government will continue to allocate public resources to science and engineering on the scale necessary to finance the policies in this White Paper."

Although that statement is clear, I know that Opposition Members are cynical. I take the statement to mean that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy, with the full backing of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, will make every effort to ensure this policy is carried through.

Dr. Bray: How can the Government possibly continue to do something that they have not been doing?

Mr. Forman: The hon. Gentleman is falling into the trap of being a little too sour and pessimistic. The scientific community may not have received all the public resources that it would like recently, but let me say in the presence of my right hon. Friend—and my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Secretary, Office of Public Service and

[Mr. Forman]

Science whom I welcome to his new post—that I believe that the scientific and technological community has firm champions. I know that they will do their level best.

Basic science, as I understand it, is nearly always a voyage of discovery with many blind alleys: that is the nature of the beast. We must protect the work of bright researchers who are not project-funded by research councils. A good example of what can be derived from the "blue skies" approach is the valuable work on genetic fingerprinting that Alec Jeffreys and his team have done at Leicester university; another is the basic research into ceramics that has been done abroad, leading to many of the significant breakthroughs in super-conductivity that were made a few years ago in Switzerland. I hope that the Government will continue to support such aspects of the science base and the "blue skies" approach.

British industry and commerce must learn to apply the scientific and technological skills that we develop to existing products and processes, as well as to new frontier products and processes. Perhaps the most telling example can be found in the motor vehicle industry: much was learnt in the 1980s—largely as a result of Japanese influence, as was pointed out by my hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point (Dr. Spink). There has also been a dramatic turnaround in our woollen textile industry, largely owing to the application of the most appropriate and advanced technology to existing processes to make them more cost effective and more attractive to the market.

We also need to achieve a better balance between what is loosely called a big science—for instance, particle physics and astronomy—and small science—for instance, product and process control. I was interested to read the evidence submitted by ICI's spokesman about the value of small science, and the number of small projects that are particularly useful to the advance of the whole. Science in this country has been dogged by two problems, both cuckoos in the nest. Nuclear power has tended to edge out a good deal of hard science, and subscriptions to international bodies have taken too large a share of the resources available at any one time.

Paragraph 1.16 of the White Paper is right to talk of breaking down the barriers between all those involved in the broad scientific community. That naturally includes private companies, research laboratories and industry generally. I am delighted to read of the encouragement of networking between bodies, both public and private. That must be right; we must share best practice as far as possible.

I am particularly attached to the idea of teaching companies—which were mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Lewes (Mr. Rathbone)—and case awards for young scholars. Much good work is going on. I recently paid a fascinating visit to the university of Brighton, to which my hon. Friend referred—the university, that is, not the fascinating visit. I was told that the university now has eight research degrees financed in that way, and that there are practical as well as theoretical benefits. An example given to me by Professor David Watson is the new control system for hardboard mills, which is making a significant contribution to the success of the industry.

I welcome the way in which paragraph 1.18 flags the Government's determination to develop more taught courses for science graduates. I believe that MSc training for postgraduate scientists and engineers is the way forward. That is the approach adopted by many of our competitors, notably the United States and Germany; I think that it is pedagogically right, and that it brings us more into line with current best practice internationally.

Some of those studying for a MSc will go on to the PhD stage—fewer than before, but that is not necessarily a bad thing—with a more appropriate grounding and a broader basis. I hope that they will go on with the benefit of better and closer academic supervision than is sometimes the case with PhDs.

There is one aspect of the White Paper about which I have doubts and concerns—the decision not to create a humanities research council, which perhaps includes the realm of the Economic and Social Research Council, on which I briefly served a few years ago. That decision leaves the sponsorship, regulation and funding of research in that area largely with our old friend the British Academy. I am not sure that this was a wise decision and I invite my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster to find an opportunity later to consider it again.

The British Academy does not have a glorious record in the realm of research and it has the conflicting roles of both learned society and funding council, which sit rather uneasily in one slightly amateur body. I have particular concerns about its record on studentships and on post-doctoral fellowships. I hope that the decision can be reconsidered.

As my right hon. Friend will know, there is a great need for more money for library facilities and for sabbaticals for research in the humanities. Now that, in a sense, my right hon. Friend's Department has a greater interest than it had formerly in such matters, because of his supervision of the research councils, I hope that the matter will be reconsidered. It is a great pity that the recommendations made by Sir Brian Follett were not pursued—a view that is also held by the Committee of Vice-Chancellors and Principals.

I do not want to end on a negative or sour note, having criticised others for showing a touch of sourness. In general, the White Paper is a sensible and responsive document which has done a great deal to meet the most important needs of our scientific, technological and engineering community. I congratulate my right hon. Friend and my hon. Friend the Member for Wantage (Mr. Jackson), who played a considerable part in the document, on their work and on the spirit in which they approached it. I want Ministers to know that many Conservative Members will support them strongly when they do battle, as they will have to, for the interests of the scientific and technological community.

1.22 pm

Mr. Alan W. Williams (Carmarthen): I thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for giving me the opportunity to take part in the debate.

I congratulate the Chancellor on the White Paper, which has stimulated much interest among the scientific community—well over 100 submissions were made—and in the Select Committee on Science and Technology.

I detected in the Chancellor's speech this morning and in earlier contributions the fact that he has been cautious in his handling of this massive subject. Perhaps he was a little too deferential to the abilities of the scientists involved. As a result, the White Paper is perhaps a little too complacent. I note that about 12 of the Select Committee's 31 recommendations have been accepted. The others were not accepted or were pigeon-holed.

The White Paper is a rather modest reform document. I strongly welcome the "Forward Look", which involves other Departments, and the Technology Foresight programme, which is extremely important. Last Monday, speaking to the Parliamentary and Scientific Committee, the Chancellor spoke of visiting top laboratories in this country, looking at the visitors' list and finding that the person above him always seemed to be from Japan. We need to return the compliment, and the same goes for Germany and the United States. The Technology Foresight programme will help to keep abreast of where we need to invest in the future.

We accept the winding up of the research councils, although we want greater openness. The advice of learned bodies to the OST should be published. The Science and Engineering Research Council was too large and had to be restructured. I especially welcome the Engineering and Physical Science Research Council and echo the concern expressed by the hon. Member for Bedfordshire, North (Sir T. Skeet) about how chemistry will fit into the new pattern. I am also worried about the Particle Physics and Astromony Research Council because it deals with pure science and there is a danger that, being packaged as such, it may be vulnerable to possible cuts or a squeeze in research funding.

I welcome the Council for Science and Technology. It may have leading scientists and industrialists as members, but I echo the view expressed by the Select Committee: we want women to be on the council and the interests of the environment and the consumer to be represented. We welcome the fact that dual funding is to continue. I have reservations about the switch from PhD to MSc, but, if the budget is limited, I accept that perhaps the bias should be towards the MSc. However, I can accept cuts in PhDs only if the total budget is safeguarded and is used to produce more MSc qualifications.

I notice that the White Paper's response to Faraday centres is tame. I wish that it had expressed greater enthusiasm. During our visit to Germany, members of the Select Committee visited the Fraunhofer and Steinbeis institutes. This country needs to develop a broader infrastructure, something between universities and industry, or a middle tier fed by universities and polytechnics and drawn from by industry.

I agree with earlier remarks about the public understanding of science and overspecialisation in schools. All pupils should be required to take mathematics and science to the age of 18. Science has a rather negative image, which I can well understand, having done research in chemistry. Unfortunately, in the minds of young people science can be associated with nuclear problems and pollution and, in general, the image of the scientist is negative. Environmental research will help to refresh that image, but it is sad that the closure of the Warren Spring laboratory sends a negative signal to young people who may be thinking of embarking on a scientific career.

The White Paper is especially disappointing in respect of the Chancellor's scant influence on other Departments, such as the Ministries of Defence and of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food and the Departments of Health and of Trade and Industry. He will have very little influence on the research budget of those Departments but they will take part in the "Forward Look", which is a positive step. I also welcome the transfer of administration of the LINK scheme, but, as £6 billion of Government money is going into science research, it is sad that the OST will control less than a quarter of it and will not have a great deal of influence over the remaining three quarters.

On defence, I agree with the hon. Member for Wantage (Mr. Jackson), in particular, and with the hon. Member for Pudsey (Sir G. Shaw). For decades, our economy has been overtaxed by our high defence budget. We need to trim it in line with other European members of NATO. As the peace dividend now allows us to cut our budget and the R and D component of it, it is important that the funding is retained in total in the science base.

I again echo the comments by the hon. Member for Pudsey: the safeguarding of that £2·6 billion might be the subject of a future Select Committee inquiry. I understand that that figure is destined to be cut by £1 billion by the end of the decade. But that billion pounds' worth of research is very much needed by Britain and the country's manufacturing industry. Much more thought needs to be given to the question of how the able scientists involved in defence research and development can be redeployed and their skills harnessed for our manufacturing industry.

I shall comment briefly on industrial research and development, which is one of the great problems in terms of the competitiveness of British industry. We have heard comments today about the Department of Trade and Industry scoreboard and how poorly we come out of it. But that is ignored by the White Paper. Tax incentives, which are part of Labour party policy and have been urged on the Government by the Lords Select Committee, are necessary to boost industrial investment in research and development.

When statistics are cited to the Minister about Britain's investment in research and development, he says that we are about the middle of the pack and that our investment is about the average worldwide level. That is simply not true. This country devotes about 2·2 per cent. of its GDP to defence, civil, industrial and Government research and development. For most of our competitor countries—including Germany, Japan and the United States—the figure is 2·8 per cent. In civil research and development, we are about 1 per cent. of GDP behind those countries.

Another £6 billion a year should be spent on research and development. If, at some stage, we want long-term industrial success and a growth strategy, we must find those resources so that research in this country can back up the great skills of scientists in our universities.

1.32 pm

Mr. Nigel Waterson (Eastbourne): I join other hon. Members in welcoming both the debate and the White Paper and I congratulate my right hon. and hon. Friends on the Front Bench on securing the debate in the first place. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Boothferry (Mr. Davis) on exchanging the heat and smoke of the Maastricht battle for possibly the more quiet and cerebral atmosphere of his new Department. I wish him well in his new post.

The White Paper is good news because it clearly recognises the importance of scientific and technological innovation and the successful exploitation of such innovation to the benefit of our nation's prosperity and position in the world. There are various ways of measuring scientific output, and we have heard most of them referred to during the debate. The number of scientific papers published and cited by others in Britain in the period 1981 to 1990 was second only to the number of those published in the United States. That serves to underline the point made by hon. Members on both sides of the House—we are not short of new ideas but we often fall down on their implementation and fail to profit fully from them.

I particularly welcome the idea of Technology Foresight. The Government have examined carefully the experience of some of our major competitors, such as Germany, the United States and Japan, and have concluded that one of the best ways of realising our objectives is through the introduction and the application of Technology Foresight—a system which will not only provide early notice of the key emerging technologies but will help to forge a new working partnership between the bench scientist and working industrialists. A key element of success is frequent, productive and informal contacts between scientists and firms. We should be in the business of breaking down artificial barriers to that process. I commend the idea of an annual "Forward Look" prepared by the Office of Science and Technology which will provide a long-term assessment of the portfolio of publicly funded work and other important aspects of science and technology.

The proposed Council for Science and Technology, which will take the place of the Advisory Committee on Science and Technology, will be given the main responsibility of advising Ministers on the key science and technology issues facing this country and on the balance and direction of Government-funded science and technology.

Rightly, the White Paper places great emphasis on wealth creation. I entirely endorse a sentence from the CBI's brief on today's debate which states:

"The country cannot afford to develop elegant science and technology entirely for its own sake."

That is a very perceptive view of which full account is taken in the White Paper.

It is essential that we consider the implementation of the new ideas of our scientists in industry and commerce and ensure that this country is the prime beneficiary of those new ideas. It is noteworthy that university income from industry grew substantially through the 1980s from £27 million in 1982-83 to £114 million in 1990-91. The number of university-based science parks grew from two to about 40 over a similar period. Like other hon. Members, I welcome the fact that the Government have decided to maintain the dual-funding system of support for research in our universities.

Hon. Members on both sides of the House and those who drafted the White Paper recognise that we have a deep-seated cultural problem with science and technology. I speak from the substantial background of my indifferent science O-levels. In retrospect, it strikes me as quite bizarre that, when moving to the third form at my grammar school, I was forced to choose between ancient Greek, German and biology and make a rather crucial career decision as to how I was to proceed to A-levels and beyond —[Interruption.] Opposition Members seem to think that I took the wrong career path, but that is a matter for them.

We now have imaginative proposals, not to encourage science and technology just as a dry, academic set of subjects divorced from reality, but to stress the importance of wealth creation. That is an important theme in the White Paper.

I recently had the pleasure of visiting in my constituency Cavendish school, Bishop Bell school, the sixth form college and Eastbourne college of arts and technology. I was immeasurably impressed by the imaginative and fresh way in which science and technology subjects are now being taught in all those institutions. That freshness and imagination are amply repaid by the enthusiasm and achievement of the students involved.

The Government's education and training reforms across the board are addressing some of the deep-rooted problems. My hon. Friend the Member for Pudsey (Sir G. Shaw) dwelt on the important question of national vocational qualifications. Despite other controversies, which may not be of concern to this debate, I am sure that the introduction of the national curriculum will, over several years, focus people's attention on the necessary issues set out in the White Paper under the heading of science and technology.

Although I cannot dwell on the matter in detail, I am delighted to commend the various education-related issues and ideas set out in the White Paper. Education is the basis for developing science in this country. It is interesting to note that, in 1990, more than 1 million people were employed in science and engineering occupations in the United Kingdom. The number of people employed in those occupations has grown sharply, with an increase of more than 50 per cent. between 1971 and 1990. Just over a quarter of all degrees and equivalent qualifications that were awarded in 1990-91 were in the natural sciences, mathematics and engineering. Again, I have no time to dwell in detail on this point, but the proposals to encourage and improve PhD courses have been touched on by various colleagues, including my hon. Friend the Member for Carshalton and Wallington (Mr. Forman). That is an excellent part of the White Paper.

In Eastbourne, we have a number of high-tech companies. Indeed, in Sussex there is talk of developing an academic corridor. I have a dream that one day Eastbourne will have its very own science park. We have had silicon valley and we have had silicon glen, why not silicon beach? We are fortunate enough to have the northern European headquarters of Rhone-Poulenc Rouen, one of the great pharmaceutical companies and a great example of British inventiveness. It is also, incidentally, the largest private employer in my constituency.

Another leading high-tech company is Edwards High Vacuum, which has been in Eastbourne for many years and has a state-of-the-art factory which I visited again only the other week. That company exports vacuum equipment world wide and competes even with the Japanese on at least equal terms. Also, a company called Computing Devices is at the leading edge of surveillance and computing equipment. It played a significant role in the Gulf war, particularly in providing equipment for our Tornado aircraft. That company has a tremendous and impressive commitment to research and development.

Government policy on science and technology matters to those and other enterprises in Eastbourne and throughout the country. It matters to those who work in those companies, and it matters for the economic future and the educational sector of our country. In short, it matters for all of us.

1.41 pm

Dr. Lynne Jones (Birmingham, Selly Oak): Hon. Members have welcomed some aspects of the White Paper and the strategy in it, but I sense a deep unease on both sides of the House about whether that strategy will live up to, or be able to face up to, the challenges that the White Paper set itself in its initial consultation. We should recognise the needs of industry in terms of the science base, but I am deeply concerned that if our inadequately funded base is not to be improved and our budget is not to be increased, something will give, and that will be basic research, only a small proportion—about 20 per cent.—of the research councils' funding. In the long term, that would be very damaging.

My contribution to science and to our knowledge of intracellular communications was most marked in two aspects of my work as a scientist. One was when I got completely the opposite result to that which I expected and the other was when I discovered that, although a particular cellular component was being increasingly synthesised—the rate of synthesis was increasing—there was a net reduction in the content of that chemical. That demonstrates that one cannot predict the outcome of scientific research. It is important that we maintain an element of basic research. We have a good record in that direction, and it would be a great pity if, as a result of the strategy, it was undermined.

The emphasis in the White Paper on the privatisation of Government research laboratories and the needs of industry will undermine the long-term view. There is already criticism of short-termism in Government research laboratories. I do not see how privatisation will help to deal with that problem.

I shall focus most of my speech on the career prospects of research scientists, especially in our universities and research institutes. The White Paper rightly talks about problems in that area and mentions the fact that there has been a massive increase in the number of scientists on short-term contracts—the number has increased from 8,000 in 1980 to 16,500 in 1990.

Like my hon. Friend the Member for Cambridge (Mrs. Campbell), I am not sure whether the White Paper addresses the problem. It suggests that something should be done about the continuation of funding—building up contingency funding in universities—and the need to address the level of research studentships, which varies tremendously. For example, the Science and Engineering Research Council pays something like £5,000 a year to one of its postgraduate students. The level is slightly higher for the Medical Research Council. Cancer charities and others have recognised the importance of paying researchers a resonable rate for the important work that they do. They are paid about double what the research councils pay. In our universities, people who are undertaking different aspects of similar work in the same laboratory can receive completely different levels of remuneration which are not related to performance. That problem has not been addressed. Until it is, there will continue to be concern about the attractiveness of a science career to our young people.

I completely disagree with the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster when he says that there is no shortage of good-quality young people going into research. If he talks to people in our universities and research institutes, they will tell him that the best graduates are leaving science. That was highlighted in a recent editorial in Nature, which referred to the large number of young scientists leaving the field.

Like my hon. Friend the Member for Cambridge, I have a base in science and my partner is a scientist. If I were advising my children about a career, I would emphasise the importance of taking up a career that they will enjoy. However, if I were interested in financial rewards, I would say that they only need to compare our level of income—I am not especially complaining—with that of our friends who have gone into law, accounting or local government to see the difference. As a councillor, I saw the level of salaries for people working in different areas and compared them with the pay of my former colleagues in the universities. They do not compare well.

In our universities, lecturers with a number of years of research under their belts are being paid less than the salary of a police sergeant. Over the past 10 years or so, the relative pay of scientists has reduced remarkably—something like 20 per cent.—in comparison with other groups. It is not surprising, therefore, that our culture does not recognise the importance of science. That can be contrasted with our competitors.

When the Select Committee was in Germany, we were all struck by the fact that science was given much greater status and many of the people whom we met from science and other industries—for example, banking, the public sector and accounting—were scientifically trained. It is not true to say that we have an abundance of well-trained scientists—we do not. That is an area on which the White Paper sadly falls down.

A report published today by the Association of University Teachers and the National Association of Teachers in Further and Higher Education estimates that in five years' time more than 50 per cent. of our university teachers and researchers will be over the age of 50. It highlights the real problem in attracting the most able young people into science and our universities.

Another deep-seated problem that the White Paper failed to address is the failure of British industry to innovate. It is all very well to say that the science base must take to heart the needs of industry, but all the evidence given to me and my colleagues on the Science and Technology Select Committee points to the failure of British industry to take advantage of innovative science projects. That failure must be addressed, rather than expecting the industrial and business sectors to take some of the responsibilities currently held by the Government, for example, for the payment of research studentships. The Government must address the failure of British industry to meet its own responsibilities.

If our industry invested at the level of that of our competitors, an additional £6 billion would be devoted to R and D. The failure to address that issue of investment is a fundamental flaw in the White Paper.

The simple message is that our research and technology base needs more cash from the Government and from industry. The future of our science base should be dictated by long-term rather than short-term considerations. When the Select Committee visited Germany, we were told that, in times of recession, industry realises that it must increase its investment in R and D. The approach taken by our industry, however, is to do the opposite.

We must take a decision on which of two routes we want to follow. Do we want to be a successful economy based on a well-trained work force and a technologically highly developed industry or do we want to be a low-wage, low-tech, third-world economy? I believe that it is clear from the White Paper that the Chancellor of the Duchy wants to point us towards the first route. He should contemplate the reality, however, and decide whether the Government are taking the country down the route of our successful competitors or that followed by low-wage, low-tech economies.

1.52 pm

Dr. Robert Spink (Castle Point) The hon. Member for Birmingham, Selly Oak (Dr. Jones) called for more cash and criticised the White Paper. In response, I shall put two hypotheses to the House. First, the key to success in science engineering and technology is cultural, not cash based, and, secondly, the White Paper contains much to welcome.

It is important to establish a philosophical foundation on which to build and I trust that it will command the support of the House and the nation. Our economy depends for its success on a significant, vibrant and wealth-creating manufacturing sector. Without the hard backbone of that sector, the softer service sectors could not thrive. That manufcturing sector relies on the science base.

We need to improve the status of engineers, technologists and scientists to attract the best brains to those disciplines and to improve the public understanding and appreciation of the importance of science. We need to sharpen up our act and translate fundamental research into saleable products and processes. The sale of such items to foreign companies, against international competition, would sustain and create jobs, wealth and influence for our people.

The White Paper was long awaited and digested with relish by the key players—industry, academia, the professional institutions and the fair-minded majority of the House. I shall adduce a sample of the evidence to support that conclusion for each of those key player groups.

As we have heard, the chemical and pharmaceutical industry is one of the most vigorous and international, and is an important sector of our economy. Last year, it generated a £3·4 billion trading surplus for this country. In welcoming the White Paper, the Chemical Industries Association said:

"At the heart of the white paper are two concepts that are welcomed and shared by the chemical industry:

The importance of science and technology for improving our quality of life through economic success and wealth creation.

The role of partnership between and within government departments and the academic and business communities."

Both of those concepts are culturally and organisationally based rather than cash-based concepts.

I do not have much time, so to illustrate academia's response I shall merely mention that the Select Committee on Education, of which I am a member, visited De Montford university two weeks ago and discussed the White Paper. The university was fulsome in its welcome of the White Paper and strenuously promoted the need for more near-market research and to improve the status of engineering and engineers. I do not have time to give more detail today.

To illustrate the response given by professional institutions, I shall quote the largest—the Institution of Electrical Engineers which, with its memorandum of understanding with the IMechE, can rightly claim to represent 200,000 professional engineers throughout the world. My choice of example pains me as I am a mechanical engineer, but the comments of the electrical engineering industry are important and, as one would expect, well structured and coherent. The profession's formal response to the White Paper states:

"The White Paper is welcome because it;

—sets out a clear policy for engineering and science which addresses the UK's needs

—commits the Government to develop engineering and science in the UK and recognises the need for urgent action —recognises the importance of engineering (and science) to wealth creation

—accepts the need for the Government involvement at all stages of the innovatory process (applied as well as basic/strategic research)

—develops the role of Government in identifying and promoting important and valuable technologies through:

Technology Transfer

Technology Foresight"

I believe that both sides of the House will welcome those initiatives.

The response also states that the White Paper

"creates the Engineering and Physical Sciences Research Council with its specific commitment to —response to the needs of users

—support basic, strategic and applied research"— the word "applied" is in bold to make it stand out—

"—develop training related to industrial competitiveness".

My final example of the welcome given to the White Paper is from the House. For proof of evidence I need look no further than the Secretary of State's statement on the White Paper on 26 May. Some 18 Back Benchers were called to comment on the statement—sadly, I was not one of them. Six of them welcomed it unreservedly, two welcomed it in part and two rejected it. The eight others were noncommittal and simply posed questions; of those, five were Opposition Members and three were Conservatives, so we cannot read anything into that. Excluding the noncommittal Members, the statistics show that it can be argued that 80 per cent. welcomed, in part, the White Paper, and only 20 per cent. rejected it. Sadly, I cannot add any confidence levels to that statistical analysis as a scientist. I thank all hon. Members for their positive attitude and I hope that we can put aside petty party political point scoring and genuinely seek to move forward together for the sake of science and the nation.

Much of the evidence that I have adduced supports the hypothesis that culture counts more than cash, and adds to the evidence given by the Secretary of State today to demonstrate the wide welcome that the White Paper has received.

I should like to make three key points, giving the facts on our research and development funding record, reinforcing the pivotal position of near-market research and presenting the case for improving the status of the engineer and the scientist. Over the decade 1981-91, United Kingdom research and development expenditure on industry rose by 74 per cent. in chemicals; remained constant for electronics; fell by 17 per cent. in aerospace, for reasons that we all understand; and increased by 65 per cent. in our new and vibrant motor vehicle industry. The aggregate increase was 7 per cent. in real terms for all manufacturing. Those figures speak for themselves. The world is moving ever faster forward and we must continue to increase our spending in real terms on our science base.

My second point is the need to promote near-market research. I shall be brief because last year I spoke at length on that issue and my speech is recorded in the Official Report of 15 December 1992, columns 137-41. The nation does not take maximum advantage of its excellent science base which too often seems to benefit the economies of our international competitors rather than our own. That is a component of the British disease.

The phenomenon is clearly illustrated by the comparison between the United Kingdom and Japan. In this century, Britain has won 61 Nobel prizes and registered 50,000 patents. Japan has won only four Nobel prizes but has registered seven times that number of patents—350,000. That is a consequence of our neglect of near-market research. No one body is to blame and even the City bears a share of the responsibility for that.

It has been pointed out that applied research receives only one tenth of the funding received by basic research. Consultations on the White Paper show that industrialists do not want us altogether to abandon good basic research. There must be a proper and more even balance between basic and applied research.

My third key point is about the need to improve the status of the engineer and the scientist. A national framework of objectives is required to promote engineering and science and make them more desirable. I have advocated the use of differential student grants, a redistribution from the soft arts to the hard sciences—from wealth absorption to wealth creation. That would attract more of the best students to engineering and away from professions such as the law. Perhaps that is a dangerous example in this place and I shall need to watch my back and my front.

I am bewildered by the fact that eminent scientists, engineers and professional managers who have achieved doctorates and often two other degrees as well are refused their correct title of doctor by no less an institution than the Financial Times. That can only be part of the British disease because it would not happen in Germany. I respectfully ask the Financial Times to rethink its editorial policy as part of a campaign to change the anti-science and anti-engineering culture of this country.

The Government should look again at the Finniston report, which contained excellent aims and, like the White Paper, often hit the target splendidly. These issues are cultural rather than cash based. That is because in essence, the problem is about attitude, perception and tradition. Time prevents me from adducing all the evidence in support of my hypotheses. However, I have given enough evidence to confirm that the two hypotheses can be sustained, that success in science, engineering and technology is more a function of culture than of cash and that the White Paper is a most welcome initiative.

2.4 pm

Dr. Lewis Moonie (Kirkcaldy): As usual, I have the wonderful task of trying to condense a 40-minute speech, prepared in case there was a shortage of speakers, into the 10 minutes that I have left because of the superfluity of them. I am sorry that my hon. Friend the Member for Ellesmere Port and Neston (Mr. Miller) and the hon. Member for City of Chester (Mr. Brandreth) have been unable to take part in the debate. That happens sometimes, and I am sure that they will catch your eye favourably, Mr. Deputy Speaker, in our next debate on science, which I trust will be soon, and not in 10 years' time.

The Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster has twice referred to an item in the Labour party paper published just before the White Paper, on which I feel that I must correct him, for the record. He has described us as condemning scientists for just demanding more money. That was not what we said. We said that it was a disappointment, when the right hon. Gentleman was addressing so many issues, that some people had chosen to address only the need for resources. That is a quite different point and a different emphasis. I suspect that if he had read as many different documents as I have, he might not have made that error.

We start our debate against the background not only of the White Paper but of our economic and industrial failings. Without casting any blame, although no doubt that will be done on many other occasions, generally in the direction of the Government, I must point out that spending by the Government has fallen in real terms, from a high point in 1985-86 of £6,093 million to £5,117·3 million. Those figures are not mine; they came in a written answer from the Office of Public Service and Science.

That is the background to our debate—spending has fallen, and spending on civil research has fallen faster than that on defence. We must accept that reality. I believe that Ministers have accepted it. The President of the Board of Trade, in his introduction to the research and development scoreboard publication this week, said:

> "It is also sobering to see that the top international companies spend some 4·6 per cent. of their sale figures on R and D where UK companies spend 1·6 per cent."

There is much else in the background to which I could refer—our slow recovery from recession and the slight fall in real cash terms in the science budget, ignoring the transfer from the education budget to the science budget, which was money that was to be spent anyway over the next two years. That fall is disappointing. It is a larger fall in comparison with the rate at which we expect GDP to grow over that time and, therefore, worrying.

I could speak about many of those matters, but have not the time to do so. The White Paper appears at a time of great concern for anyone who wishes to see us live in a thriving and prosperous country; therefore, we must judge it not on its main objectives, but on what it has left out. Had the Chancellor said that that had happened, and that we might have to return to the subject and develop it, we might have accepted the support from some Conservative Members for his position. However, he did not. In effect, he said, "This is what you are getting and that's tough. Consensus means that you must agree with it." That is not so.

Hon. Members on both sides of the House have shown today that consensus means that the Chancellor must also be prepared to move his position and listen to constructive criticism. I accept that criticism must be constructive. He must accept the need for change and development in some of his proposals. We whole-heartedly welcome some of the proposals in the White Paper and we welcome it as a step, but only a step, towards a rational basis for a scientific and technological development.

Had I time, I would refer in detail to submissions that I have received from the Institution of Professionals,

[Dr. Lewis Moonie]

Managers and Specialists. As right hon. and hon. Members will appreciate, that is not a body of "Trots," but a much respected organisation whose comments the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster will, I am sure, read with great interest and concern. The same is true of the comments of Save British Science, which represents scientists working in many different disciplines.

Although we welcome the Government's objectives, they will not of themselves guarantee manufacturing success. We emphasise the need for new resources. I am not arguing, as the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster might suggest, that new resources will solve all the problems, because they will not. However, some new money, properly spent, is essential. I am certain that the right hon. Gentleman, in his heart and in his head, recognises that. Whether he can convince his colleagues in the Treasury, in particular, of that is another matter, but I am sure that he will fight that battle on behalf of our science base.

Although more money needs to be spent on near-market research, that should not be done at the expense of our science base. The two are separate and—sadly, in this context—conflicting priorities. Money must continue to be spent on our science base, and this country's scientific knowledge must continue to advance. They can be complementary.

The Economic and Social Research Council is the least hard science-orientated of the research councils, but over the past year it has produced far and away the best material for anyone seeking a better understanding of our failure to implement technology and to innovate. The best contributions to that debate are made by ESRC documents such as "Innovation Agenda" by David Smith and that which I received today, "Regenerating British Industry—An Agenda for Management." Both are worth studying, for they have much in them that could be developed.

An attempt must be made to reverse the fall in total Government spending on research and development. One recognises the economic difficulties—I am prepared to go that far, given a public spending deficit of £50 billion. However, money spent in that direction will have a multiplier effect and generate future wealth, so it should not be considered in the same category as spending that offers a lower return.

Tax credits have been shown to work in the United States as a cost-effective way of ensuring that additional research and only additional research—there is no dead weight cost—is undertaken by British companies that are eligible for tax credits. It is disgraceful that, in a recession, British companies cut back on research and development but borrow to maintain dividends. That is not the way to ensure long-term success. There could also be better support for small to medium-sized enterprises through a technological infrastructure and the provision of more effective resourcing.

As to human resources, the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster should ask those of his colleagues responsible for education, particularly in Scotland, why more children in Scotland achieve science qualifications to enable them to enter into university than do children in England. In a state school in Fife, my sons are taught in science classes of 15 pupils, whereas their counterparts in England are taught in classes of 30 to 35. The same is true of all the other schools in Fife at least.

That kind of attention allows children to develop an understanding and a liking for science, which encourages them to continue with the subject further into their curriculum—particularly in Scotland, which has a wider-based curriculum than England and Wales, which stick to three A-level subjects. Perhaps that is another point for future discussion.

I hope that the number of PhDs will not be reduced as a means of increasing the number of MSCs. Although MSCs are a good first step, which I have recommended in the past, we cannot reduce the number of PhDs until figures are produced showing that we can afford to do so. We must base our decisions on information, when it is available.

We need to take three kinds of technological action. First, we should act on an international level. We should take account of the fourth framework programme, and consider what we can contribute and what we can take out of it. At national level, we must look at key technologies such as telecommunications, information and environmental management. We should expand such technologies, rather than reducing and rationalising them. We must introduce the necessary mechanisms—for instance, a limited number of new research institutes. Those mechanisms must be cross-disciplinary—not tied to a single institution, but large enough to take the best from all of them. That is one reason why Faraday centres are so important: they are not tied to one university department, but can draw from a cluster of six, seven or eight. Consequently, they can contribute much more to the regions in which they are sited.

I welcome the Minister unreservedly to his new post. I hope that the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster has listened to what I have said; it was intended to be as constructive as all the other speeches, and I hope that it will be accepted in that spirit.

2.16 pm

The Parliamentary Secretary, Office of Public Service and Science (Mr. David Davis): I thank the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Dr. Moonie) for his welcome. I should have liked to compliment the hon. Member for Redcar (Ms Mowlam) on her maiden speech on science, but I know that she had to leave. If we have achieved nothing else, we seem to have stirred the Oppositon Front Bench to a response. I am sorry that the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) is unavoidably absent; he wrote a gracious letter explaining that he could not be with us today. We miss the benefit of his wisdom, which, no doubt, we shall have on a future occasion.

Although I am not entirely new to science, I am a new boy in terms of ministerial office. I am delighted to be able to speak so early on an almost equally new White Paper, although all the credit for its contents must go to others. One thing that science training provides is a sense of humility in those dealing with complex subjects. [Interruption.] It is clear that one of my colleagues has not observed that sense of humility before. I am still listening and learning, as we all are: our approach to science, engineering and technology has not changed just because we have published a White Paper.

I was impressed by the number and quality of speeches, which was unusual for a Friday. I shall refer to as many as possible; I hope that hon. Members whom I do not mention will forgive me. If they have specific questions, I shall try to write to them. First, let me pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Wantage (Mr. Jackson), who spoke eloquently; if I had known that he was going to speak, I would have formulated an equally eloquent compliment, as I believe that much of the potential success of our policies is thanks to him.

In a famous exchange, Newton was asked the reason for his success in scientific achievement. He replied—I speak from memory—"If it falls to me to see further than others, it is because I stand on the shoulders of giants." I feel the same.

My hon. Friend the Member for Wantage argued eloquently in favour of a strategy of maximum effective use of finite resources without an undermining of our basic capacity. I believe that we all agree with that.

My hon. Friend the Member for Pudsey (Sir G. Shaw), the Chairman of the Select Committee, made an eminent and witty speech. I hope that he will forgive me for saying that, given his problems with the gender of the Opposition spokesman, we shall not propose him as a candidate for chairman of any of the biological research committees. He made a strong and eminent speech on many broad-ranging matters, which the Select Committee had considered before, and, like many others, concentrated on two rather significant areas. The first was the importance of science and technology in wealth creation, which is a fundamental part of the White Paper and, in some senses, is one of its most important thrusts, and the second was the importance of engineering. I remind the House that only this week the Secretary of State for Education announced an engineering bursary scheme to try to attract the best A-level students into science degrees. My only regret is that it is one year too late for my daughter, but it is an important and symbolic gesture which shows how seriously we treat the matter.

My hon. Friend also dealt with defence research and development and with what will happen as pressures mount on the defence R and D budget. One or two hon. Members made the mistake of suggesting that the White Paper does not consider that point. Chapter 4, which is devoted to this important subject, contains commitments to increase the civil spin-offs and states that the Defence Research Agency is an excellent structure to achieve that.

It has been suggested that the Office of Science and Technology will not have the clout in Whitehall to carry this through. I have always been told that it is a good idea to be underestimated at the start of one's job, so I thank the hon. Members who made that point. Our chief scientist, Bill Stewart, has equal status to the MOD's chief scientist and will play a full role in discussions.

Mr. Miller: The MOD has the tanks!

Mr. Davis: We shall see.

The DRA will publish in its annual report its progress in transferring its expertise and technology to industry and in generating income from sources outside government. That is an important and fundamental point.

A number of points were made by my hon. Friend the Member for Bedfordshire, North (Sir T. Skeet), but, if I am to be fair to other hon. Members, I cannot deal with all of them now. He asked about the composition of the Technology Foresight group. Like him, I view Technology Foresight as one of the jewels in the crown of the White Paper. It is the central technique which will help us to deal with many of the criticisms that have been rightly raised today. That foresight steering group will be drawn mainly from the industrial, scientific and engineering communities, and also from research charities and, of course, from Government Departments. I know that my hon. Friend is knowledgeable of the engineering community and we will bear that in mind when we select the group members. I will also bear in mind his other comments.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bedfordshire, North asked about the possible transfer of Government-funded laboratories to the private sector. That is covered specifically and explicitly in the White Paper. The Government believe that many of the services currently provided by research establishments could be carried out by the private sector. He will forgive me if I do not go into detail; I do not want to pre-empt decisions that are to be made later. The Government are keen on the idea of private-sector funding and certainly do not believe, as I think the hon. Member for Cambridge (Mrs. Campbell) suggested, that it would lead to short-termism. On the contrary, the customer-client relationship leads not to short-termism but to explicit understanding of what we are trying to achieve.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bedfordshire North also asked whether the Council for Science and Technology was broad enough for the task. Yes; it will bring together customers of publicly funded research, industrialists, academics and the Government Departments that are most directly involved.

Two of the most penetrating speeches this morning were made by my hon. Friends the Members for Elmet (Mr. Batiste) and for Carshalton and Wallington (Mr. Forman). I listened carefully to both of them. I took the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Elmet on the mission statement for the Government. I shall be drawing mine up when I return to my Department.

The hon. Member for Motherwell, South (Dr. Bray), as always, made a broad-ranging and impressive speech. I have followed many of his speeches carefully in the past because of my interest in the subject. He held out the wonderfully disingenuous option of 2 per cent. additional growth which we should all like to achieve and for which we struggle. I thought that his presenting the President of the Board of Trade as a barbarian—despite his nickname as Tarzan—was going a little far, but I understand the point he was making. [Laughter.] I thought that that would get attention.

The hon. Gentleman was trying to assert that the Chancellor had failed to persuade the DTI of the importance of technological competitiveness for the growth of the economy. I remind him that we are talking about a Government White Paper—it has Government support, Cabinet support, collective support, and it sets out the way in which the Government believe the country should proceed. We will fight that corner in the coming years. I say that with deliberate emphasis on the plural. [Interruption.] I gather there is another optimist on the Opposition Front Bench.

My hon. Friend the Member for Lewes (Mr. Rathbone) picked up the point about funding, which was made by several Opposition Members. I shall also deal now with the question of an incremental tax system. He said that it was important for a commitment to be made to funding, but, under our system, White Papers do not make such commitments. However, we got as close as it is possible to get. Paragraph 1.17 states:

"The Government will continue to allocate public resources to science and engineering on the scale necessary to continue the policies in this White Paper."

We have watched the incremental tax scheme in America. At the moment, we have a 100 per cent. tax allowance scheme, but the incremental scheme is the notion that, on a marginal basis, one adds 25 per cent. or a higher figure. The difficulty is the classification of R and D and the behaviour of companies under such a scheme. I do not wish to spend my remaining four minutes setting out a doctoral thesis on the subject, but I will say that it is extremely difficult to design a watertight system. If that were not the case, the scheme would be a much better runner. We are watching, but the American experience so far is ambivalent, and we should find it very difficult to make it work.

The hon. Member for Carmarthen (Mr. Williams) questioned the absence of Faraday centres. I do not have time for my story about Faraday—I have already told my story about Newton—but I remind the House of the Faraday principles. They are a two-way flow of industrial technology and skilled people between science and engineering-based industry, partnerships between industrial-oriented research organisations in the science and engineering base, core research underpinning product and process development, and industrially relevant post-graduate training.

This is a Faraday White Paper. Faraday centres are not incorporated in it because small and medium-sized enterprises, which would gain most from the concept, did not show any enthusiasm for the system so we are trying to achieve the Faraday principles by other mechanisms. If one wants to remember the White Paper by one set of criteria, let it be the Faraday criteria.

The hon. Member for Birmingham, Selly Oak (Dr. Jones) who, sadly, is no longer here, mentioned career structures and said that the best graduates were leaving science. That is not the case. There is a net inflow of academic staff from other employment. Like the concept of the brain drain, her suggestion is plumb wrong. I shall not read out the figures, but, if the hon. Lady wishes, I shall write to her. I remind the House again of our action on the engineering bursary and our decision to examine the quality of students.

The key points in the White Paper are, first, the "Forward Look" which sets objectives over a five-to-10-year period. It will deliver a long-term national strategy for Government science, engineering and technology which should be welcomed by everyone and, as the Chancellor said, has been welcomed by virtually everyone.

The Technology Foresight programme is the jewel in the crown of the White Paper. We will use that method to deal with the issue of foreign countries exploiting technology more fully than we have historically done in Britain. We have good technologists and scientists, but we have not translated that fact into the wealth creation that the White Paper attempts to address.

The new Council for Science and Technology—the forum of independent members from industry, business, academia and Government—is to be chaired by my right hon. Friend. The explicit political clout that the council is to be given demonstrates the political commitment to raising the profile of science and engineering technology.

Many points relating to chemistry were raised with reference to our debate on the changes to research councils. That matter is under review, of course, but all the research councils have been told explicitly that they must study the underlying science as well as the individual areas that they address.

It being half-past Two o'clock, the motion for the Adjournment of the House lapsed, without Question put.

Youth Training Guarantee (Newham)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Arbuthnot.]

2.31 pm

Mr. Ron Leighton (Newham, North-East): I welcome the Minister to her new post. The situation that I am about to describe was not caused by her but has been dumped in her lap.

The Government abolished benefits for 16 and 17-year-olds, and instead promised every young person without a job a guaranteed training place and a small allowance. That guarantee is not being implemented in the London borough of Newham and never has been implemented there. There are hundreds of young people in Newham without a job or a training place. There are hundreds who, for years, have been without a training place in the borough. I am grateful for the opportunity to air that scandal in House.

I have taken a close interest in youth training—first, through the Select Committee that I chaired during two Parliaments and, secondly, in the borough. I have kept in close touch with the training providers, the careers service, the training and enterprise councils, the youth service and the young people themselves.

Ministers stand at the Dispatch Box and repeat that they are committed to the guarantee. That sounds good, but what does that weasel word mean? The Government do not deliver the guarantee—they leave that to the TECs. They hide behind the TECs and say that it is a matter for them, but they do not give the TECs sufficient funding.

The TECs themselves do not deliver the training. They subcontract it out to training providers, but then give the trainers such a low unit price that decent training—and the guarantee—cannot be delivered. The Government then stand back, several stages removed, saying that they have instructed the TECs to implement the guarantee. Some TECs have training weeks available but also young people without places. How is that? It happens because the unit price is so low that no training provider will take the places offered.

I have continually brought these matters to the attention of Ministers. I had an Adjournment debate in November 1991. In the same year, I arranged a conference at Westminster for training providers in Newham and Tower Hamlets, which was also attended by Win Harris of the Department of Employment. It was shown that hundreds of young people did not have training places, and that the unit price, after the allowances were paid, left only around £3 a week to pay for the training. The main cause of the problem was inadequate funding. The then Under-Secretary of State, the hon. Member for Wantage (Mr. Jackson), wrote to me on 9 December 1991 saying that trainers should take up their concerns with the TEC.

The reason for the low unit price—around £38—out of which a 17-year-old is paid a £35 allowance, leaving £3 for training, is that it was based on the assumption that employers would participate, give work experience placements and make a financial contribution, thus topping up the £38.

People used to talk about the demographic time-bomb and imagine that employers would be fighting over a dwindling number of young people. That is not happening, particularly in Newham. My hon. Friend the Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) is here and will vouch for the fact that the economy in Newham has largely been destroyed and employers are very thin on the ground. Those who remain have been hit hard by the recession. Struggling to survive, they have been making redundancies, not taking on trainees.

Without the employers, a big hole is left in numbers and finance and the sums do not add up. Without employer placements, the only alternative is project-based training simulating workshop experience, but that is expensive. For example, Mowlem's told me this week that it cannot provide construction youth training for less than £74 a week. An enhanced unit price is needed for that sort of project-based training. The guarantee cannot be delivered without more resources.

In Newham, we have a youth advisory group consisting of the local authority, voluntary organisations, the careers service, an employer partnership, the police and the TEC. I attend when I can.

We held a meeting some months ago to discuss youth training. It was established that 400 Newham youngsters were seeking youth training places. Paul Taylor, the TEC's Newham director, agreed that he would ask for that number of places at a unit price of £100 a week. Apparently, back at the TEC, someone talked him out of that and a request was made for places at about £40 a week. People on the advisory group were very disappointed to hear that.

Irritated by the constant repetition of the Government's alleged commitment to YT and Ministers saying that everyone was guaranteed a place, I asked at a Select Committee meeting whether the then Under-Secretary of State, the hon. Member for Wantage, would meet a group of young people from Newham. Without great enthusiasm, he agreed. I thought that I would present him with real people and flesh and blood. I thought that I would present him with the people whom he said did not exist—Newham young people without a job or a training place.

On the appointed day, I took about 100 youngsters to the Department of Employment. The Under-Secretary came down to meet us as arranged, but when he saw the numbers involved, he retreated back into the lift. He sent down a message saying that he would meet only six of those youngsters. He later made a number of undertakings to those he met. However, nothing came of that because the general election intervened and the hon. Gentleman was moved.

As the Under-Secretary would not meet people at Westminster, my next move was to invite the successor of the hon. Member for Wantage, the hon. Member for Derbyshire, West (Mr. McLoughlin), to visit Newham to see things for himself. The new Minister agreed to come and, around that time, some improvements were made. Sixty places were agreed at Mowlem's and about 60 extra places were agreed, at an enhanced rate, at Newham community college. I welcome those improvements, but they are not enough.

After one cancellation and delay, the Minister was good enough to visit us on 12 May last. His visit consisted of three parts: the first was a meeting with Martin Tolhurst, the principal of Newham community college. The purpose was to explain not only that there was a problem, but that we could provide a solution. The principal offered to provide a further 200 high-quality places at the college at a unit price of £100 a week, all of which would lead to national vocational qualifications. If the Minister will accept that offer—I urge her to do that as strongly as I can—she can, at a stroke, break the back of the problem in Newham. I look forward eagerly to what she will say on that point.

The second part of the Minister's meeting was a meeting with local training providers. They left him in no doubts about their feelings. A flavour of what they had to say can be gained from letters that they have sent me. Roy McLean, the assistant principal of Newham community college, wrote:

"For a number of years, as many as 500 young Newham people at a time have not had the youth training 'guarantee' met. This locks them into an unemployment and poverty trap from which there may be no escape, and will eventually be a considerable cost to the individuals, the local community and the state.

Local businesses are trying to survive a diffcult economic climate and are not prepared in general to provide work placement for young people, as this is time-consuming and a cost to them."

Mr. McLean states that he can "provide a full range of national vocational qualifications to level NVQ4 and beyond" and refers to all the areas in which he can do that. He continues:

"The College could provide a YT place to virtually all local young people who want one . . . The Local Training and Enterprise Council (LETEC) recently offered the College a total of some £40 per week per trainee. That is typical and the College is required to pay that money to the student as living allowance and travel expenses, leaving no funds to pay teachers, technicians, and to cover overheads. This means that the College is not financed to actually deliver the training. That is not a viable proposition for the College . . . As a special case, LETEC agreed recently to a one-off support for some 60 YT trainees."

It agreed to do that at an enhanced price which I will not mention because it may be commercially confidential. However, it was double the normal rate. The letter continues:

"Unless such a realistic and minimum level of support can be maintained, we will again face a situation where aspiring young people will not have access to training, and will miss a crucial opportunity to achieve success and gain employment. The overriding issue in Newham, therefore, is the unit price paid by LETEC for YT places."

Convergence Systems referred to the "fact that funding levels for Youth Training in the LETEC area are generally lower than the actual costs of training allowances and fares which Managing Agents pay to trainees."

The East London Partnership, a group of employers, wanted to raise this point:

"Considering the difficulty at present in finding work placements with local employers for youth trainees, can government offer a financial contribution to employers to assist them meeting the costs?"

Nadet Ltd., which operates in docklands, provides courses for 240 unemployed persons. It states:

"We were approached last December by LETEC and asked if we were interested in starting a Youth Training Scheme based here in the Docks covering Business Administration. As this was a new venture for us we negotiated a price of 57.00 pounds per trainee per week and it was agreed that when the new round of contracts started in April this would be reduced slightly by a few pounds.

In fact this has been slashed down to 38.66 per week, some 18.34 less, a drop of 32 per cent. This figure does not even cover the cost of their allowance and fares. We are already running full to contract with 40 trainees in training proving demand but unless we can very soon find placements where the employers will contribute towards their costs, we will not be able to continue with this scheme, and this coupled with the demand for YT places paints a bleak picture for those youngsters leaving school this year in Newham. If we cannot hold and train these youngsters that cannot get jobs or who have had bad experiences with schooling, what alternatives do they have."

Nadet later said to me that the careers service estimates that, in the summer, an additional 600 youngsters in the boroughs will require YT places. I have received a fax from the careers service which tells me that the current figure for those who have been on its books for eight weeks and eligible for places is 278.

Sid Hughes, the principal of Newham sixth form college, wrote to me saying that a member of the TEC board

"seems convinced that the unit price available in the LETEC region is much lower than that available in other parts of the country . . . She was also quite positive that funding is not available to meet the demand for places."

Then there is the Newham community employment project. On 23 April, I presented national vocational qualification certificates to more than 40 successful trainees. The previous Minister wrote to us saying that the Government were not "capable of usefully delivering more places".

The Newham community employment project is hopping mad about that and it has written to LETEC asking for an explanation. Quest states:

"The YT guarantee is suffering from the same sleight of hand as the adult unemployment figures. So many provisos are placed on the definition of a young person who meets the requirements of the guarantee that I have great sympathy with LETEC in its efforts to try and prove to the Department of Employment that the guarantee is not being met. It must be nearly impossible. There is no doubt, however, that the guarantee is not being met for a large number of disabled/special needs young people since the provision to meet the requirements of these young people does not even exist.

It must also be remembered that Youth Training is fairly unpopular with many young people and their parents, mainly because of the low level of YT allowance specified by the Government—£29.50 per week at 16 and £35 per week at 17.

Quest tells me:

"This year Quest's STN training places have been cut"

and

"The reduction in funding for STN trainees, the employment of an additional member of staff to meet the Level 1 NVQ requirements and a cut in the number of STN training places means that our Initial Training Unit is no longer financially viable".

Rose Lavin of Kalamazoo Training Consultants Ltd., which runs an information technology centre in docklands, wrote to me, saying:

"I would suggest that unless LETEC seriously re-assesses its contractual arrangements with providers it may well find that quality providers in East London will be non-existent, and as tax payer, I strongly object to such monies being used (a) merely to reduce an unemployment register (b) to produce sub standard training at a time when our young generation have not only to compete with each other in a reduced job market but to compete with European youngsters.

The future of local boroughs and indeed of the nation depends on a well trained workforce and good training costs money. Quality training cannot be had for £3·00 or less per week.

The Government have to either:

(a) Produce tax or other incentives to encourage employers to train young people on site whilst employing them.

or

(b) Use the existing resources i.e. colleges, training providers and community groups in a way that through directed quality training they can be paid their allowance and a unit price for training.

I don't feel that we should be a glorified unemployment Benefit Office for young people and if 95 per cent. of the unit price is being used to pay out training allowances then that's what we've become."

I had a letter from Paul Taylor, the director of the LETEC. He said:

"I should be interested to hear the Minister's views about the provision of Youth Training. Specifically, if LETEC's Youth Training contracts were to be completely full, LETEC had no extra resources to allocate yet there was still a waiting list of young people waiting to join the programme, at what point would the Government consider allocating additional resources?

I am sure we shall have an interesting meeting."

It will be interesting to find out today.

After the visit, I received a letter from the principal of Newham community college, which said:

"Late in 1992 we were approached by LETEC to provide YT places to meet the shortfall in the YT guarantee in Newham. In response we offered some 300 places.

To date LETEC has funded 52 places, and despite there being young people on both our own waiting list and that in the Careers Service, has refused to fund more places at the College on the basis of cost, i.e. they say that we are too expensive."

The price is in-house, but the college gives high-quality places. The principal says:

"these prices are paid in other parts of the country where there is high unemployment.

We are ready to provide more YT places in a wide variety of vocational areas that are relevant to future labour market needs if LETEC can provide a realistic unit price.

As part of the Stratford City Challenge we have offered LETEC an additional 180 YT places. LETEC has agreed this in principle but only offered between £32 and £40 per week for each place. We cannot provide training at this price as it will only meet the cost of the trainee allowance and expenses.

Paul Taylor responded to the Newham Recorder by stating that there are currently YT vacancies in Newham that have to be filled before he can ask for extra resources. This is unacceptable. There clearly are a great many young people in Newham without a place, and the existence of vacancies at the same time merely points to the unattractiveness of those places to young people, which in turn is probably linked to LETEC's low unit price. In other words we have a vicious circle with Newham young peopole getting the rough end of the deal.

As I have now said on numerous occasions, I can offer and fill more high quality YT places if LETEC is willing to fund them."

There is a long list of young people waiting to come in.

In the third part of his visit, the Minister met a group of young people without jobs or training places. Obviously, that is clear evidence that the guarantee is not being implemented. One thing that came out strongly from the meeting with Newham youngsters was the low reputation of youth training places which came from their experience or that of their brothers and sisters. Many regarded them as a second rate stop-gap—a low-quality, cheap labour scheme.

Many of the places have been of low quality. How can quality be delivered for £3 a week? The Minister's predecessor, Alan Clark, wrote in his diary that he did not like the job because the Department operated bogus schemes that were designed to reduce the unemployment register at the lowest possible price. The places at the community college to which I referred are of high quality and lead to quality qualifications.

It was difficult not to come away from that meeting with the Minister and those young people without feeling that we were largely creating a lost generation of young people without work, training or hope. Many are thrown on the scrapheap at 16. I am sure that our youngsters deserve something better than that and we should be able to provide it.

We were grateful for the Minister's visit—even if he has moved on—and eagerly awaited his letter to us. When the letter came, we were all astounded by what it said:

"You asked me if more resources would be made available if LETEC were unable, because of funding, to meet the Youth Training Guarantee. I can assure you that I and my Ministerial colleagues remain fully committed to the Guarantee and we will continue to ensure that it is being met. Moreover no TEC will be prevented from meeting the Guarantee by lack of resources. At this stage LETEC have not approached me or Departmental officials on this issue. Clearly if LETEC make a case, I will give it careful consideration."

It has been suggested that money is available but the TEC has not asked for it. Why not? It appears that some money is still available, so it feels that it cannot ask for more. Why has it not spent that money on getting decent training? The chairman and chief executive of the TEC have been changed. It has been said that this TEC is the first one to have made an operating loss—perhaps that is why the chief executive was moved.

The chairman-elect does not like it being said that the TEC has let down the young people of Newham. But what other description can be given when hundreds of youngsters in the borough do not have training places? That has been the case for years and it is a disgrace. The TEC is operating in a hostile environment with inadequate funds. But it is not a tool of the Government—it must speak publicly for the people of Newham.

I ask the Under-Secretary to take a personal interest in this matter, cut through the red tape and not to accept any excuses for this unacceptable mess. I know the Minister to be a caring person. When she wore a different hat, I brought to her attention the bad conditions in Jubilee house, a Department of Social Security office in Newham. She came to see it and then took action. That was appreciated by the local people. I hope that she will do the same on this matter.

The Government have repeatedly said that no TEC will be prevented, by lack of resources, from meeting the YT guarantee. We may well hear that promise again today. The problem in Newham could definitely be solved if resources were made available. The crux of the matter is that extra cash is needed. I hope that the Minister and her officials will get to the bottom of it. I intend to keep in touch with her on the issue.

Newham has more than its fair share of problems, including an unemployment rate that is more than double the national average. When I presented GCSE certificates at a local comprehensive recently, I discovered that just six of the cohort who had left had obtained jobs.

If the east Thames corridor and docklands are to be developed, Newham will benefit only if we have a skilled generation. I shall continue to use every opportunity available to me as a Member of Parliament to raise the scandal of the non-implementation of the YT guarantee until it is satisfactorily resolved. If we can solve it, at least I shall have done something for the people who elected me.

2.50 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Employment (Miss Ann Widdecombe): I congratulate the hon. Member for Newham, North-East (Mr. Leighton) on obtaining the Adjournment. I also welcome the presence of the hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing), who takes a keen interest in this subject.

The Government are extremely concerned to deliver the YT guarantee. I take it seriously. I accept that the implementation of the guarantee at Newham was causing concern some months ago. Since then, things have considerably improved. I take no credit for that, however, because the hon. Member for Newham, North-East will understand that it was the responsibility of my predecessor.

It is worth drawing the figures relating to Newham to the attention of the hon. Gentleman. The number of YT trainees who have been waiting more than eight weeks for a place has declined from 103 in February to the latest figure of 35. It is also worth pointing out that, against that figure of 35, there are 47 vacancies in Newham.

I accept, as I am sure that the hon. Gentleman would point out, that it does not necessarily follow that all those vacancies are well matched to the trainees in question. In the TEC area, however, many vacancies are available not only in Newham but in neighbouring boroughs, including quite a number in Tower Hamlets.

Mr. Leighton: Is the Minister aware that I have received a fax from the careers service in Newham which reveals that the number of clients who are unemployed and who have maintained contact at least once in the eight weeks preceding the count date and are eligible for a YT place is 278?

Miss Widdecombe: The hon. Gentleman is quoting from a different base. I was quoting figures relating specifically to Newham, not across the borough, because I thought that that was the hon. Gentleman's immediate area of interest. The figures are the standard ones produced against the standard count. I shall, of course, be pleased to look at any figures that suggest anything different—certainly on the scale quoted by the hon. Gentleman. I suspect that the problem is that we are not talking about like for like.

It is a pleasure to be addressing an important subject at a reasonable hour. Adjournment debates often take place in the rosy-fingered dawn, when it is sometimes less than easy to do justice to the importance of a subject.

I shall consider first the Government's overall policy on YT and then consider the situation in Newham specifically. I am more than happy to take an interest in the matters that the hon. Gentleman has raised. I should also be happy to visit the hon. Gentleman's constituency, as well as the catchment area of his hon. Friend the Member for Newham, South.

The Government place huge importance on giving young people of 16 a positive choice. There are three main choices—they can stay in full-time education, which an increasing number of them are choosing to do; if they are able and willing, they can take a job; or they can undertaken training. We demonstrate our commitment to encouraging young people to take up suitable training by the guarantee of a suitable place for those under 18 who are not in full-time education if they are willing and want to train.

Many of the young people who attended the meeting that the hon. Gentleman had with my predecessor were still at school or college, or were not interested in YT and had said that they would not consider it. The hon. Gentleman is a trifle unfair to quote from the diaries of Alan Clark, who was in the Department in the mid-1980s. The concept of training has moved on vastly since then. In particular, the implementation of training and enterprise councils and the new arrangements for training have overtaken much of Alan Clark's thinking. I would concede that the early days of YT did not cover the scheme in glory or produce a threnody or song of praise, but things have moved on so substantially since then that it is unfair to make comparisons on that basis.

It is Government policy, in which I firmly believe, that it is utterly wrong in principle for school leavers to be offered benefit-supported unemployment as an option, except in the most severe of circumstances. In May, there were, nationally, 4,000 young people who had waited for longer than eight weeks for a place, but of those, 1,650 had already had an offer. That waiting figure has reduced considerably in recent months—25 per cent. since April. The positive side is that 230,000 young people—compared to the 4,000—entered YT and participated in youth credit schemes in 1992-93. There are currently more than 240,000 young people in training in England. That amounts to 12 million weeks of training at a time when the economy has been under severe pressure.

The previous Secretary of State for Employment made absolutely clear to training and enterprise councils the importance that the Government place on the delivery of the guarantee. My colleague, the new Secretary of State for Employment, is equally determined that that guarantee will be met. In July last year, we introduced new arrangements for monitoring the YT guarantee. Each month, careers offices throughout the country provide my Department and their local training and enterprise council with returns on the number of people registered with them who are covered by the guarantee. A report is made to me each month and I take an interest in each region of the country. However, for the immediate future I shall take a a particular interest in the figures from the hon. Gentleman's constituency.

As a result of the close monitoring and calling to account, training and enterprise councils and careers services have been encouraged to work together even more closely to identify the needs not just of groups of young people, but individual young people. That is why, when an individual has been waiting for more than eight weeks for delivery of a guarantee, the relevant TEC should have full knowledge of the individual circumstances of that young person. As I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will concede, some young people are not placeable. They may have problems; they may never be available; they may never be contactable; they may deliberately refuse to take places no matter how often they are offered them.

There are a certain number of young people for whom we will not be able to deliver the guarantee no matter how much we may wish to do so. But we are interested in those who have been waiting eight weeks and have not been placed despite being motivated. Therefore, I give the undertaking that we shall look closely at the individual circumstances of any young person in Newham who has been waiting for more than eight weeks.

The hon. Gentleman rightly predicted that I would say —I am going to do so loudly and clearly—that no training and enterprise council should be prevented from meeting the guarantee through lack of funds. My predecessor wrote to the hon. Gentleman on 26 May, shortly before the changeover, and explained why the statements made by the hon. Gentleman about unit prices were not completely fair. My predecessor explained the funding arrangements and made the statement that I have made today—doubtless to the hon. Gentleman's irritation—that we believe that we adequately resource the training and enterprise councils and keep the matter constantly under review.

The London East training and enterprise council currently has 430 YT vacancies in its district, of which 47 are in Newham, 48 are in Redbridge and 165 are in Tower Hamlets. Those districts are immediately accessible from the hon. Gentleman's constituency and cover a range of activities—business administration, warehousing, retail, motor repair, maintenance and construction——

The motion having been made at half-past Two o'clock and the debate having continued for half an hour, MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER adjourned the House without Question put, pursuant to the Standing Order.

Adjourned at Three o'clock.

Written Answers to Questions

Monday 7 June 1993

CHURCH COMMISSIONERS

Church Funds

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the right hon. Member for Selby, representing the Church Commissioners, if he will list the number of dioceses which (a) paid and (b) were unable to pay their full quota to central church funds for each of the last 10 years; and if he will express (a) as a percentage of (b).

Mr. Alison: This is not a matter for the Commissioners; a diocese's quota to central church funds is payable to the Central Board of Finance. However, I understand that no diocese has been unable to pay its quota in the last 10 years.

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the right hon. Member for Selby, representing the Church Commissioners, if he will list the number of parishes which were unable to meet their quota for each of the last 10 years; and if he will present these totals as a percentage of all parishes.

Mr. Alison: This is not a matter for the Commissioners; parish quotas are payable to dioceses and details are not held centrally.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Magistrates

Mr. Rooker: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if he will make a statement outlining the reasons for his policy of not appointing the spouse of a serving police officer to the magistrates bench; and what other categories of spouse are covered by this policy.

Mr. John M. Taylor: In considering the suitability of candidates for appointment to the lay magistracy the Lord Chancellor must have due regard to maintaining the perceived independence of the magistracy. Accordingly, his policy is not to appoint the spouse of a police officer. The Lord Chancellor's Directions for Advisory Committees on Justices of the Peace, a copy of which is in the Library of the House (paragraph 4.21), sets out the other categories of spouse covered by a similar policy.

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what is the anticipated cost of retraining magistrates in the light of the proposed changes to the Criminal Justice Act 1991.

Mr. John M. Taylor: Statutory responsibility for providing training and retraining magistrates lies with the 105 magistrates courts committees in England and Wales. At this stage it is not possible to say what retraining will be required in the light of the proposed changes in the Criminal Justice Act 1991 or to estimate its cost.

Public Records

Mr. Gerrard: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what safeguards are in place to protect the confidentiality of public records should their administration be contracted out to private sector companies under existing market-testing proposals.

Mr. John M. Taylor: The existing market testing programme within the Public Record Office does not extend to the function of the administration of public records.

Market Testing

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what is the cost to date and the expected future cost of his Department's market-testing programme; how many staff are engaged full time in work relating to market testing; which firms of consultants have been used in connection with the market-testing programme; and how they were selected.

Mr. John M. Taylor: There are 12 staff assigned to the market-testing programme in the Lord Chancellor's Department. The programme has cost £505,000 since November 1991. These figures include those engaged on the review of enforcement agents and their cost, as well as the costs of those consultants engaged to assist with managing the programme.

The estimated future cost of this year's market-testing programme to September 1993 is £297,000.

The firms of consultants used by the Lord Chancellor's Department since November 1991 to assist with managing the programme, and to assist in-house teams to prepare bids are:

PE International
AMTEC Consulting
DM Management Consultants Ltd.
Kyte and Co.
Coopers and Lybrand
Price Waterhouse
MBA Consultants
CCTA

All firms were selected by competitive tender with the exception of CCTA which was appointed by single tender.

Crown Courts

Mr. Michael: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how many recorded instances of violence have occurred in Crown courts in each of the last 10 years.

Mr. John M. Taylor: The number of recorded instances of assaults on Crown court staff in each of the past 10 years is as follows:

	Number
1983	0
1985	0
1986	0
1988	0
1989	3
1990	0
1991	0
1992	0
1993	[1]

[1] To date.

The only recently recorded instances of violence in a Crown court not involving court staff was one resulting in a fatality at Swindon combined court and a minor incident of assault at Chester Crown court. Both incidents happened in 1992.

Mr. Michael: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what is the average cost of building a new Crown court room.

Mr. John M. Taylor: The average cost per courtroom of Crown court building schemes completed within the last 12 months is approximately £2·5 million. It is not possible to assess the cost of building a new courtroom in isolation from the supporting facilities provided in the remainder of the building.

Boundary Commission for Wales

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department when he will appoint the deputy chairman of the Boundary Commission for Wales.

Mr. John M. Taylor: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the answer that I gave to the hon. Member for Neath (Mr. Hain) on 20 April, Official Report, column 45.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Water Privatisation

Mr. William O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what was the cost of the consultancy exercise involving the privatisation of water services in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Atkins: The consultancy study was commissioned under conditions of commercial confidentiality and it would therefore be inappropriate to disclose the information requested.

Water and Sewerage Services

Mr. William O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what plans he has to change the system for charging for water services in Northern Ireland; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Atkins: The Government have already announced that they intend to introduce new charging arrangements and customer billing systems for water and sewerage services in Northern Ireland, thereby achieving a more direct commercial relationship between the Water Executive and those to whom it provides services. Work is going on at present to identify appropriate arrangements.

Mr. William O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what initiatives he intends to introduce to encourage private finance into water and sewerage services in Northern Ireland; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Atkins: As the Minister of State for Northern Ireland said in his statement to the House on 20 April, Official Report, column 296, we are looking currently at the scope to introduce private finance into the provision of water and sewerage services. At this stage it is too early to say how this involvement will be secured.

Market Testing

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the cost to date and the expected future cost of his Department's market-testing programme; how many staff are engaged full time in work relating to market testing; which firms of consultants have been used in connection with the market-testing programme; and how they were selected.

Mr. Mates: Under present arrangements, information on the cost of the market testing programme cannot be accurately determined across the seven Departments covered by the Northern Ireland programme, and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

There are four members of staff engaged full time in work relating to market testing; otherwise, staff in Northern Ireland Departments and the Northern Ireland Office contribute to the market-testing process as part of wider responsibilities.

The following firms of consultants, which were selected using competitive tendering principles, have been used in connection with the Northern Ireland market-testing programme:

BET FM Ltd.
CAPITA
Coopers and Lybrand Deloitte
Helm Corporation
Leopold Joseph and Sons
Logicom
Michael Willacy Associates
MVM Consultants plc
SERCO
Symonds Facilities Management plc
Touche Ross
Witt Thornton (Management Services)

Terrorism

Mr. Maginnis: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what protest has been made to the authorities in the Irish Republic about the terrorist attack on Caledon RUC station involving the use of the Knockaginny footbridge; if he discussed this incident during the recent meeting of the Anglo-Irish Conference; and what communications he has received from the Government of the Irish Republic.

Mr. Mates: It would not be appropriate to comment on specific terrorist incidents under investigation. However, cross-border security co-operation is a continuous concern of both the British and Irish Governments. At the most recent intergovernmental conference on 25 May, British and Irish Ministers restated their complete support for the efforts which the security forces north and south of the border are making to erode and defeat terrorism. Both Governments are determined to continue, and to enhance, their close co-operation on security matters with the aim of preventing attacks and bringing perpetrators to justice.

Education

Mr. Maginnis: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will take immediate steps to amend articles 5.6a and 156 (46.2b) of the Education Reform (NI) Order 1989 in such a way as to create the social and educational flexibility which will ensure that siblings born within the same year are not required to be treated as twins.

Mr. Ancram: The arrangements for commencement of compulsory education are designed so that children can learn and be taught with their peers, with the articles in question setting the boundaries for each class. In any class there will commonly be a wide span of individual birth dates within the 12-month range. This operates satisfactorily and there are no educational grounds for a distinction to be made, in this respect, between children within one family.

Housing

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland at which locations the Rural Housing Association has schemes under construction; and at which locations the Rural Housing Association proposes new schemes for the remainder of the year 1993, 1994 and 1995.

Mr. Atkins: The Rural Housing Association was registered in March 1992 and does not yet have any schemes under construction. It has, however, purchased nine houses under the special house purchase initiative announced in last year's autumn statement.

The association has the following new-build schemes in its development programme:

	dwellings
1993-94
Ardstraw (Strabane district council)	6
Glenhull (Omagh district council)	6
1994-95
Feystown (Larne district council)	5
Ballinderry (Cookstown district council)	6
Teemore (Fermanagh district council)	6
1995-96
Derrynoose (Armagh district council)	6
Cranagh (Strabane district council)	6

Health and Social Service Employees

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many (a) district nurses, (b) community midwives, (c) health visitors, (d) community psychiatric nurses and (e) practice nurses are or were employed by health and social service boards in each of the last five years for which figures are available.

Mr. Ancram: Information on district nurses, community midwives, health visitors and community psychiatric nurses is available on a comparative basis only for the last three years and this is set out in the table. Information on practice nurses is not collected centrally.

Private Nursing Homes

Mr. Maginnis: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what was the total number of private nursing home places available in County Fermanagh at 31 March.

Mr. Ancram: Four hundred and ninety.

Mr. Maginnis: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many of the residents in private nursing homes in County Fermanagh at 31 March had been, within three months or less of their admission, residents of the Irish Republic.

Mr. Ancram: The Western health and social services board estimates that at 31 March 1993 72 former residents of the Republic of Ireland were living in private nursing homes in County Fermanagh.

Mr. Maginnis: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what are the health care obligations of the Western health and social services board and the Department of Health and Social Services in respect of those admitted from the Irish Republic to private nursing homes in County Fermanagh on or before 31 March.

Mr. Ancram: The Department of Health and Social Services and the health and social services boards are responsible for the health care needs of all people who are ordinarily resident in Northern Ireland, regardless of their origin or date of arrival in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Maginnis: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what reciprocal provisions were available at 31 March in the Irish Republic, under EC regulations, of private nursing home accommodation and related health care for those previously resident in Northern Ireland or Great Britain.

Mr. Ancram: European Community regulations allow for health care to be provided to persons moving between member states. The type of treatment and, where appropriate, accommodation to be provided were, at 31 March, and still are, matters for the authorities in the state of residence. Under EC regulations there is an annual reconciliation of costs between the Governments of the United Kingdom and the Republic of Ireland and this takes account of the cost of health care provided to state pensioners of one country who reside in the other.

Mr. Maginnis: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many residents from the Irish Republic in private nursing homes in County Fermanagh at 31 March were discharged to these homes directly from Cavan general hospital or other hospitals in the Irish Republic.

Mr. Ancram: The information requested is not collected centrally. The Western health and social services board estimates that at 31 March 1993 21 patients had been admitted directly to private nursing homes from Cavan general hospital.

Mr. Maginnis: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) what is the total cost to the Western health and social services board and the Department of Health and Social Services of maintaining those admitted from the Irish Republic who were resident in private nursing homes at 31 March;

(2) what has been the cost of general practitioner care involved in providing health care for those admitted from the Irish Republic who were resident in private nursing homes in County Fermanagh on 31 March.

Mr. Ancram: The information requested is not available.

Mr. Maginnis: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what has been the extent of hospitalisation required by those admitted from the Irish Republic who were resident in private nursing homes in County Fermanagh at 31 March; and what has been the cost to the Western health and social services board or the Department of Health and Social Services.

Mr. Ancram: The Western health and social services board estimates that for the period 1 April 1992 to 31 March 1993 it cost £32,125 to treat in hospital patients from private nursing homes in County Fermanagh who had previously been resident in the Republic of Ireland.

Mr. Maginnis: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what special hospital equipment has had to be acquired or leased by hospitals in the Western board area in order to treat patients discharged from Cavan general hospital direct to private nursing homes in County Fermanagh; and what has been the cost.

Mr. Ancram: The Western health and social services board purchased a specialist bed at a cost of £752 for a person who had been admitted to hospital from a private nursing home in County Fermanagh. The person had previously lived in the Republic of Ireland.

Mr. Maginnis: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what extra financial and other resources have been made available to the Western health and social services board for acute hospital, community and family practitioner services, in order to cater for elderly people from the Irish Republic admitted to private nursing homes in County Fermanagh before 1 April; and what future provision will be made.

Mr. Ancram: No additional resources have been allocated to the Western board specifically for the provision of services to such people. Within the total resources—including additional resources for community care—made available to the board for its resident population, it is for the board to determine how best to provide acute hospital and community services for the elderly people concerned. In so far as the provision of family health services is concerned this is demand led and funded accordingly. Future funding for the board will be determined in the context of the many competing demands on the health and personal social services resources at that time.

Mr. Maginnis: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether European Community legislation obliges a unit of management, after 1 April 1993, to provide for and manage the health care needs of those admitted from the Irish Republic to private nursing homes in County Fermanagh, on or before 31 March 1993.

Mr. Ancram: Health and social services boards are obliged under the Health and Personal Social Services (Northern Ireland) Order 1972 to provide health care to persons who are ordinarily resident in their areas, regardless of their origin or date of arrival in Northern Ireland. EC legislation does not affect this obligation.

Elderly Population

Mr. Maginnis: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the number of persons over 65 years normally resident in Northern Ireland who live within the Omagh/Fermanagh unit of management catchment area; what percentage of Northern Ireland's over 65 years of age population this represents; and what percentage it is of the population within the Omagh/Fermanagh unit of management.

Mr. Ancram: The latest available information, taken from the provisional 1991 mid-year estimates of population, is as follows:

Over-65s within the Unit	Percentage of Northern Ireland over 65s	Percentage of total population within the unit
11,967	6·4	11·9

DUCHY OF LANCASTER

Charters

37. Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster how many civil servants and others are estimated to be involved with the production and implementation of charters; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Davis: The charter approach is integral to the delivery of public services, so many civil and other public servants are involved with the charter programme as part of their normal duties. The citizens charter unit in the Cabinet Office has 32 staff.

Performance Standards

38. Mr. David Shaw: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what effect his work on setting and monitoring performance standards in Government are having on the people of Dover and Deal.

Mr. Waldegrave: As a result of the citizens charter, the people of Dover and Deal—like people everywhere—now have published standards for their public services and better information about how these are performing.

Open Government

39. Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will make a statement on progress made in preparation of his White Paper on open government.

Mr. Waldegrave: I hope to be able to publish the White Paper before the summer recess.

Public Services (Complaints)

40. Mr. Mark Robinson: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what plans his Department has to improve complaints procedures in the public services as part of the citizens charter.

Mr. Davis: We will shortly be announcing a citizens charter complaints task force with the aim of ensuring that all public services adopt the key principles of good complaints systems. People need to know how to complain and they must have confidence that their complaint will be dealt with quickly and fairly.

Dr. Wright: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what plans he has to place a statutory obligation on public services to operate a formal complaints procedure for service users.

Mr. Waldegrave: I have no plans to place statutory obligations on public services in respect of complaints procedures. It is for individual organisations to ensure that their complaints systems conform to citizens charter principles. I refer the hon. Member to my reply of 17 March, when I indicated that we were going to establish a citizens charter complaints task force to encourage and support organisations in this aim. We will be making an announcement about this very shortly.

Dr. Wright: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster how many of the complaints mechanisms for public service users contained in the citizens charter programme have an independent element; and if he will list them.

Mr. Waldegrave: One of the principles of the citizens charter is that public service organisations should have well publicised and easy to use complaints procedures with independent review wherever possible. Many public service organisations have an independent element in their own complaints procedures or are in the process of introducing one. By "independent" in this context, I mean a review procedure which is not part of the management hierarchy of the organisation concerned. Those which are known to my Department are:

Benefits Agency War Pensions Unit: War Pensions Committees;
British Gas: Gas Consumers' Council and OFGAS;
British Rail: Area Transport Users' Consultative Committee (co-ordinated through the Central Transport Consultative Committee);
British Telecom: OFTEL with recourse to a service provided by the Chartered Institute of Arbitrators;
British Waterways Board: plans have been announced for the appointment of an independent ombudsman;
14 Electricity Companies: Electricity Consumers Committees and OFFER;
HM Prison Service: Prisons Ombudsman;
Home Office Immigration and Nationality Department: Complaints Audit Committee;
Housing Corporation: plans have been announced for the appointment of an independent ombudsman to deal with complaints from tenants of housing associations;
Inland Revenue: Revenue Adjudicator;
Intervention Board for Agricultural Produce: Agency Complaints Adjudicator;
London Buses and London Underground: London Regional Passengers Committee;
Department of National Savings: Adjudicator for National Savings;
Police Service: Police Complaints Authority (England and Wales); Procurator Fiscal Service (Scotland);
Post Office: Post Office Users' National Council with recourse to a service provided by the Chartered Institute of Arbitrators;
Probation Service: Area Probation Committees;
Thirty-two Water Companies: Regional Customer Service Committees and OFWAT;

These mechanisms are principally concerned with complaints about quality of service or misconduct and do not investigate disputes about decisions relating to entitlement, for which there are separate, and in some cases independent, procedures of appeal, for example, tribunals.

I also understand that many local authorities have set up internal "independent" complaints units.

None of these arrangements affects the rights of individuals to pursue their complaints through the Parliamentary Commissioner for Administration, the Health Service Commissioners or the Commissioners for Local Administration.

Relocation and Amalgamations

Mr. Robert Banks: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will list the sections and organisations within his Department for which there are plans for relocation or amalgamation.

Mr. Waldegrave: It is planned to move a limited number of staff from the Horse Guards road building in central London to enable refurbishment work to proceed. It is also planned to relocate most of the London office of CCTA, the Government Centre for Information Systems, to Norwich by 1994.

NATIONAL HERITAGE

National Lottery

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what representations he has received on the issue of social responsibility and the proposed national lottery with specific regard to (a) young people and (b) low-income groups; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Sproat: The Department has received a number of letters which reflect the views of the Jubilee centre, calling for controls on advertising to ensure that the lottery will not target young people or those on low incomes. The Government are confident that the operators who will bid to run the lottery will take a responsible approach to marketing and advertising which will be reflected in their response to the invitation to tender. This is one of the factors of which the director general of the national lottery will take account in assessing bids.

Relocation and Amalgamation

Mr. Robert Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage if he will list the sections and organisations within his Department for which there are plans for relocation or amalgamation.

Mr. Sproat: Most of my Department has recently moved to a new headquarters building in central London. The rest of the Department will move to a building nearby later this year.

The Royal Parks Agency has also recently moved to new headquarters at Hyde Park.

There are no other significant plans for relocation.

Market Testing

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what is the cost to date and the expected future cost of his Department's market-testing programme; how many staff are engaged full time in work relating to market testing; which firms of consultants have been used in connection with the market-testing programme; and how they were selected.

Mr. Sproat: My Department has spent £173,682 to date on its own market-testing programme. Future costs are likely to be considerably less. The Royal Parks Agency and the Historic Royal Palaces Agency have spent £147,833 and £9,000 respectively since becoming the responsibility of my Department in April 1992. The Royal Parks and HRPA expect future costs of £20,000 and £10,000 respectively.

No staff are engaged full-time in work relating to market testing in the Department or its agencies.

The Department employed PE International as its consultant. The Royal Parks Agency employed Cluttons and Watts and Partners and the HRPA employed Land Use Consultants. All were selected by competitive tender.

Museums and Galleries Commission

Mr. Nigel Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what measures he is taking to promote and support the work of the Museums and Galleries Commission.

Mr. Sproat: The Department of National Heritage provides regular funding to the Museums and Galleries Commission, £8·9 million in the financial year 1993-94. This helps to support the work of the commission in continuing to promote excellence in the museum community.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Relocation and Amalgamations

Mr. Robert Banks: To ask the Attorney-General if he will list the sections and organisations within his Departments for which there are plans for relocation or amalgamation.

The Attorney-General: The Crown prosecution service has plans to relocate some of its headquarters functions from London to York. It is also currently amalgamating its former 31 areas covering England and Wales to form 13 enlarged areas. There are no plans for relocation or amalgamation in the Legal Secretariat to the Law Officers, the Treasury Solicitor's Department or the Serious Fraud Office.

Foreign Travel

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Attorney-General what is the annual cost of Law Officers' foreign travel.

The Attorney-General: The cost of Law Officers' foreign travel during the financial year 1992-93 was £7,353.

PRIME MINISTER

French Security Services

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Prime Minister what representations he has made to his French counterpart in relation to activities by the French security services in relation to British companies.

The Prime Minister: It is not Government policy to comment on security and intelligence matters.

UN Conference on Women

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Prime Minister (1) what consultation process has been set up to enable women to make an input to the formal United Kingdom report to be presented at the UN conference on women in 1995; and what sums have been budgeted to encourage full consultation and to inform people of the United Kingdom's participation;

(2) if he will make a statement on the implementation in the United Kingdom of the UN convention on the elimination of discrimination against women;

(3) who is responsible for compiling the formal United Kingdom report to be presented at the UN conference on women in Beijing in 1995; and who will represent the United Kingdom Government at the conference.

The Prime Minister: The Government will be responsible for compiling the United Kingdom report to the UN world conference on women in 1995. The draft report will be considered by the ministerial sub-committee on women's issues. Details of the consultation process are being finalised. The views of the Women's National Commission will be taken into account at an early stage and other organisations will be invited to contribute. The costs of the consultation and information will be absorbed in normal Government expenditure. United Kingdom representation for the 1995 conference has yet to be decided.

The United Kingdom ratified the convention on the elimination of all forms of discrimination against women (CEDAW) in 1986 and reports to the UN on its implementation every four years. The second report, made in 1991, was updated in presentation to CEDAW in January 1993. It explained that since ratification we have continued to make much progress in the fields of the articles of the convention. Recent developments contributing to equality include the introduction of the national curriculum, the investment of some £45 million to support child care for school age children, the introduction of targets for action to address health issues that particularly affect women, and action aimed at increasing women's representation at all levels in public and private employment and the decision-making processes.

The United Kingdom has now been able to withdraw two reservations, those relating to the married man's tax allowance and the employment of women in underground work in mines.

Human Rights (India)

Ms Walley: To ask the Prime Minister if he will raise the subject of human rights violations with the Vice-President of India during his visit to London; and if he will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: I raised the subject of human rights in India with the Vice-President of India during my meeting with him on 24 May.

UN Conference on Environment and Development

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Prime Minister what actions have been taken by Her Majesty's Government in fulfilment of commitments made by the United Kingdom at the United Nations conference on environment and development in June 1992; and if he will place in the Library a report of work undertaken towards meeting those commitments.

The Prime Minister: The Government are taking a leading role in the follow-up to the conference in Rio de Janeiro in June 1992. We have prepared a progress report which we shall be putting to the new United Nations Commission on Sustainable Development before its first meeting later this month. A copy has been placed in the Library.

Scott Inquiry

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Prime Minister if he will make it his policy to arrange for full copies of any statement made by Government Ministers to the Scott inquiry to be placed in the Library.

The Prime Minister: No. The general rule is that the statements are matters between the individual Minister concerned and Lord Justice Scott.

Northern Ireland

Mr. Barnes: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list the names, in date order, of all those who have died in the United Kingdom and Europe as a result of the troubles in Northern Ireland since 5 October 1968, giving the location in each case.

The Prime Minister: A comprehensive list of people who have been killed as a result of the security situation in Northern Ireland, as well as those who have died in related incidents in Great Britain, the Republic of Ireland and, since 1978, in mainland Europe, is currently being compiled and will be placed in the Library in due course. The list will include the cause and location of each death.

Nuclear Industry

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Prime Minister what plans he has to introduce a citizens charter for the nuclear industry.

The Prime Minister: The nuclear industry sells its products and services to other industries, not directly to the public. There are no plans to introduce charters for industries of this kind.

Arms Exports

Mr. Spellar: To ask the Prime Minister if he will now make it the policy of the Government to give substantive answers to parliamentary questions relating to the actions of Ministers and officials between 1984 and 1992 in relation to the export of arms to Iraq.

The Prime Minister: No. These issues are being investigated by Lord Justice Scott, and it would be wrong for the Government to comment on them before publication of his final report.

Lord Justice Scott is free to call for any papers and to call any Minister or civil servant to give evidence to his inquiry. It is the Government's policy that all Ministers and officials called to give evidence should co-operate fully. The Government are, therefore, making all the relevant facts available to the inquiry, and it is right that we should wait for Lord Justice Scott to present his conclusions before commenting publicly.

Nuclear Proliferation

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Prime Minister what matters in regard to nuclear proliferation were discussed during his recent visit to Paris.

The Prime Minister: Nuclear proliferation was not discussed.

European Court of Human Rights

Mr. Allen: To ask the Prime Minister, pursuant to his answer of 24 May, Official Report, column 372, if Her Majesty's Government intend to support proposals for a single-tier European Court of Human Rights at the Council of European Heads of State summit in October; and if he will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: The Ministers' Deputies Meeting on 28 May agreed by consensus the mandate for a draft protocol amending the control machinery of the European convention on human rights (UCHR). The Council of Europe steering committee for human rights will now draft the amending protocol. The United Kingdom will participate fully in the drafting process. Our position at the heads of state summit in October must depend on progress made by the steering committee.

Regional Development Assistance

Mr. Wareing: To ask the Prime Minister who will be the United Kingdom's lead Minister in the discussions on objective 1 status within the European Community.

The Prime Minister [holding answer 27 May 1993]: My right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade.

TRANSPORT

Driving Tests

Mr. Wareing: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many applications for driving tests have been made to his Department's test centre at Norris Green, Liverpool; how many applicants have subsequently passed the test; and what percentage the passes represent of those tested, in each month since May 1991.

Mr. Key: Information on the applications for tests at individual test centres is not available. The numbers of tests conducted and passed are as follows:

Year and month	Number of tests conducted	Number passed	Percentage passed
1991

Note: The data for each month refer to the four or five full weeks of which the Saturday fall in the month stated.

Bypasses

Mr. Dunn: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many bypass roads have been constructed since 1979; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Key: One hundred and sixty-two bypasses have been constructed on the national road network since 1979. Most of the 250 other road schemes constructed since 1979 have also removed traffic from local communities.

Agencies

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on the outcome of the consideration exercises and panel reviews on each of the agencies within his Department, and their framework documents; and when he will make an announcement on his intentions for the future of each agency.

Mr. MacGregor: I refer the hon. Member to the answer that I gave my hon. Friend the Member for Dartford (Mr. Dunn) on 27 May 1993, Official Report, columns 685-86.

Heavy Goods Vehicles

Mr Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what research his Department has commissioned into the impact of increases in the maximum tonnage for heavy goods vehicles; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Key: The road wear implications of heavier gross vehicle weights have been known for some time and were reported on in 1980 by the then Transport and Road Research Laboratory. The Department recently commissioned further research from the laboratory to examine the likely impact of the changes in weight limits due to take place in 1999 under EC regulations. The first report from this study was published on 4 June 1993.

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what has been the number of roadside checks on heavy goods vehicles in the Greater London area in the period January to April.

Mr. Norris: In the period 1 January to 31 March 1993—the latest financial year quarter for which figures are available—the Vehicle Inspectorate conducted checks on 5,079 heavy goods vehicles in Greater London. Of these, 1,237 were conducted for the purpose of enforcing roadworthiness, while 3,842 were for the purpose of traffic enforcement—which included operators' licence checks, driving licence checks, drivers' hours checks and vehicle weight checks.

Market Testing

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is the cost to date and the expected future cost of his Department's market-testing programme; how many staff are engaged full-time in work relating to market testing; which firms of consultants have been used in connection with the market-testing programme; and how they were selected.

Mr. Norris: The current approximate costs to date are some £540,000, including consultancies, since November 1991. The future costs will depend on the size and scope of the forward programme which is not yet finalised. The equivalent of eight full-time staff are assigned to the market-testing programme. The consultants used by the Department since November 1991 are:

(a) Coopers and Lybrand Management Consultants.
(b) Ernst and Young Management Consultants.
(c) KPMG Management Consultants.

(d) Capita Management Consultants.
(e) Mindworks/Management Consultants.
(f) Shreeveport Consultants.

The Department's policy is to select consultants on the basis of competitive bids.

Red Routes

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is the expenditure on red route-related works to side roads leading to such; what formula is applied for this; and how much will be spent on each red route in 1993-94.

Mr. Norris: The latest estimate of expenditure on approved works on roads adjacent to the pilot red route is £2,784,000. The implementation of the remainder of the priority (red) route network is expected to start in the summer of 1994. Measures in side roads will be eligible for funding by the Traffic Director for London where he is satisfied they offer value for money and comply with the requirements of his network plan.

Rail Freight

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what was the approximate tonne-mileage of freight traffic carried by British Railways in respect of (a) minerals, (b) liquids, (c) containers and (d) other general freight in each year since 1988; and what is the estimate for 1993.

Mr. Freeman: Statistics are not collected in precisely this form. Data for the transport by rail in 1991 of minerals, petroleum products and chemicals, expressed in terms of billion tonne kilometres, can be found in table 1.10 of Transport Statistics Great Britain 1992. A copy has been placed in the Library. Table 1.9*(a)* contains figures for the years 1981-91 for petroleum products; earlier figures for minerals and chemicals may be found in earlier editions. Figures for the transport of containers are not available.

These are the latest available statistics.

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport, pursuant to his oral statement of 24 May, Official Report, column 712, concerning the extent to which certain contracts for rail freight were covering operating costs, if he will outline the basis of the calculations he has made in relation to the scheme of paying up to 100 per cent. of the track, or overhead costs, of future freight on rail.

Mr. Freeman: The administrative guidelines for the new track charges grant scheme are being considered.

Details will be published in time for the introduction of the scheme, which is subject to the enactment of the Railways Bill.

Carbon Dioxide Emissions

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what contribution he expects his Department to make to the achievement of Britain's commitment to reduce carbon dioxide emission levels to the 1990 level in the year 2000; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. MacGregor: I refer the hon. Member to the answer that I gave to the hon. Members for Wakefield (Mr. Hinchliffe) and for Ellesmere Port and Neston (Mr. Miller) on 24 May 1993 at column 417.

Towing Services

Mr. Loyden: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many non-United Kingdom-owned companies or subsidiaries of non-United Kingdom-owned companies are providing towing services in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Norris: One of the two major towing operators currently serving United Kingdom ports is a United Kingdom based subsidiary of a non-United Kingdom owned company. There are a number of smaller United Kingdom-owned operators.

Trunk Roads

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what proportion of traffic on the inter-urban trunk road network is long-distance through traffic.

Mr. Key: This information is not available.

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what implications the recent report "Reducing Transport Emissions through Planning", and the draft planning policy guidance note 13, have for the size and character of his trunk roads programme.

Mr. Key: The trunk road programme will be developed in the light of latest information about forecast traffic, which will take into account existing and future settlement patterns.

Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how the planning of trunk roads currently takes into account the potential impact of road schemes on settlement and development patterns (a) prior to roads programme entry, (b) prior to the preferred route consultation and (c) as part of the environmental assessment.

Mr. Key: The implications of trunk road schemes for land use planning are taken into account during the development of regional planning guidance, in the appraisal frameworks which are made available at public consultation on the road scheme and also as part of a scheme's environmental statement.

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what criteria he has published to define long-distance through traffic as regards the planning of trunk roads in respect of the draft planning policy guidance note 13.

Mr. Key: None.

Trans-Pennine Crossing

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what criteria he used to rule out the proposal contained in the "Trans-Pennine Study: Strategy" report for a dual carriageway across the Pennines in the A628 corridor.

Mr Key: The proposal for a dual carriageway in the A628 corridor across the Peak District national park was ruled out because of the Government's commitment to a policy of no major new development in national parks, save in exceptional circumstances.

M62

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what studies he has commissioned into widening the M62 beyond eight lanes; and what are their terms of reference.

Mr. Key: Consultants were commissioned in 1991 to investigate and report on the need for widening the section between junctions 18 and 24 and the options for achieving this. The work is still in progress and no conclusions have been reached about the extent of the widening or other aspects. The next step will be to consult the public about any proposals emerging from the work.

Relocation and Amalgamations

Mr. Robert Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the sections and organisations within his Department for which there are plans for relocation or amalgamation.

Mr. Norris: The headquarters of the Surveyor General's Organisation and of the Marine Emergencies Organisation was relocated in Southampton in May. The Department's central services will be relocating to Hastings this June. A study into the possible relocation of the highways safety and traffic command (HST) was carried out last summer, but staff in HST HQ will remain in London for the time being, pending decisions on agency status. There are no other major plans for relocation, but the organisation of the Department is constantly being adjusted to reflect changing needs.

Road Safety Audits

Mr. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how the public may obtain road safety audits prepared in accordance with departmental advice note HA 42/90 and departmental standard HD 19/90.

Mr. Key: Road safety audit reports for a particular trunk road scheme may be inspected at any public inquiry which may be held into that scheme or at other times by arrangement with the Department's local office responsible for managing the project. Copies of the reports may be obtained for retention through the same channels at the cost of copying.

Select Committee Recommendations

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many Select Committee recommendations have been made about, and how many accepted by, his Department since April 1989.

Mr. MacGregor: In the 10 reports published by the Transport Select Committee since April 1989 to which the Government have responded, 270 recommendations were made. Of these, 214 have been accepted, in whole or in part, by the Government or have been noted where no further action was sought.

Departmental Buildings

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the buildings currently owned or rented by his Department, together with (a) the estimated value, (b) the annual rent and (c) the annual maintenance cost of each building in the current financial year.

Mr. Norris: The Department's staff occupy 1,353 properties throughout the United Kingdom with an annual rent of £29 million and annual maintenance cost of £9·3 million. The estimated value of the properties is not known.

The Department also holds properties in connection with the roads programme. This stock constantly changes, depending with the progress of individual road schemes. The current holding is some 3,500 properties. An estimate of the current value is not available. The most recent available figures for 1991-92, on a portfolio of some 2,900 properties, include a rent income of some £3·95 million, net of management fees and repair and maintenance costs, and a maintenance expenditure of some £1·9 million.

Details of each building could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

British Rail Pensioners

Mr. Milligan: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport whether BR pensioners will continue to get no less favourable treatment than at present when the joint open fund for pensioners and BR employees becomes a closed fund.

Mr. Freeman: I refer my hon. Friend to the response my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport gave to him during Report stage of the Railways Bill on 24 May at column 628. The objective will be to set up the fund so that pensioners continue to have an opportunity of real increases in their pensions. Subparagraph 3(3)(c) of schedule 10 would prevent the Secretary of State from making any amendment to an existing British Rail pension scheme that would to any extent deprive a member of that scheme of pension rights which had accrued to him under the scheme before the coming into force of the amendment.

Environmental Appraisal Manual

Mr. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when the revised "Manual of Environmental Appraisal" will be published.

Mr. MacGregor: We are hoping to publish the manual in July.

Bridge and Tunnel Orders

Mr. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects to publish the circular on bridge and tunnel orders under section 48 of the Transport and Works Act 1992.

Mr. Freeman: Late in July.

Diesel Engine Emissions

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has to reinstate the diesel engine emission tests; and what financial arrangements have been made with MOT testing stations.

Mr. Key: Metered checks of diesel smoke in the MOT test will be reinstated as soon as possible. Our proposals will be the subject of consultation with vehicle and equipment manufacturers, the garage trade, motoring organisations and other interested bodies. No financial arrangements have been made with MOT testing stations.

EDUCATION

Grant-maintained Schools

Mr. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education how the Government calculate the funding for each grant-maintained school; and how they assess within that funding the element for additional educational needs.

Mr. Robin Squire: Grant-maintained schools receive the bulk of their recurrent funding in annual maintenance grant. The majority element is calculated by reference to the local management scheme of the former maintaining local education authority, including any allocations based on additional educational needs. Annual maintenance grant also includes elements for central services and meals.

Grant-maintained schools are also eligible to receive transitional, special purpose and capital grants direct from the Department. None of these includes a specific additional educational needs element.

Testing

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what is his estimate of the total costs incurred to date in regard to the national testing of English in schools in England.

Mr. Robin Squire: The total estimated cost for developing, producing and distributing the national curriculum tests in England for seven and 14-year-olds is roughly £6 million since 1989.

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what representations he has received about inaccuracies in his recent letter to chief education officers in regard to national testing.

Mr. Robin Squire: About 20 authorities requested clarification of the details about national curriculum testing which were asked for in a letter sent to all authorities on 7 May.

English

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for Education if he will make it his policy to use plain language in the instructions given to English teachers in regard to the key stage 3 assessment.

Mr. Robin Squire: My right hon. Friend would as a matter of course expect all instructions issued by his Department or representatives to be in plain language. He has not received any representations on the clarity of the instructions given to English teachers on the assessments for 14-year-olds.

School Admissions

Mr. Byers: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what plans he has to amend circular 11/88 on school admissions.

Mr. Robin Squire: My right hon. Friend invited comments last December on the draft on a new circular on school admissions. He is considering the responses to that consultation.

Primary Reception Classes

Miss Lestor: To ask the Secretary of State for Education how many local education authorities admit primary children into reception classes (a) once a year only, (b) twice a year and (c) three times a year; and what is the average age for admission.

Mr. Robin Squire: This information is not collected centrally.

Market Testing

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what is the cost to date and the expected future cost of his Department's market-testing programme; how many staff are engaged full-time in work relating to market testing; which firms of consultants have been used in connection with the market-testing programme; and how they were selected.

Mr. Boswell: The cost of the programme, in direct staff costs and consultancy costs, has been some £328,000 since November 1991. It is not possible to estimate the future cost as this is dependent upon the nature of the components eventually chosen for the programme. Only one member of staff is currently engaged full-time on work relating to market testing; other staff working on the programme also have other duties. The following consultants, all selected by competitive tender, have been used in connection with the programme: KPMG Management Consulting; Coopers Lybrand, CSL Ltd. and Shreeveport Ltd.

Radioactivity

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what steps he has taken to implement the proposals contained in chapter 6.2 of the European Commission's fifth environmental action programme of 1992 on support material on radioactivity and radiation for teachers in primary and secondary education.

Mr. Robin Squire: To implement the proposals in this action programme, a series of EC meetings was held in 1992 with the aim of developing curriculum materials relevant to radioactivity and radiation protection: a representative of Her Majesty's inspectorate of schools took part in this work. The materials have been produced and have been tested in schools in a number of member states (not the United Kingdom): the final version of the material will be made available towards the end of this year.

Handicapped Children

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what consideration he has given to extending the scope of speech therapy, physiotherapy and occupational therapy to handicapped children in special schools; and what recent representations he has received from carers and parents on the matter.

Mr. Forth: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health has a general duty to provide therapy services to enable local education authorities to carry out their duties under the Education Acts. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and I receive representations from time to time on the provision of therapy services. We consider those representations carefully.

Religious Studies

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Education if he will make a statement on the proposals that the GCSE religious studies syllabuses should enable three religions to be studied in future.

Mr. Robin Squire: The criteria for GCSE subjects are a matter for the School Examinations and Assessment Council. The council has now produced criteria for syllabuses for GCSE in religious studies which allow for the study of a single denomination, a single religion or a maximum of two religions. The Government are content with this limit of two religions in such GCSEs, which will help to avoid the superficial study of religions.

School Examinations and Assessment Council

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Education how often the advisory subject committees of the School Examinations and Assessment Council meet; and what are the dates of the last three occasions when each of them met.

Mr. Robin Squire: The School Examinations and Assessment Council subject committees, which are the responsibility of the council itself, usually meet three times a year. The dates of the last three meetings of each of the committees are shown in the following table.

Subject Committee	Dates of last three meetings

Admissions Criteria

Mrs. Gorman: To ask the Secretary of State for Education if he will list his reasons for the guidance given in his draft admissions circular that early applications should not be used as a criterion for giving priority.

Mr. Robin Squire: The law requires LEAs and schools to operate an annual admissions cycle, and to publish relevant information for parents six weeks before the deadline for expressing preferences for applying for admissions. Many parents will want to take as much time as possible to study the information and consider which schools might be most suitable. To penalise such parents by giving a priority to early applications would be contrary to the Government's policy of encouraging the operation of informed parental choice.

Departmental Buildings

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Education if he will list the buildings currently owned or rented by his Department, together with (a) the estimated value, (b) the annual rent and (c) the annual maintenance cost of each building in the current financial year.

Mr. Boswell: The Department does not own any of the buildings it occupies. I cannot provide details of their value.

	Annual rent £	Maintenance charge £
Three buildings are currently rented in the London area:
Sanctuary buildings, SW1	8,500,000	1,104,000
Lading house, WC1 (part)	168,000	32,000
Canons Park, Middlesex (part)	124,000	146,000
Five buildings are currently rented in Darlington:
Mowden hall	462,000	284,000
Vincent house	37,000	29,000
Enterprise house (part)	9,000	7,000
Corporation house (part)	14,000	23,000
Stead house (part) (rent etc. yet to be apportioned and agreed with the main occupier)

Relocation and Amalgamations

Mr. Robert Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Education if he will list the sections and organisations within his Department for which there are plans for relocation or amalgamation.

Mr. Boswell: The Department's operational work of servicing grant-maintained schools has recently been relocated to Darlington. Subject to the passage of the Education Bill, much of this work will transfer on 1 April 1994 to the Funding Agency for Schools which will have its headquarters in York but also retain a significant presence in Darlington. Also in 1994, the work of the Department's existing architects and buildings branch will be absorbed into one of its schools branches, but will continue to be based in London.

School Inspections

Mr. Hawksley: To ask the Secretary of State for Education if he will list those secondary schools chosen in the first tranche to be examined by Her Majesty's inspectorate.

Mr. Robin Squire: The choice of schools being inspected by Her Majesty's inspectors in the current academic year is a matter for Ofsted. Ofsted has published lists of the secondary schools to be inspected in the autumn 1993 and spring 1994 terms by teams led by a registered inspector, under the new independent inspection arrangements introduced by the Education (Schools) Act 1992.

I have asked Professor Sutherland, the chief inspector, to send details to my hon. Friend.

Teaching Vacancies

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Education if he will list the latest number of teaching vacancies in mathematics, physics, biology, chemistry, English, history, art and social studies.

Mr. Boswell: I refer the hon. Member to the reply that my right hon. Friend gave to the hon. Member for the Isle of Wight (Mr. Field) on 14 May at column 578.

Special Needs Education

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Education if he will list the number of statements maintained by individual local education authorities for each year for which figures are available.

Mr. Forth: The number of children with statements of special educational needs maintained by each local education authority in England in January each year from 1986 to 1992 is given in the table. Information on children with statements was collected for the first time in January 1984. In that year 18,545 children in England had statements and, in the following year, 18,622.

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what measures and resources he will make available to reduce the age at which children with special educational needs are identified.

Mr. Forth: The Education Bill currently before Parliament requires the Secretary of State to issue a code of practice giving practical guidance to schools, local education authorities and others on the exercise of their responsibilities towards all pupils with special educational needs and to which they must have regard. My right hon. Friend the Minister of State said on 29 April in another place that a guiding principle of the code of practice would be that the needs of all children with special educational needs—of school age and pre-school age—should be identified and assessed as early as possible and as quickly as is consistent with thoroughness. It would also promote the principle that the early identification of special educational needs and early action to address those needs can be the most effective means of preventing or alleviating later difficulties. We shall be consulting fully on the draft code which will then be subject to the affirmative resolution procedures of Parliament before it can be issued. The Education Bill also carries forward the powers of LEAs to assess and make statements for children under two and the duties of DHAs and national health service trusts towards children under five who may have special educational needs.

Student Loans

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Education how many students in the United Kingdom have taken up loans for each year since the loans system began.

Mr. Boswell: This is a matter for the Student Loans Company. I have asked the chief executive to write to the hon. Member.

Council Tax

Mr. Henderson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education how the Council Tax (Exempt Dwellings) Order 1992 applies to (a) self-catering accommodation which is owned or managed by an educational institution and (b) halls of residence.

Mr. Boswell: Under the Council Tax (Exempt Dwellings) Order 1992, as amended, dwellings comprising student halls of residence, which can include self-catering accommodation, are exempt from the council tax if they are provided predominantly for the accommodation of students and they are either owned or managed by an educational institution or are the subject of an agreement allowing such an institution to nominate the majority of the persons to occupy the accommodation provided.

College Fees

Sir Thomas Arnold: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what plans he has to change the basis for calculating grants for college fees at Oxford and Cambridge.

Mr. Boswell: My right hon. Friend has no plans to change the basis for determining the level of college fees at Oxford and Cambridge.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Clenbuterol

Mr. Morley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if she will make a statement on clenbuterol usage in beef production.

Mr. Soames: Clenbuterol is one of the family of beta-agonist drugs. It is the active ingredient in five veterinary medicines licensed in the United Kingdom for use in treating respiratory ailments in cattle and horses and as an aid to cattle at the time of calving. They are available only on prescription from a veterinary surgeon. When fed to cattle at high dosages, clenbuterol has been found to improve the lean content of the carcase. Clenbuterol has not been licensed in the United Kingdom or any other member state for such a purpose and any such use would therefore be illegal.

Surveillance for residues of clenbuterol in meat is carried out in Great Britain under the national surveillance scheme for live animals and fresh meat on farms and in slaughterhouses. No clenbuterol positives have been identified from samples taken under this scheme in Great Britain since testing for clenbuterol began in August 1989.

Separate arrangements, directed at retail and wholesale premises, cover both imported and domestic supplies of meat and two clenbuterol positive samples were reported in 1992. Neither was likely to have posed any threat to human health, but it was not possible to establish whether the samples originated in Great Britain or elsewhere. Because of the evidence of abuse of clenbuterol outside Great Britain, surveillance is being increased this year.

A number of reports of illegal sale of clenbuterol in Great Britain have been investigated in the past 18 months, but our inquiries have not produced any evidence to support the allegations.

Mr. Morley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if she will outline the steps taken to (a) prevent meat with clenbuterol in it from entering the country and (b) prevent clenbuterol from being used in meat in Britain.

Mr. Soames: All member states are required to submit to the Commission annually details of their national plans for the examination for residues, including clenbuterol, in live animals and fresh meat. Similar arrangements apply in respect of third countries importing meat into the Community.

Ongoing surveillance in Great Britain for clenbuterol in imported meat is carried out under a scheme, co-ordinated by the working party on veterinary residues in animal products, which is directed at retail and wholesale premises, and extends to both imported and domestic supplies. Because of the evidence of abuse of clenbuterol outside Great Britain, surveillance is being increased this year. A new sampling programme for imported meat will also commence shortly under which samples of imported bovine tissues will be collected and analysed for clenbuterol residues.

In Great Britain, under the Animals, Meat and Meat Products (Examination for Residues and Maximum Residue Limits) Regulations 1991, as amended, it is an offence to sell or supply for slaughter for human consumption, an animal which has been administered clenbuterol illegally for growth promotion purposes.

No prosecutions have been taken under this provision. A number of reports of illegal sale of clenbuterol in Great Britain have been investigated in the past 18 months, but our inquiries have not produced any evidence to support the allegations.

Set-aside Payments

Mr. Cox: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how much money was paid to farmers in England and Wales in set-aside payments in each of the last three years.

Mr. Jack: The total amount of set-aside payments to farmers in England and Wales in each of the last three years is given in the table. No payments have yet been made in respect of land set aside under the arable area payments scheme this year.

1990-91	15,533,000
1991-92	20,654,000
1992-93	26,038,000

Note: Payments in 1990-91 and 1991-92 were under the Five Year Scheme. Payments in 1992-93 were under the Five Year and One Year Schemes.

Brazilian Beef

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many tonnes of beef, representing what proportion of United Kingdom beef consumption, are imported from Brazil.

Mr. Jack: The proportion of beef consumed in the United Kingdom in 1992 imported as fresh, chilled or frozen beef from Brazil was 0·68 per cent., representing 6,758 tonnes.

Integrated Administration and Control Scheme

Mr. Bennett: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether the information on land ownership and occupation obtained by his staff from IACS claim forms will be made available to local authority rights of way officers carrying out statutory duties.

Mr. Jack: No. The information obtained from IACS application forms will not be used for purposes other than those for which it was sought unless the applicant gives his consent.

Plastic Food Containers

Mr. Riddick: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what proposals his Department has to introduce regulations requiring food manufacturers to carry out laboratory tests on all plastic food containers.

Mr. Soames: The Department has no such plans. All food contact plastics must comply with regulations which lay down certain compositional and other technical requirements. These controls exist to ensure that food safety is not compromised by the migration of chemicals from packaging into food. Food manufacturers need to ensure that contact materials meet the regulations, but they are not required to undertake laboratory tests on every container.

Bovine Tuberculosis

Mr. Roger Evans: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what recent research he has commissioned on transmissions by badgers of bovine tuberculosis to farm animals; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Soames: The Department is funding a range of studies on bovine TB and badgers which includes work based in the Gloucestershire study area on the mode of disease transmission from badgers to cattle.

Relocation and Amalgamations

Mr. Robert Banks: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the sections and organisations within his Department for which there are plans for relocation or amalgamation.

Mr. Jack: As announced last year, the Department intends to relocate some 600 headquarters posts and its central science laboratory to the York area over the next three years. The former will include work on pesticides safety and plant health, statistical and financial services, and areas of personnel management and other common services.

In January 1993, ADAS announced plans to withdraw from 12 local offices between April and October 1993. At the same time, it announced plans to relocate and amalgamate a number of laboratories as part of an overall rationalisation programme. This programme is now being implemented.

My right hon. Friend the former Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food announced in March this year, Official Report, 31 March, columns 249-50, that it was intended to merge the food science laboratory, Norwich and the Torry research station, Aberdeen with the existing Central Science Laboratory Agency with effect from 1 April 1994. There are no plans to move the laboratories at Norwich and Aberdeen from their present locations.

Bananas

Mr. Page: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what steps she has taken in the discussions on the new proposed banana regime to ensure that the differences in the mechanisms of the United Kingdom banana market is reflected in the allocation of import licence quotas.

Mr. Jack: Negotiations on the detailed arrangements for the new Community banana regime are continuing in Brussels and the United Kingdom is contributing actively to these discussions. The regulations implementing the new arrangements will need to take account of the complexity of the current market arrangements in all member states.

Mr. Page: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what steps are being taken in the negotiations of the new proposed banana regime to ensure increased competition opportunities.

Mr. Jack: The completion of the single market in bananas will expand access to the hitherto restricted markets of some member states and increase competition across the European banana market. Fruit entered into free circulation in one member state may in future be traded freely across the Community. Of the tariff quota of 2·0 million tonnes for imports of third country bananas, 3·5 per cent. will be set aside for newcomers who have begun trading in these bananas since 1992.

Mr. Page: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what consideration is being given to the latest trading histories of companies in 1991-92 in allocating licences for the import of bananas.

Mr. Jack: Council regulation (EEC) 404/93 establishing a common organisation of the Community banana market provides for the allocation of licences to import third-country bananas, within a reduced tariff quota of 2·0 million tonnes, on the basis of a three-year average of past trade. Initially, the reference period is 1989 to 1991, but it will be rolled forward annually in subsequent years. Thus it will in time take account of the trading histories of companies in all the years leading up to the implementation of the new arrangements.

Mr. Page: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many representations her Department has received from independent banana ripening companies on the proposed new EC banana regime.

Mr. Jack: The Government have received a wide range of representations from interested parties at all stages in the marketing of bananas. This has included a significant number of independent banana ripeners.

Mr. Page: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what progress has been made in negotiations on the proposed new EC banana regime to ensure the United Kingdom's historic allocation of quotas is not replicated.

Mr. Jack: Discussion of the detailed arrangements for the new harmonised Community banana regime is continuing in Brussels. The new arrangements will apply in all member states and entitlement to licence within the reduced-tariff quota of 2·0 million tonnes for imports of third country bananas will be subject to criteria to be defined in Commission implementing regulations.

Fishing Restrictions

Mr. Beith: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what she estimates will be the annual cost to public funds of administering days-at-sea restrictions.

Mr. Jack: I refer the hon. Member to the reply which my predecessor gave the hon. Member for South Hams (Mr. Steen) on 24 March, column 636.

Market Testing

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the cost to date and the expected future cost of her Department's market-testing programme; how many staff are engaged full time in work relating to market testing; which firms of consultants have been used in connection with the market-testing programme; and how they were selected.

Mr. Jack: The cost to date of the Department's market testing programme is estimated to be some £1,120,000 including external consultancy support. Plans for the future are still under consideration.

The number of full-time staff in the market testing unit is currently 17. But a further 175 staff in various other parts of the Department have contributed to the programme either in the identification of candidates for market testing or in the actual conduct of tests and the activities associated with them.

The following firms of consultants have been used by the Department as part of its market testing programme since November 1991:

Amtec Consulting;
Capita Management Consultancy;
Coopers and Lybrand;
Ernst and Young;
Gould Consultants;
Hoskyns Group;
Leopold Joseph and Sons Ltd.

In addition, a number of self-employed purchasing specialists have been used by the Department. Consultancy services have been acquired in full accordance with the purchasing principles laid down in chapter 31 of "Government Accounting."

Bovine Spongiform Encephalopathy

Mr. Nigel Evans: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many cases of BSE were confirmed in England for each quarter since 1987.

Mr. Soames: There were 827 cases of BSE confirmed in England before the disease become notifiable on 21 June 1988. Since then the number of confirmed cases in England by date of report to the Ministry for each quarter is as follows:

1988
[1]Quarter 3	899
Quarter 4	1,105

[1] 21 June 1988 to 30 September 1988.
[2] This figure is incomplete as not all suspects reported in this quarter have been slaughtered or confirmed.

EC Potato Regime

Mr. Tyler: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if she will make a statement on a European potato regime.

Mr. Jack: The proposal is set out in COM(92)185 final, published on 17 December 1992. The December Agriculture Council decided to consider it further with the addition of provision for marketing standards, as soon as the European Parliament had given its opinion. That opinion was delivered in April. The amended proposal came before the May Council of Ministers, where it did not prove possible to reach agreement. It was therefore referred back to the special committee for agriculture for further work.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Profit-related Pay

Mr. Spellar: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, further to his answer of 17 May, Official Report, column 13, what studies his Department is making of the cost and effectiveness of profit-related pay schemes.

Mr. Dorrell: Ministers keep the cost and effectiveness of the tax relief for profit-related pay under review, and the current Inland Revenue management plan, published on 14 May, contains proposals for an independent study of the effects of PRP schemes.

Pensions

Mr. David Shaw: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list for each of the main pension schemes and pension arrangements covering public sector employees (a) retirement ages for (i) men and (ii) women, (b) from what date widows' benefits are included, (c) the proportion of salary payable on retirement after full service and (d) the number of years' service which is treated as full service.

Mr. Portillo: The information requested for the main public service pension schemes is as follows:

Scheme	(a) Normal retirement age		(b) Date from which widow's benefits are included	(c) Personal benefits		(d) Maximum pensionable service
	Men	Women		Pension	Lump sum
Principal civil service pension scheme	60	60	1949	$\frac{1}{80}$ of final pensionable pay per year of service	3 times pension	40 years by 60, 45 years by 65
Teachers' pension scheme	60	60	[5]1972	$\frac{1}{80}$ of final pensionable pay per year of service	3 times pension	40 years by 60, 45 years by 65
Local government	[1]60-65	[1]60-65	1953	$\frac{1}{80}$ of final pensionable pay per year of service	3 times pension[2]	40 years by 60, 45 years by 65

[1] From age 60, subject to completion of 25 years of service.
[2] Lump sum reduced for married men in respect of their pre-1972 service as contribution to provide half rate widow's pension.
[3] Female nurses may retire on unreduced benefits from age 55, subject to certain conditions.
[4] Normal retirement age is dependent upon length of service. Police inspectors and above may serve beyond age 55.
[5] From 1966 to 1972 the scheme provided for widow's benefits on a voluntary basis.
[6] Between 1925 and 1948 the widows of firefighters who died or retired as a result of injury sustained on duty received a pension.

Relocation Expenses

Mr. Simon Coombs: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what consultations he has had on the proposed reform of tax relief on relocation expenses.

Mr. Dorrell: I refer my hon. Friend to my reply to the hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, North-East (Mr. Moss) on 26 May 1993 at columns 573-74.

Mr. Simon Coombs: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what guidance his Department has given to other Departments on the arrangements for the taxation of relocation expenses incurred by civil servants.

Mr. Dorrell: The Inland Revenue has explained to Departments the details of the Finance Bill provisions on relocation expenses and how they will work in practice.

Vineyards

Mrs. Lait: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what plans he has to reduce the Customs and Excise regulatory regime of English vineyards to the levels enjoyed by wine makers in other EC countries.

Sir John Cope: The regulatory regime operated by Customs and Excise on English vineyards is commensurate to the amount of revenue at risk.

Customs and Excise are undertaking a programme of rationalisation and simplification in the excise field. The aim is to meet revenue requirements by making full use of traders' own commercial accounting and security arrangements in place of officially designated records and practices. Visiting staff will exercise control primarily by auditing traders' systems to ensure that they provide adequate protection for the Revenue. Physical checks on stocks and operations will be targeted according to perceived risk. Most traders will be visited much less frequently than at present. A number of changes along these lines have already been extended to the control of United Kingdom wine producers.

Taxation

Mr. Mandelson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate of the total tax liability of taxpayers in 1993-94, excluding all tax reliefs and allowances other than personal allowance, married couples' allowance, age-related allowances, additional personal allowance, widow's bereavement allowance, blind person's allowance and qualifying interest on loans for purchase or improvement of owner-occupied property, broken down into the top and bottom (a) percentile, (b) 5 per cent., (c) decile, (d) quintile and (e) half of taxpayers.

Mr. Dorrell: Estimates of the tax liabilities are shown in the table. No account has been taken of any behavioural changes which might result from the restriction of the reliefs.

Quintile group of taxpayers[1]	Tax liability £ billion
Bottom 5 per cent.	0·1
Bottom 10 per cent.	0·3
Bottom 20 per cent.	1·1
Bottom 50 per cent.	8·7
Top 50 per cent.	55·8
Top 20 per cent.	38·1
Top 10 per cent.	27·9
Top 5 per cent.	20·6
Top 1 per cent.	9·9
Total tax liability	64·4

[1] Excludes individuals brought into tax through the removal of the relevant reliefs.

Mr. Mandelson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate of the total costs in 1991-92 of those tax allowances and reliefs listed in table 1.9 of "Inland Revenue Statistics 1992".

Mr. Dorrell: I regret that a reliable estimate cannot be made.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what, in the latest year for which information is available, is (a) the total number of people, (b) the number of people over state retirement age and (c) the number of one-parent families who pay (i) income tax and (ii) VAT.

Mr. Dorrell: It is estimated that in 1993-94 24·5 million individuals will be liable to income tax. Of these an estimated 3·0 million are aged 65 or over and 0·5 million are single parents.

VAT is chargeable on a wide range of consumer expenditure and it is likely that everybody has to pay some in the course of a year.

Premium Bonds

Mr. Dowd: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the total amount of all unclaimed premium bond prizes for each of the past five years.

Mr. Nelson: A premium bond prize is deemed to be unclaimed when it has been outstanding for 18 months since the draw in which it was issued. The latest figure, therefore, is for prizes unclaimed up to and including the October 1991 prize draw. All the figures below are cumulative from the first prize draw in June 1957.

	Number	Value £
October 1991	194,321	10,879,300
October 1990	174,954	9,859,150
October 1989	150,575	8,601,050
October 1988	127,050	7,404,200
October 1987	105,708	6,271,525

From June 1957 to October 1991, 38,549,293 prizes were issued to the value of £2,256,469,600. Prizes on the unclaimed list therefore represent 0·5 per cent. by number and 0·48 per cent. by value.

Business Enterprise Scheme

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many BES companies have been allowed to sell dormant subsidiaries without losing BES tax relief.

Mr. Dorrell: This information is not available.

European Community Budget

Mr. Streeter: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what contribution is made (a) per capita and (b) in total to the budget of the European Community by (i) the United Kingdom and (ii) France; and if he will make a statement.

Sir John Cope: The gross contributions to the 1993 European Community Budget by the United Kingdom and France are estimated to be as follows, taking account of the arrangements for abating the United Kingdom's contribution:

	Mecu	Ecu per capita
France	12,089	212
United Kingdom	7,881	137

Source: Contributions: Statement On the 1993 Community Budget (Cm 2167)

Market Testing

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the cost to date and the expected future cost of his Department's market-testing programme; how many staff are engaged full time in work relating to market testing; which firms of consultants have been used in connection with the market-testing programme; and how they were selected.

Mr. Nelson: Some £200,000 has been spent to date on implementing the 1993-94 programme and it is estimated that a further £100,000 will be spent. This includes the cost of support for the in-house teams and other consultancy work. It does not include the cost of the in-house teams themselves. Work on market testing is combined with other duties and no staff are engaged full time on this work. The firms of consultants so far used are Touche Ross, Prime Strategy Consultants and Ernst and Young. They have all been selected after a competitive tendering exercise.

Illegal Weapons Imports

Mr. Nigel Evans: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what measures Customs and Excise officers are taking to stop the illegal flow of weapons from eastern Europe and the former Soviet Union from entering the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement.

Sir John Cope: Customs give high priority to the detection of illegal imports of firearms. They carry out selective anti-smuggling checks, based on intelligence-led, sharply focused profiles which take into account the ready availability of firearms originating in eastern Europe and the former USSR.

Mr. Nigel Evans: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many illegal weapons were seized by Her Majesty's Customs and Excise in each of the last 10 years.

Sir John Cope: The table sets out the number of illegal weapons seized by Customs and Excise during the last 10 fiscal years.

Household Incomes

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will update table 25 from the Family Expenditure Survey of 1990, showing the total disposable income of households by deciles for different household composition to 1991.

Mr. Portillo: Table 25 using data from the 1991 Family Expenditure Survey is as follows:

Financial Regulation

Mr. French: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, when he proposes to publish the Securities and Investments Board review of financial regulation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nelson: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer given by my right hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Thames (Mr. Lamont) on 25 May 1993 at column 540.

HEALTH

NHS Salaries

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to her answer of 11 May, Official Report, columns 393-96, if she will publish separate figures for salaries and wages of each of the groups listed as all other staff.

Dr. Mawhinney: The information is shown in the tables. I refer the hon. Member to the reply that I gave him on 11 May at columns 393-96 for details on interpretation of the tables.

Note: There are some discontinuities in the detailed classification of staff between Professions Allied to Medicine (Supplementary to Medicine) and Professional, Technical and Scientific staff during the period.

Community Care

Sir John Hannam: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what response she has made to the report, "Community Care Planning; a Model for Housing Need Assessment with Reference to People with Learning Disabilities", produced by the Institute of Housing and the National Federation of Housing Associations, a copy of which has been sent to her; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Bowis: We are aware of this report. The question of the provision of housing and accommodation for people with learning disabilities is an important one. Within the community care arrangements we have made it clear that social services departments, housing authorities and other housing providers should work together in planning and providing services to meet local need. The guidance issued last year to local authorities (LAC(92)15) on planning services for adults with learning disabilities also emphasised this point. Copies of the guidance are available in the Library.

Wellhouse Trust

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what has been the financial deficit of the Wellhouse Trust in 1991-92 and 1992-93; and what deficit is projected for 1993-94.

Mr. Sackville: The current Wellhouse national health service trust was not established until 1 April 1992. The trust's 1992-93 accounts will be published in September 1993. The business plan for 1993-94 forecasts a break-even position.

Air Pollution

Ms Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what recent research studies have been considered by her Department on the relationship between particulate air pollution and human mortality; and what plans she has to issue guidelines for the protection of human health.

Mr. Sackville: The Department's committee on the medical effects of air pollutants (COMEAP) has considered the following recent studies relating mortality to particulate pollution:

Schwartz J and Marcus A, 1990. Mortality and air pollution in London; a time series analysis.

Schwartz J 1991. Particulate air pollution and daily mortality in Detroit.

Schwartz J and Dockery DW, 1992. Particulate air pollution and daily mortality in Steubenville, Ohio.

Waller RE and Swan AV, 1992. Invited commentary: Particulate air pollution and daily mortality.

Schwartz J and Dockery DW, 1992. Increased mortality in Philadelphia associated with daily air pollution concentrations.

Pope CA, Schwartz J and Ransom MR, 1992. Daily mortality and (PM_{10}[1]) pollution in the Utah Valley.

COMEAP advised that while these studies were consistent in demonstrating an association between PM_{10}[1] and mortality, no convincing evidence of a casual relationship had been shown.

COMEAP is currently considering ways of providing advice to sensitive groups on the steps which might be taken to reduce adverse effects of air pollutants.

[1]PM_{10} = Particulate Matter (10 micrometres).

Tobacco Advertising

Mr. Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will make a statement on the outcome of her discussions on 27 May with her European Community counterparts on the issue of the advertising of tobacco products.

Dr. Mawhinney: At the Health Council meeting the Danish presidency concluded after discussions that there remained insufficient support for the Commission's revised proposal for a directive introducing a Community-wide ban on the advertising of tobacco products. There was therefore no vote on the proposal. Discussions will continue under the Belgian presidency on appropriate Community action in support of member states to reduce tobacco consumption.

NHS (Ethnic Minorities)

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the membership of the working group on ethnic minority employment in the NHS; how many times it has met in 1992 and 1993; and what were its recommendations.

Dr. Mawhinney: The group is an informal one which comprises a changing number of individuals, mainly senior and professional health service staff. It has not yet completed its work.

Junior Doctors

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the number of junior doctors working an average of more than 83 hours a week nationally and by region at 1 April.

Dr. Mawhinney: Information on the number of junior doctors and dentists contracted for more than a maximum average of 83 hours per week at 31 March nationally and by region is shown in the table.

Regional Health Service

Mr. Booth: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what proposals she has for the future regional tier of the national health service.

Dr. Mawhinney: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, North-East (Mr. Congdon) on 12 May at cols 483-84, which sets out the terms of reference of the national health service management functions and manpower review. Decisions of the regional tier of NHS management will be taken after consideration of the review's recommendations.

Infertility Treatment

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the cost of infertility treatment in the NHS in the latest year for which figures are available.

Mr. Sackville: Infertility treatment costs are not separately identified in annual financial returns.

Skin Products

Mrs. Lait: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to her answer of 12 May, Official Report, column 486, what consideration the Advisory Committee on NHS Drugs has given to drugs that have not been licensed by the Medicines Control Agency; and what mechanism will be used under the selected list scheme for the provision to NHS patients of skin products that do not require a product licence under the Medicines Act 1968.

Dr. Mawhinney: The Advisory Committee is free to consider all drugs, including those which have not been licensed by the Medicines Control Agency. It will ensure that drugs to meet all real clinical needs can be provided as economically as possible under the national health service.

Doncaster Health Care Trust

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment she has made of (a) the management, (b) the present financial position and (c) the care provided by the Doncaster Healthcare Trust; what representations she has received about the trust; and if she will make a statement.

Dr. Mawhinney: National health service trusts are monitored by the NHS management executive. The board of Doncaster Healthcare NHS trust is due to publish its first annual report and accounts and hold its annual public meeting by 30 September 1993. The board anticipates that the annual accounts will demonstrate a satisfactory financial outcome in 1992-93. The specification and monitoring of the quality of care are primarily matters for purchasers.

Three hon. Members have made representations on matters relating to Doncaster Healthcare NHS trust.

West Midlands RHA

Mr. Richard Shepherd: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will give for the West Midlands regional health authority the names of the chairman and board members, their occupations or professions and their level of allowances or remuneration payable.

Dr. Mawhinney: The names and occupations of the chairman and non-executive members of West Midlands regional health authority are as follows:

		Occupation/Profession:
Chairman:	Sir Donald Wilson	Farmer
Non-Executive Members:	Ms Jacqueline Cravos	Chartered Accountant
	Mrs. Elspeth Metcalfe	Businesswoman
	Mr. Timothy Morris	Chairman, Birmingham Post
	Professor Sir Michael Thompson	Vice-Chancellor, University of Birmingham
	Mr. Michael Worley	Managing Director

Executive members are appointed by the regional health authority, which determines their remuneration.

The current levels of annual remuneration for chairmen and non-executive members of regional health authorities are:

Chairmen:	20,925
Non-executive members:	5,000

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether she has considered revised arrangements for the provision of legal services to the West Midlands health authority and West Midlands district health authorities; and if she will make a statement.

Dr. Mawhinney: The provision of legal services to West Midlands regional health authority and its associated districts is a matter for the authorities concerned.

Mr. Richard Shepherd: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will give for each of the hospital trusts in the west midlands region the names of the chairman and board members, their occupations or professions and any allowances or remuneration payable.

Dr. Mawhinney: The names of chairmen and non-executive directors of national health service trusts in West Midlands region and the most up-to-date information about their occupations are as shown:

		Occupation/Profession

National health service trust chairmen are remunerated according to the unit turnover in 1988-89. The present annual rates are:

Unit turnover 1988-89	Band	Rates per annum £
In excess of £50 million	Band 1	19,285
Between £20 million and £50 million	Band 2	17,145
Less than £20 million	Band 3	15,125

Non-executive directors of national health service trusts are remunerated at the rate of £5,000 per annum.

Crisis Intervention Accommodation

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to her answer to the hon. Member for Liverpool, Mossley Hill (Mr. Alton) of 15 April, Official Report, column 672, how her Department defines crisis intervention accommodation.

Mr. Bowis: There is no standard definition. It is for health and local authorities to provide appropriate accommodation for local crisis intervention services. This can include mental health centres, hostels and ordinary housing.

Health Trusts

Mr. Spellar: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the rate of return on capital required from health trusts; how capital is defined; and how it is assessed.

Mr. Sackville: Trusts are required to make a real pre-interest return of 6 per cent. of relevant net assets. The definition of relevant net assets (capital) and the calculation of the return are detailed in chapter 17 of the Trust Manual for Accounts, a copy of which will be placed in the Library.

Selected List Drugs

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what representations she has received about the inclusion of contraceptives on the selected list scheme.

Dr. Mawhinney: I refer the hon. Member to the reply that I gave to the hon. Member for Birmingham, Northfield (Mr. Burden) on 26 May at column 578.

Contraceptives

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment she has made of the effect of restriction of choice of contraception on unplanned pregnancies.

Dr. Mawhinny: I refer the hon. Member to the reply that I gave to the hon. Member for Lancashire, West (Mr. Pickthall) on 18 January at col. 97.

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the number of (a) women and (b) men receiving free contraception in each of the last five years.

Mr. Sackville: The information is not available in the form requested. However, table 1 shows the number of first contracts in community and hospital family planning clinics, excluding those for whom a main method of contraception was not provided, and table 2, the number of patients for whom general medical practitioners claimed payment for provision of contraceptive services. As information is collected at differing dates, the tables relate to the last five-year period for which comprehensive information is available.

Table 1: Number of first contacts at community and hospital family planning clinics (thousands)

	Total	Female	Male
1986[1]	1,320	1,295	25
1987-88[1]	1,227	1,196	31
1988-89[1]	1,016	986	30
1989-90	994	964	31
1990-91	961	931	30

[1] For 1986, 1987-88 and 1988-89 detailed information by sex is not available and has been estimated.

Table 2:
Number of patients (at 1 October each year) for whom payment was due to general medical practitioners for the provision of contraceptive services in the year ended 1 October (thousands).

	Number of Claims[1]
1986	2,570
1987	2,570
1988	2,660
1989	2,730
1990	2,860

[1] Figures relate to women only. The number of instances in these figures where advice alone was provided is not known.

Relocation and Amalgamation

Mr. Robert Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will list the sections and organisations within her Department for which there are plans for relocation or amalgamation.

Mr. Sackville: The Department has no further plans for relocation having completed the move of the national health service management executive to Leeds. There are no plans at present to amalgamate any parts of the Department.

Health Authority Staff

Mr. McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what level of reduction in regional health authority staffing levels is being proposed; and on what criteria this level was proposed.

Dr. Mawhinney: We have told regional health authorities that they should reduce staffing levels to typically a maximum of 200. This reflects the changing role of RHAs as the national health service reforms are implemented. The NHS management functions and manpower review will make recommendations on the longer term future of RHAs. I refer the hon. Member to the reply my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State gave my hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, North-East (Mr. Congdon) on 12 May at columns 483-84 for terms of reference of this review.

Pharmacists

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many pharmacies in the City of Durham constituency area issue (a) fewer than 2,000 prescriptions per month and (b) more than 2,000 prescriptions per month.

Dr. Mawhinney: This information is not available in the form requested. However, in 1991-92 in Durham family health services authority, which includes the City of Durham constituency, 19 pharmacies were dispensing less than 2,000 prescriptions and 93 were dispensing more than 2,000 prescriptions per month on average throughout the year.

Munchhausen's Syndrome by Proxy

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what information she has on the incidence of Munchhausen's Syndrome by proxy; how cases have been recorded; and how many subsequently disputed diagnoses have been made.

Mr. Bowis: Specific diagnostic information on this syndrome is not available centrally. It is known to be very rare.

North Western Regional Health Authority

Mr. Callaghan: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will make a statement on trends in patient demand in the North Western regional health authority.

Mr. Sackville: This is a matter for North Western regional health authority. The hon. Member may wish to contact Sir Bruce Martin, chairman of the regional health authority, for details.

Joint Replacements

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what guidelines she has issued in relation to a British standard for knee and hip joint replacement sets.

Mr. Sackville: There is no single British standard for knee and hip joint replacement implants. National standards are defined through an interrelated system of around 40 British standards for orthopaedic implants and materials. Compliance with appropriate standards is called for in the Department of Health's requirements for quality systems for orthopaedic implants, published in 1990, copies of which are available in the Library.

Teenage Pregnancies

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what targets have been set for the reduction of unwanted teenage pregnancies.

Mr. Sackville: The Government White Paper, "The Health of the Nation", includes the target to reduce the rate of conceptions among the under-16s by at least 50 per cent. by the year 2000. Measures which reduce pregnancies in the under-16s may also be expected to exert a similar effect on unwanted pregnancies in the over-16s.

Ms Gordon: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the rate of (a) births and (b) abortions per thousand women aged (i) 15, (ii) 16, (iii) 17, (iv) 18 and (v) 19 years in each year since 1980.

Mr. Sackville: The information is shown in the table:

Births and abortions per 1,000 women aged 15-19 years; England and Wales[1]

	Births[1,2] Age (years)					Abortions Age (years)
Year	15	16	17	18	19	15	16	17	18	19

[1] The populations used as the denominators for 1991 rates are the provisional estimates based on the 1991 Census. The denominators for the 1992 rates are projected populations.
[2] Live births and still births combined.

Health Authority Chairmen

Mr. McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what percentage increases in salaries have been awarded to chairmen of regional health authorities, district health authorities and family health service authorities in respect of financial years (a) 1990-91, (b) 1991-92 and (c) 1992-93 in each region.

Dr. Mawhinney: Percentage increases awarded to chairmen of regional health authorities, district health authorities and family health services authorities since April 1990 are shown in the table. The same rates of increase applied in each region.

Chairmen's remuneration: Percentage increases

Chairmen	1 April 1990	1 January 1991	1 April 1991	1 December 1991
RHA	51·8	1·0	7·5	1·8
DHA
Band 1	9·7	1·0	7·5	1·8
Band 2	24·4	1·0	7·5	1·8
Band 3	41·3	1·0	7·5	1·8
FHSA
Band 1	127·9	1·0	7·5	1·8
Band 2	112·0	1·0	7·5	1·8
Band 3	96·1	1·0	7·5	1·8

Notes: 1. The increases effective from 1 April 1990 resulted from a restructuring of chairmen's remuneration to reflect more accurately the level of responsibility and time commitment involved.
2. Three separate bands for DHA and family practitioner committee (later FHSA) chairmen's remuneration were introduced with effect from 1 April 1990.
3. The increase effective from 1 December 1991 was the second stage of the award for 1991-92 and represented 2 per cent. of the 1 January 1991 rate.
4. Increases are rounded to the nearest decimal place.

Mental Health Act

Mr. Clifton-Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many people have been detained under section 2 of the Mental Health Act 1983 in each of the last five years.

Mr. Bowis: Formal admissions to national health service hospitals, private nursing homes and special hospitals under section 2 of the Mental Health Act 1983 in each of the five years for which data are available are shown in the table.

Year	Section 2 of the Mental Health Act 1983, England
1985	7,902
1986	8,387
1987-88	8,867
1988-89	9,517
1989-90	9,534

The numbers are of admissions, not persons, as a person could be admitted more than once during the year. Data for 1987-88 onwards are on a financial year basis.

Liquid Paraffin Oil

Mr. Shersby: To ask the Secretary of State for Health to what extent liquid paraffin oil is now used as a laxative; what information her Department has concerning any adverse effects on human health arising from the regular use of this medicine; whether any advice has been given to pharmacists concerning dosage and duration of use; and if she will make a statement.

Dr. Mawhinney: Preparations containing liquid paraffin for use as laxatives are only indicated for the symptomatic relief of constipation. Prolonged regular use may be associated with inflammatory lesions in the gastrointestinal tract, lipoid pneumonia due to inadvertent inhalation and interference with absorption of fat-soluble vitamins. The Committee on Safety of Medicines issued advice regarding the use of liquid paraffin in its bulletin Current Problems Number 28, sent to all doctors and pharmacists in May 1990, a copy of which is available in the Library. The CSM advice is also included in the British National Formulary, which the Department issues free of charge to all prescribers twice yearly.

Preparations containing liquid paraffin for use as laxatives are not available directly to the public and may only be bought from pharmacies under the supervision of a pharmacist, where the pack size which may be sold is limited to 160 ml, approximately one week's supply. Prolonged use is not advised and these preparations are contra-indicated for children under three years of age. Package labels clearly state that "repeated use is not recommended"

and

"to consult your doctor if laxatives are needed every day, if you have persistent abdominal pain or a condition which makes swallowing difficult".

Lewisham Hospital Trust

Mr. Dowd: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what undertakings Sir Philip Harris has given as to the proportion of his time to be devoted to the chairmanship of the Lewisham Hospital Trust relative to business and other activities; and if she will now review his appointment.

Dr. Mawhinney: All national health service trust chairmen are expected to devote at least the equivalent of three working days per week to their duties. I have no reason to believe that Sir Philip Harris will not be in a position to make this commitment and I have no plans to review his appointment.

Population Statistics

Mr. Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will list the latest estimates by the Registrar General of Populations of those aged 17 years and over, plus 63 per cent. of those aged 16 years, for each district council area and parliamentary constituency in England and Wales, together in each case with the equivalent year's electoral registration figures, also expressed as a percentage of these population estimates.

Mr. Sackville: The Office of Population Census and Surveys expect to publish a set of final mid-1991 population estimates, taking account of the later 1991 census results, towards the end of this month. Updated estimates relating to mid-1992 will be published in October. I will arrange for comparisons between 1992 electorates and final mid-1991 estimates, and later between 1993 electorates and mid-1992 estimates, for local authority areas in England and Wales to be placed in the Library as soon as possible. No population estimates are currently available for parliamentary constituencies. However, census data for parliamentary constituencies, which will include population counts, will be available later this year.

Special Therapy Facilities

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what additional resources she plans to provide to health authorities to meet their statutory responsibilities to provide special facilities for (a) speech therapy, (b) physiotherapy and (c) occupational therapy; and what representations she has received on the level of funding currently provided.

Dr. Mawhinney: Health authorities and general practitioner fund holders are responsible for purchasing speech therapy, physiotherapy and occupational therapy services to meet the needs of their residents in the light of their judgment of priorities and within the resources available to them.

NHS Funding

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what research is being undertaken or commissioned by the Government into the possibility of funding the NHS in part or wholly by a new system of health insurance or tokens.

Mr. Sackville: None.

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what research is being undertaken or commissioned by the Government into the possibility of hospital or primary care charges related to the ability to pay.

Mr. Sackville: None.

Unregistered Doctors

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether a doctor with medical qualifications from another country may practise as a medical practitioner in this country without registering with the General Medical Council.

Dr. Mawhinney: All doctors wishing to work as medical practitioners in the United Kingdom must be registered with the General Medical Council. An overseas qualified doctor must obtain the necessary registration from the General Medical Council in order to engage in any professional employment as a medical practitioner in the United Kingdom.

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether United Kingdom pharmacists may dispense prescription-only medicines prescribed by doctors not registered with the General Medical Council.

Dr. Mawhinney: No.

Residential Care Homes

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) if she will list the funding assessment that has been made by each of the London borough councils to support a person living in residential care under the care in the community legislation;

(2) what advice she has given to people or organisations running residential care homes in areas where the present agreed rates of support are below existing income support benefits; and if she will make a statement;

(3) what account local authorities are required to take of religious requirements when assessing what funding will be paid for a resident living in a residential home under the existing care in the community legislation; and if she will make a statement;

(4) what right of appeal exists for people running residential care homes if they disagree with the funding assessment made by the local authority for a resident living within the home; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Bowis: Contracts for residential care or nursing home services are negotiated and agreed between local authorities and home owners. Local authorities are not required to submit details of the agreements reached.

Care in the Community

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will make a statement as to the procedures to be followed in respect of an at-risk person resident within a borough that has already spent its care in the community budget before a full assessment has been made of the person's health to ensure the protection of the welfare of that person.

Mr. Bowis: The assessment of health needs and the provision of health services remain the responsibilities of health authorities. All local authorities are receiving special transitional grants which will enable them to meet their new community care responsibilities; the grants represent only a proportion of any authority's personal social services resources. It is for local authorities to set priorities and manage their resources sensibly.

Water Disconnections (Public Health)

Mrs. Helen Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what discussions she has had with the Chief Medical Officer about the potential threat to public health caused by the disconnection of water to domestic dwellings;

(2) what action she has taken through the Chief Medical Officer to examine the implications of the number of notifiable cases of dysentery and hepatitis A in the last three months.

Mr. Sackville: We regularly discuss with the Chief Medical Officer any possible threats to public health. Provisional figures indicate that in the first three months of this year reported cases of Shigella sonnei—the principal causative organism of dysentery in the United Kingdom—and hepatitis A show a fall over the same period last year.

Nurses and Midwives

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many (a) nurses and (b) midwives were in training in each health region in each year since 1979.

Mr. Sackville: The information will be placed in the Library.

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many (a) district nurses and (b) community midwives were employed in the NHS in each of the last five years for which figures are available.

Mr. Sackville: I refer the hon. Member to the reply that I gave her on 11 February at cols. 751-52, for information on national health service district nurses. Information on community midwives is shown in the table.

National health service community midwifery staff England September 1987 to September 1991 (whole-time equivalents)

	Number
1987	4,100
1988	4,110
1989	4,070
1990	4,200
1991	4,560

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many qualified nursing staff are employed by (a) voluntary organisations and (b) local authorities.

Mr. Sackville: This information is not available centrally.

Grants

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the total number of grants which have been approved by her Department under the section 64 general scheme of grants in the financial year starting on 1 April distinguishing between (a) existing core grants, (b) new core grants and (c) new project grants and the total funds allocated under each category.

Mr. Sackville: By 28 May 1993 grant approval letters under the section 64 general scheme had been issued for 200 existing core grants, 29 new core grants and 52 new project grants. The total sums involved are £10,569,000, £602,000 and £1,220,000 respectively. A further 88 approval letters had also been issued for funds totalling £2,791,000 in respect of existing project and capital grants. Final details of grants totalling approximately £4 million are currently being settled. The total provision for 1993-94 is £19,207,000.

Hospital Fire Officers

Ms Lynne: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many hospitals do not have a fire officer currently in post; and if she will list them.

Mr. Sackville: This information is not available centrally. Guidance to health service employers on the appointment of officers responsible for fire safety is set out in the Department's document "FIRECODE—Policy and Principles". A copy of the relevant extract from this document will be placed in the Library.

Competitive Tendering

Mr. Dunn: To ask the Secretary fo State for Health what assessment she has made of whether competitive tendering by district health authorities is effectively supervised by regional health authorities; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Sackville: None. Following the successful reforms of the national health service all purchasers and providers are charged to ensure that they receive good quality and value for money on behalf of their patients.

Waiting Times, Trent Region

Mr. Patchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what has been the waiting time for patients for operations in the Trent regional health authority in each of the past three years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Sackville: Waiting time information by regional health authority is given in "Hospital Waiting List Statistics: England", published twice a year, copies of which are available in the Library. Provisional figures for March 1993 show that, over the last three years, Trent regional health authority has reduced the number of patients waiting over a year by 31 per cent.

Cervical Cancer Screening

Mr. Dunn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what provision there is within the South East Thames regional health authority area for cervical cancer screening; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Sackville: Provision for cervical cancer screening is the responsibility of the appropriate regional health authority. My hon. Friend may wish to contact Dr. Gabriel Scally, director of public health of South East Thames health authority for details.

HIV/AIDS and Drug Abuse

Mr. Darling: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will set out the criteria used in allocating resources to health authorities for their work in connection with (a) HIV/AIDS and (b) drug abuse, including the criteria in respect of (i) education and (ii) prevention in these areas; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Sackville: Allocations to regional health authorities for the development of services for the treatment and care of people with HIV and AIDS are made on the basis of each region's HIV and AIDS prevalence and the costs of treatment. Allocations to regions for developing local HIV prevention work with their resident populations are made according to weighted capitation principles.

Funding for drugs services, including for work to prevent the spread of HIV among drug users and to their sexual partners, is based on the number of the population in each region aged between 15 and 34. Allocations have also been made as a contribution to the cost of methadone prescribing as part of a planned programme of treatment, and on the basis of regions' reported usage.

St. Bartholomew's Hospital

Mr. Sedgemore: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will list under the relevant specialty heading the names of the members of each of the six specialty review teams which examined specialty work at St. Bartholomew's hospital.

Dr. Mawhinney: The names of members of each of the six specialty review teams are as follows:

Ms Zarrina Kurtz, South West Thames Regional Health Authority
Dr. Peter Morris, Association of Paediatric Anaesthetists of Great Britain and Ireland

Military Hospital Beds

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps she intends taking to ensure that the loss of military hospital beds does not add to civilian waiting list times.

Mr. Sackville: It is the responsibility of district health authorities, as purchasers of health care, to ensure, in consultation with their providers, that the patients charter waiting time guarantees and local waiting times standards are met.

Head Injuries

Mr. Nigel Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many people have died from head injuries in England in each year since 1979.

Mr. Sackville: The information is shown in the table.

Numbers of deaths where the underlying cause was recorded as being from a head injury ([1]ICDs 800-804 and 850-854) in England 1979-1992

Year	Males	Females	Total

Live Births

Mr. Nigel Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many live births there were in each hospital in Lancashire in each year since 1988-89.

Mr. Sackville: The information is shown in the table:

Livebirths in Lancashire Hospitals 1989-1992

	1989	1990	1991	1992
Sharoe Green Hospital, Preston	4,549	4,957	4,719	4,423

Extra-contractual Referrals

Ms Lynne: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what guidance or advice has been issued by her Department on payments from the extra-contractual referrals budgets of health authorities for treatment for patients who in the past have paid for similar treatments themselves in the private sector.

Mr. Sackville: Requests for extra-contractual referrals (ECRs) for this group of patients should be considered in the same way as any other ECR request. Guidance on handling ECRs was issued under cover of EL(92)60 on 9 September 1992, copies of which are available in the Library.

Ms Lynne: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many people in each district health authority, who have in the past paid for treatment in the private sector, have been refused money from extra-contractual referrals budgets for similar treatments.

Mr. Sackville: This information is not available centrally.

Liver Transplants

Mr. Nigel Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many children under one year of age have been diagnosed as suffering from biliary atresia in each year from 1987; how many of them were placed on a waiting list for liver transplant in each of those years; and in how many of those cases in each year a liver transplant operation was performed.

Mr. Sackville: The information is not available centrally in the form requested. Published reports suggest that the incidence of extra hepatic biliary atresia is about one in 14,000 infants. From this it is estimated that in England and Wales where about 700,000 infants are born each year, of whom 93 per cent. survive the first year there would be about 50 cases annually. The table shows the number of children in the United Kingdom aged less than one year who joined the liver transplant waiting list in each year from 1987, and the number transplanted. It has not been possible to identify the specific conditions from which these children were suffering.

Year	Number of children aged less than one year joining the liver waiting list for the first time (or for the first time since previous transplant)	Number of these children transplanted
1988	17	8
1989	14	12
1990	13	9
1991	22	21
1993	12	7[1]

[1] Up to 28 May 1993. Four children under age one who joined the waiting list for livers in 1993 are still awaiting transplant as at 28 May 1993. Nine children appear in the table more than once due to retransplants while aged less than one year. Figures supplied by the United Kingdom Transplant Support Service Authority.

Abortion

Mr. Nigel Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many abortions have been performed by the NHS in each year since 1979.

Mr. Sackville: The information is shown in the table; 1991 is the last complete year for which information is available, 1992 data (January-March) are provisional.

Number of abortions performed in NHS facilities and in non-NHS facilities under agency agreement England and Wales 1979-1992

Year	Number of NHS abortions	Number of "Agency" abortions
1979	55,767	Data not available before 1981
1980	60,818
1981	61,276	2,343

1990	73,582	9,720
1991	75,245	9,208
1992[1]	19,301	2,881

[1] Provisional January-March 1992.

Blood Donors

Mr. Wareing: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to her reply of 21 May, Official Report, columns 333-34, if she is giving consideration to adding persons who are at risk of exposure to radiation to the categories of persons asked not to donate blood for the National Blood Transfusion Service; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Sackville: The National Blood Transfusion Service does not consider that such persons, in general, should be excluded from donating blood. The decision whether or not to accept such a person as a donor depends on the individual's own medical history.

Embryology

Mr. Nigel Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many research projects using human embryos have been licensed by the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Authority since its inception.

Mr. Sackville: Thirty-five.

Skin Cancer

Mr. Nigel Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many people have died from skin cancer in each year since 1979.

Mr. Sackville: The information is shown in the table.

Number of people who have died from skin cancer in England and Wales 1979-92

ICD	172 (Malignant melanoma of skin)	173 (Other malignant neoplasm of skin)

1990	1,170	436
1991	1,169	465
1992	1,142	486

Bone Cancer

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many people were diagnosed as suffering from bone cancer in England in each of the last 10 years; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Sackville: The number of cases of bone cancer (International Classification of Diseases, ninth revision, code 170) registered in England in each of the years 1979 to 1987, the last year for which information is available, is shown in the table.

Registrations of bone cancer, 1979-87 England ICD 170, 9th revision

Year	Males	Females
1979	232	179
1980	214	159

1984	226	183
1985	190	194
1986	189	189
1987	218	184

Number of cases for earlier years (1971 to 1978) are available, and can be found in the Office of Population Censuses and Surveys publication 'Cancer statistics: registrations' series MB1 nos. 1-10; comparisons with figures for 1979 onwards, however, will be affected by the change from the 8th revision of the ICD to the 9th revision.

NHS Trusts

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what guidance and regulations limit the proportion of private practice in NHS trusts.

Mr. Sackville: Under section 5(9) and paragraph 14 of schedule 2 of the National Health Service and Community Care Act 1990, NHS trusts may make accommodation and services available for patients who give undertakings to pay such charges as the trust determines. In so doing, there must be no significant interference with the performance by the trust of its obligations under NHS contracts or imposed by order.

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health which NHS trust hospitals in London have not signed contracts with their local health authority for 1993-94; and if she will make a statement.

Dr. Mawhinney: All national health service trust hospitals in London[1] have agreed contracts with their host health authorities. Only two—the Royal Free Hospital NHS trust and the Royal London NHS trust have yet to be signed.

[1] London has been taken as the inner London health authorities identified in the "Report of the inquiry into London's Health Service, Medical Education and Research" namely: Bloomsbury and Islington, Camberwell, City and Hackney, Hampstead, Haringey, Lewisham and North Southwark, Newham, Parkside, Riverside, Tower Hamlets, Wandsworth and West Lambeth district health authorities.

Nurses

Ms Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will publish a table showing the earnings of pupil nurses, grade A nurses aged under 18 years, grade A nurses aged over 18 years and nurses in each grade from B to I in real terms at January 1993 prices for each year since 1990-91; and if he will provide estimates for 1993-94 and 1994-95.

Mr. Sackville [holding answer 25 May 1993]: The available information is shown in the table. Estimates for 1993-94 and 1994-95 are not available.

Average earnings[1] of full-time staff at 1992-93 prices[2]

NHS Earnings

Ms Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will publish a table showing the earnings of medical and dental house officers, senior house officers, consultants on all scales, senior hospital medical and dental officers, hospital practitioners, consultants in public health medicine and senior dental officers in real terms at January 1993 prices for each year since 1990-91; and if she will provide estimates for 1993-94 and 1994-95.

Dr. Mawhinney [holding answer 25 May 1993]: The information which is available is shown in the table. Estimates for 1993-94 and 1994-95 are not available. The total earnings of hospital practitioners are not available on a comparable basis to other doctors in the hospital sector as they also receive earnings as general practitioners.

	1990-91 £	1991-92 £	1992-93 £
House officers	15,890	16,920	19,550
Senior house officers	22,680	23,260	26,840

[1] Earnings are basic pay plus allowances.
[2] Gross domestic product deflator is used to calculate earnings in real terms.
[3] Includes senior hospital medical and dental officers.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Citizenship

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has considered the recommendations of the Speaker's Commission on citizenship; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Maclean: The recommendations of the 1990 report of the Commission on Citizenship have been considered in the Home Office.

The Government regard citizenship in its widest sense as an issue of fundamental importance and take every opportunity to encourage individuals and companies alike to be aware of, and act on, their responsibilities in the community. The wide-ranging report made a contribution to the discussion of these issues.

The report's recommendations covered many departmental interests and those falling within the Home Office's remit have been borne in mind in the course of its work.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for The Home Department how many applications have been made in each year since 1985 for registration as British nationals (overseas); and how many have been (a) granted, (b) refused and (c) are still pending.

Mr. Charles Wardle: Hong Kong British Dependent Territories citizens are entitled to BN(0) status and no applications have been refused. BN(0) registrations first took place in 1987. Applications received and registered since then are as follows:

	Applications
Year	Received	Registered
[1]1987	18,366	16,275
1988	31,916	30,222
1989	53,222	49,519
1990	80,213	78,265
1991	101,534	107,423
1992	156,511	149,302
[2]1993	72,713	66,294
Total	514,475	497,300

[1] (from July).
[2] (to April).

The number of applications outstanding at end April 1993 was 17,175.

Fire Safety

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what action Her Majesty's Government have taken to implement within the United Kingdom the fire safety provisions of the EC directives commonly known as the workplace and framework directives, by 31 December 1992.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Proposals to implement these provisions by regulations made under section 12 of the Fire Precautions Act 1971 were issued for consultation in May 1992. Many welcomed our proposals, but some valid criticisms emerged. We therefore decided that the draft regulations and associated guidance should not take effect on 1 January 1993, as originally planned.

We hope to issue revised proposals for Fire Precautions (Places of Work) Regulations and related guidance for consultation in the summer. This will enable us to consider any comments which we receive and make the regulations to take effect on or after 1 April 1994.

High Crime Areas

Ms Coffey: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what discussions he has had with the Association of Chief Police Officers about the targeting of police resources to areas with a high incidence of crime.

Mr. Charles Wardle: Decisions about the use of resources are the responsibility of chief officers of police. These matters do not usually arise in our discussions with the Association of Chief Police Officers.

Ms Coffey: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what additional resources he will make available in the next two financial years to provide grants to people in the high crime areas for additional household and security measures.

Mr. Maclean: Home Office financial support for local crime prevention activity is channelled through the safer cities projects currently established in 20 high-crime areas in England. These projects provide financial and other assistance for crime prevention work which may include schemes for improving household security in accordance with locally determined priorities. The 16 longer-established projects—in Birmingham, Bradford, Bristol, Coventry, Hartlepool, Hull, Islington, Lewisham, Nottingham, Rochdale, Salford, Sunderland, Tower Hamlets, Wandsworth, Wirral and Wolverhampton—each have a grants budget of £100,000 for the year ending 31 March 1994, by which date Home Office funding for these projects is due to come to an end. The four more recently established projects—in Derby, Hammersmith and Fulham, Leicester and Middlesborough—each have a grants budget of £250,000 for 1993-94; the size of these budgets in future years has yet to be determined.

A second phase of safer cities is to be established in areas which have not yet benefited from this initiative in accordance with the announcement made by my predecessor in reply to a question from the hon. Member for Erewash (Mrs. Knight) on 11 January, column 601, and the accompanying statement, a copy of which is in the Library. The grants budget for these new projects has yet to be determined.

In addition to this Home Office programme, Department of Environment programmes including estates action and city challenge also provide support for measures aimed at improving improved household security.

Ms Coffey: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to increase police resources in areas of rising crime.

Mr. Charles Wardle: This Government have provided very substantial additional resources to the police service. It is for chief constables to decide how to deploy their resources to the best effect within their force area. Forces are encouraged to look closely at how effectively their resources are deployed so as to meet the demands which are made of them.

Hong Kong

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many applications have been made in Hong Kong in each year since 1985 for naturalisation as British dependent territories citizens; and how many have been (a) granted, (b) refused and (c) are still pending.

Mr. Charles Wardle: The information is as follows:

Applications

Year	Made	Granted	Refused	Withdrawn
1985	844	704	152	86
1986	861	759	100	45
1987	1,233	808	70	23
1988	1,016	1,074	60	36
1989	3,098	1,098	73	26
1990	12,543	1,699	95	39
1991	7,588	11,463	399	270
1992	2,909	8,846	493	247
[1]1993	1,505	885	55	19
Totals	31,597	27,336	1,497	791

[1](to April).

Note: Year of application and year of determination are different in most cases.

The number of applications outstanding at the end of April 1993 was 2,981.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what discussions are taking place on the provisions of the British Nationality Order under the Hong Kong Act 1984 on the acquisition of British national (overseas) status.

Mr. Charles Wardle: Discussions have been taking place between Her Majesty's Government, the Hong Kong Government and members of the Hong Kong Legislative Council. We expect to have further discussions with a delegation from the Legislative Council House Committee in London this week.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to alter either the time in which applications are permitted or the method of application for British National (Overseas) status for British dependent territories citizens in Hong Kong.

Mr. Charles Wardle: Work is in hand to prepare a draft Order in Council requiring applications for British National (Overseas) status to be made in time to allow the necessary work to be completed before the powers to register such applicants and issue them with BN(O) passports lapse on 1 July 1997. It is proposed to specify deadlines according to age group with provision for late applications to be considered where there are special circumstances. We have no plans for any change in the method of application.

Prison Population

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many young adult offenders were received into (a) Feltham prison, (b) Hull prison and (c) Leeds prison under sentence (i) in the last week for which figures are available, (ii) in the week ending 27 February and (iii) in the week ending 28 November 1992; and how many previous convictions they had individually and on average.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply.

Letter from A. J. Butler to Mr. Alun Michael, dated June 1993:

RECEPTIONS INTO FELTHAM, HULL AND LEEDS

The Secretary of State has asked me in the absence of the Director General from the office to write to you directly in reply to your Parliamentary Question about the number of sentenced young adult offenders received into Feltham, Leeds and Hull prisons and how many previous convictions they had individually and on average.

The information on receptions for the periods you have requested is not yet available. The readily available information relates to the population of sentenced prisoners (aged under 21) at Leeds, Hull and Feltham on 30 November 1992 and 28 February and 30 April 1993 and is given in Table 1.

As regard previous convictions information for November 1992 is not available. Available information for previous convictions relates to inmates who were in the prison population of these establishments on 28 February and 30 April 1993 and is shown in Table 2. I am afraid that this table provides little useful information because, owing to a computer problem, it is not possible to distinguish prisoners with no previous convictions from those for whom this information is not recorded.

Table 1

Population aged under 21[1] under sentence in prison service establishments in England and Wales on: 30 November 1992, 28 February and 31 March 1993[2]

	Number of prisoners
Date	Leeds	Feltham	Hull
30 November 1992	—	386	—
28 February 1993	—	448	—
30 April 1993	—	493	—

[1] Includes a small number of prisoners aged 21 held in the young offenders' institution at Feltham.
[2] Includes those sentenced for non-payment of a fine.

Table 2

Population under sentence in Feltham on 28 February and 30 April 1993 by previous convictions[1]

Date	Population	Number of previous convictions
		Previous convictions nil or not recorded[2]	1	2	3	4	5	6-10	11 and over

30 April 1993	493	473	3	2	3	1	1	6	4

[1] Previous conviction information is not recorded for persons committed for non-payment of a fine.
[2] Not separately identifiable.

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the percentage of (a) men and (b) women under the age of 21 years who were part of the prison population in England and Wales on 24 May.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply.

Letter from A. J. Butler to Mr. Tom Cox, dated June 1993:

Percentage of men and women aged under 21 who are part of the prison population in England and Wales

The Home Secretary has asked me in the absence of the Director General from the office, to write to you directly in reply to your Parliamentary Question about the percentage of (a) men and (b) women under the age of 21 years who were part of the prison population in England and Wales on 24 May 1993.

The last available information is based on the prison population aged under 21 on 30 April 1993. It shows that 0·39 per cent. of males aged 15 to 20 and 0·01 per cent. of females aged 15 to 20 in England and Wales were part of the prison population in Prison Service establishments on that date.

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what has been the number of prisoners of United Kingdom nationality who were serving prison sentences in overseas countries who have been transferred to prisons in the United Kingdom to serve the remainder of their sentences in each of the last three years.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply.

Letter from A. J. Butler to Mr. Tom Cox, dated June 1993:

The Home Secretary has asked me, in the absence of the Director General from the office, to reply to your Question about the transfer to this country from abroad of prisoners of United Kingdom nationality.

The number of prisoners of United Kingdom nationality transferred to the United Kingdom to serve the remainder of their sentences is as follows:

Year	Number
1990	0
1991	14
1992	17

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for The Home Department what was the prison population in each of the 12 member states of the EC as of the latest available date.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The latest available information on the prison population for all 12 member states of the EC relates to September 1990. These figures are in table 2 of the Council of Europe Prison Information Bulletin, No. 16, a copy of which is in the Library. Data for September 1991 have been collected independently from a number of EC countries and was given in reply to the hon. Member for Lewisham, Deptford (Ms Ruddock) on 9 February, cols. 532-34.

An article on "International comparisons of prison populations" by Collier and Tarling—Home Office research bulletin No. 23, pages 48 to 54—showed that the figures for different countries are unlikely to be strictly comparable because the definitions of prisons and prisoners vary from one country to another, reflecting different legal and administrative systems. Examples of differences in the definitions are the inclusion or exclusion in a country's figures of juvenile offenders and mentally disordered offenders.

False Passports

Mr. Nigel Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many false passports have been confiscated by immigration officers in each year from 1978;

(2) how many people have been arrested for trying to enter or leave the United Kingdom on a false passport in each year since 1987.

Mr. Charles Wardle: The information is not available in the form requested. The numbers of forged and improperly held travel documents detected by the Immigration Service at ports and airports in the United Kingdom since October 1988 are as follows:

	Number
[1]1988	613
1989	2,134
1990	3,772
1991	3,730
1992	2,809

[1] (1 October to 31 December only).

Asylum

Mr. Fraser: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many of the signatories of the Dublin convention determining the state responsible for examining an application for asylum submitted in one of the member states of the European Communities have now ratified that convention.

Mr. Charles Wardle: Five—Denmark, Greece, Italy, Portugal and the United Kingdom; and I understand that in Luxembourg the parliamentary procedures necessary for ratification have been completed.

Mr. Fraser: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will place in the Library a copy of the proposal presented to the Ministers responsible for immigration at their meeting on 30 November in London of the ad hoc group, immigration, for a manual of European asylum practices.

Mr. Charles Wardle: The paper containing the proposal was a working document of no lasting significance. But I shall place in the Library a copy of the manual itself—a compilation of texts on asylum adopted by Ministers responsible for immigration.

Mr. Fraser: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how the report approved by the Ministers responsible for immigration in their meeting in London on 30 November on countries on which there is generally no serious risk of persecution will be implemented into the United Kingdom law or practice in respect of asylum.

Mr. Charles Wardle: We have no present plans formally to designate any countries of origin of asylum seekers as ones in which there is generally no serious risk of persecution. However, the framework contained in the ministerial conclusions is a useful guide for the assessment of conditions in particular countries in the consideration of individual asylum claims.

Mr. Fraser: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps he has taken or plans to take to implement into domestic legislation the resolution on manifestly unfounded applications for asylum agreed at the Westminster meeting of the Ministers responsible for immigration.

Mr. Charles Wardle: The Asylum and Immigration Appeals Bill is consistent with the principles of this resolution. We have no plans for any further legislation on this subject.

Market Testing

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the cost to date and the expected future cost of his Department's market-testing programme; how many staff are engaged full time in work relating to market testing; which firms of consultants have been used in connection with the market-testing programme; and how they were selected.

Mr. Charles Wardle: The cost of the Home Office market-testing programme between November 1991 until March 1993 was £1·036 million. The number of staff employed full time on market testing as at 1 June 1993 was 56. The future cost of market testing will be determined by the nature of subsequent market-testing programmes.

The Department has used the following external consultancies:

Arthur Walton and Partners
Corporate Renewal Associates
Ernst and Young
Peat Marwick
LEK
PA Consulting
Price Waterhouse
Shreeveport
Touche Ross
Worthy Associates

Our policy is for consultants to be engaged as a result of a competitive tender process unless there are particular circumstances which warrant single tender action.

Local Authority Prosecutions

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects to be in a position to reply to the letter dated 17 February from the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed enclosing representations from Castle Morpeth council about local authority prosecutions and the Criminal Justice Act.

Mr. Howard: I wrote to the right hon. Member on 4 June.

Electoral System

Mr. Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what progress has been made on his Department's review of electoral law and procedures; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The five working groups which are looking at different aspects of the electoral process are expected to report their findings during the summer. When they have done so, representatives of the political parties, returning officers and the local authority associations will be invited to discuss the reports at a meeting in the autumn.

Escapes

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many recorded instances of escapes from Crown courts have occurred in each of the last 10 years.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from A. J. Butler to Mr. Alun Michael, dated June 1993:

The Home Secretary has asked me, in the absence of the Director General from the office, to reply to your recent Question asking how many recorded instances of escapes from Crown Courts have occurred in each of the last 10 years.

The information requested is available centrally only for prisoners who have escaped from Crown Courts since 20 June 1988. The number of Crown Court escapes since that date is set out in the table below:

	Incidents	Prisoners
[1]1988	9	9
1989	9	11
1990	8	11
1991	10	12
1992	10	10

[1](from 20 June 1988).

Foreign Prisoners

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the number of foreign nationals serving prison sentences in the United Kingdom who have been transferred to their country of origin to serve the remainder of their prison sentences in each of the last three years.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply.

Letter from A. J. Butler to Mr. Tom Cox, dated June 1993:

The Home Secretary has asked me, in the absence of the Director General from the office, to reply to your Question about the transfer of prisoners of foreign nationality to their country of origin.

The number of foreign nationals transferred from the United Kingdom to their country of origin there to serve the remainder of their sentence is as follows:

1990	1991	1992
13	18	17

Mr. Maurice Bland

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department for what reasons certain privileges have been withdrawn from prisoner Mr. Maurice Bland.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Mr. Bland has been at Rudgate prison since his transfer from Lindholme prison on 21 April 1993. No privileges have been withdrawn from him.

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) when he expects to implement the recommendation of December 1992 that Mr. Maurice Bland be transferred from HMP Rudgate to an open prison; and what is the reason for the delay;

(2) when he will implement to recommendations of the Parole Board in respect of Mr. Maurice Bland.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The Parole Board recommendation that Mr. Bland should be transferred to an open prison was implemented on 12 March 1993 when he was transferred to HMP Rudgate. The board also recommended that a further review of the case should be carried out after 12 months and that home leave should commence as soon as possible after transfer. Mr. Bland has been informed that an internal review of his case will be held in April 1994, and that he will be able to take short home leave six months after arrival at Rudgate.

Greyhound Racing

Mr. Page: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has completed his consultative discussions on the deregulation of the greyhound totalisator and on section 19 of the Betting and Gaming and Lotteries Act 1963; and when he expects to announce the results.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The proposals for changes to the statutory controls on greyhound racing are under active consideration in consultation with the industry and local authorities. We hope to report our conclusions by early summer.

Violent Crime

Mr. Callaghan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps he plans to take to curb the increase in crimes of violence and sexual attacks.

Mr. Maclean: The Government are committed to tackling all crime, including that part of it—5 per cent. of all recorded crime—which is violent or sexual, across a broad front. With Government support and with the support of the whole community, the police will continue to give a high priority to the prevention and detection of crimes involving sex or violence, where there is already a high clear-up rate, and to encourage victims, not least victims of racial or domestic violence, to report offences.

We will also keep under constant review the penalties available to the courts. For the worst sorts of crime, including homicide, rape, robbery and the most serious wounding, life imprisonment is already available. The Government believe that violent and sexual offending should be severely punished. That is why the Criminal Justice Act 1991 provides courts with powers to impose a longer sentence than would be justified by the seriousness of the offence alone upon a violent or sexual offender if such a sentence is necessary to protect the public from further harm. We will not hesitate to take further measures, if we are convinced that they are necessary.

Shotgun Thefts

Mr. Colin Shepherd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many thefts of shotguns were reported for each of the last three years for which figures are available.

Mr. Maclean: The number of offences of burglary and theft in which shotguns were reported to have been stolen for the last three years can be found in table 3.11 of Criminal Statistics, England and Wales 1991. Copies of this publication are in the Library.

Airport Detention Centres

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department which private firms hold contracts for providing security at the detention centres at (a) Heathrow, (b) Gatwick and (c) Stansted.

Mr. Charles Wardle: Custodial services at the immigration detention centres at Heathrow, Gatwick and Stansted are provided under contract by Group 4 Total Security Ltd.

Race Relations

Mr. Boateng: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people are employed under the current provisions for funding under section 11 of the Local Government Act 1966; and what research has been carried out into the future level of activities so funded.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Information is not kept in the form requested in the first part of the question. However, currently 10,066·5 full-time equivalent posts are approved for section 11 funding. The grant is intended to support the cost of employing staff to provide services additional to those provided by local authorities and others. The assessment of need is in the first instance a matter for local authorities and other bodies eligible for grant, in the light of local circumstances.

Mr. Boateng: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what proposals he has to increase the funding available for grants under section 11 of the Local Government Act 1966 in the light of the proposed extension of the criteria for funding under the Act.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: We have no such plans at present. Within existing cash limits, extension of the scope of section 11 beyond members of ethnic minorities of new Commonwealth origin would enable local authorities and other grant recipients to re-prioritise their requirements for section 11 grant if they saw a need to do so.

Ex-prisoners

Mr. Callaghan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisoners were discharged from prison without permanent accommodation during the last year for which figures are available.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: This information has not routinely been collected in the past, but consideration is now being given to arrangements for its regular collection in the future. A sample undertaken in the National Prison Survey 1991 then indicated that 9 per cent. of prisoners near their release date said they would become owner-occupiers on release, 40 per cent. said they would go into rented accommodation, 30 per cent. said they would live with their parents or other adult relations, 10 per cent. said they would live in a hostel or other temporary accommodation and 6 per cent. said they would have nowhere to live.

Criminal Injuries Compensation Scheme

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to take account of views of organisations representing victims of crime in the forthcoming White Paper reviewing the criminal injuries compensation scheme; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Maclean: As my right hon. and learned Friend the member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke) has already announced on 23 November 1992, col 457, the Government have decided that the present criminal injuries compensation scheme should be replaced by a tariff based scheme in 1994. The intention is to offer a quicker, more straightforward, service to claimants. Details of the new scheme will be set out in a White Paper in the summer. The Criminal Injuries Compensation Board and the national charity, Victim Support, have already submitted papers on the matter; but their comments, and those which other interested organisations or individuals may wish to make, will also be welcome after the White Paper is published.

Prison Officers (Assaults)

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what measures he is taking to combat a further rise in assaults on prison officers.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from A. J. Butler to Mr. Doug Hoyle, dated June 1993:

The Home Secretary has asked me, in the absence of the Director General from the office, to reply to your recent Question about measures to combat a further rise in assaults on prison officers.

The increase in assaults on staff is of great concern to the Prison Service. Indeed, one of our key performance indicators is the number of assaults on staff and others. Initiatives to combat the increase include: the analysis of incidents to identify factors leading to assaults; the introduction of a new intelligence-handling system; the creation of smaller, more manageable living units by sub-dividing wings; and the development of skills in stress management and anger control.

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prison officers were assaulted in each of the last five years; and if he will give details of those assaults.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General, who has been asked to arrange for a reply.

Letter from A. J. Butler to Mr. Doug Hoyle, dated June 1993:

ASSAULTS ON PRISON OFFICERS

The Home Secretary has asked me, in the absence of the Director General from the office, to write to you directly in reply to your Parliamentary Question about the number of assaults on prison officers in each of the last five years.

The available information is for the number of assaults, committed at Prison Service establishments in England and Wales, which were punished under the prison discipline system. Data are not available prior to April 1989 as assaults on prison officers, staff and others were grouped together in a single category "Gross Personal Violence". Between April and December 1989, 1,260 assaults on prison officers were recorded. Comparable figures for 1990 and 1991 show 1,850 and 2,026 assaults respectively. Provisional figures for 1992 show 2,344 assaults against prison officers.

Information for 1989, 1990 and 1991 was taken from the corresponding editions of "Statistics of Offences Against Prison Discipline and Punishments, England and Wales" (Cm 1236, 1651 and 2066, Tables 10, 12 and 14 of 1989 edition and Tables 9, 10 and 11 of the 1990 and 1991 editions) copies of which are held in the Library. These show the establishments at which the assaults took place. No other details of the assaults are recorded centrally.

Drugs

Mr. Callaghan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what measures police forces are taking in conjunction with local education authorities to warn pupils of the dangers of drug taking.

Mr. Maclean: All police forces in England and Wales have police/schools liaison programmes formed in partnership with local education authorities, where police officers visit school pupils with the aim of fostering young people's awareness of their rights and responsibilities as citizens. Discussion about the dangers of drugs is a common topic with older pupils.

The police are also involved with many drugs prevention schemes initiated by other agencies, particularly those supported by the Home Office drugs prevention initiative teams. Examples of the police contribution there include: anti-drugs poster campaigns, the distribution of a free "phone card" with the numbers of drugs helpline services, and co-operation with the entertainment industry to prevent drug-misuse at rave venues.

Firearms

Mr. Colin Shepherd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is his estimate of the number of shotguns and the number of other firearms licensed in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Charles Wardle: Estimates of the number of shotguns and of other firearms licensed can be found in paragraphs 4 and 9 of Home Office statistical bulletin "Firearms Certificates Statistics, England and Wales 1991". Copies of this publication can be found in the Library.

Police: Public Ratio

Mr. Callaghan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the proportion of police to public in the north-west region; and what is the comparative figure for the rest of England and Wales.

Mr. Charles Wardle: In the north-west inspectorial region, which consists of the Cumbria, Cheshire, Greater Manchester, Lancashire, Merseyside and North Wales police forces, there is an average of one officer to 386 people. The comparable figure for the rest of England and Wales is 1:404.

Sheehy Report

Mr. McFall: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department on what date he expects the Sheehy report to be published.

Mr. Charles Wardle: My right hon. and learned Friend has agreed to extend the timetable for publication of the report to the end of June 1993.

Victim Support

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what response he has given to the report from the organisation Victim Support on aid for victims, a copy of which has been sent to him; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Maclean: My hon. Friend the Member for Fylde (Mr. Jack) wrote to Victim Support on 31 March in response to its paper "Band Aid for Victims?", commenting on a number of the specific points which it had raised and promising that its views would be borne in mind as we prepared the White Paper which will set out our more detailed plans for the new tariff scheme to replace the present criminal injuries compensation scheme next year. The intention is to publish the White Paper in the summer.

Prison Contracts

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prison service governors and Home Office civil servants have switched to private companies involved in bids for prison contracts in the last three years; and if he will give details.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: It is not possible to give precise information about the numbers of former Prison Service governors and Home Office civil servants who may have taken up employment with private companies involved in bids for prison contracts in the last three years, since staff below grade 3 who wish to take up outside employment are required to seek approval to do so for a period of only two years after leaving Crown employment and in certain specified circumstances. Six former members of the Home Office have sought and obtained approval under these procedures to take up employment with private companies which have been involved in bids for prison contracts. All were governor grades; three were governing establishments; one was a head of custody in an establishment; one was in the inspectorate of prisons; and one in the remands contracts unit. In addition, a former police superintendent on secondment to the remands contracts unit was given approval to take up employment with such a company.

Devon and Cornwall Police

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many police officers were employed by the Devon and Cornwall police authority as at 31 December 1992.

Mr. Charles Wardle: At the end of December 1992 there were 2,920 police officers in the Devon and Cornwall constabulary.

Security Firms

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will bring forward proposals to require security firms to notify his Department of (a) directors and (b) employees who are convicted criminals.

Mr. Maclean: We have no plans to do so. The Government's policy is to encourage the self-regulation of the security industry.

Crime Support Organisations

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list all those organisations funded by him which give support and assistance to (a) victims of crime and (b) their families; and in each case state what funding from Government they have received in each of the last three financial years.

Mr. Maclean: The Home Office pays grant to the national charity Victim Support and helps to fund the criminal injuries compensation scheme. The Scottish Office separately funds Victim Support Scotland and contributes to Government funding of the Criminal Injuries Compensation Board. Victim Support provides emotional help and practical support to victims of crime and their families through a network of some 400 local schemes and branches. CICB awards compensation to victims of crime and, where the victim has died as a result of criminal injury, to dependants of the victim.

Home Office funding in the last three financial years was as follows:

	1990-91	1991-92	1992-93
Victim Support	4·7	5·7	7·3
CICB[1]	119·6	156·7	166·7

[1] Includes the contribution from the Scottish Office.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

CSCE

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on progress made to date in (a) the conflict prevention centre and consultative committee, (b) the office for democratic institutions and human rights, (c) the commission on national minorities, (d) the forum for security co-operation, (e) the Vienna group and (f) the parliamentary assembly of the Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The 1990 Paris charter set up the conflict prevention centre and consultative committee, the Office for Democratic Institutions and Human Rights and the parliamentary assembly, as part of the CSCE's efforts to promote security, democracy and respect for human rights in Europe. These institutions are adapting well to the new demands placed on them and are supported now by the Forum for Security Co-operation and the High Commissioner on National Minorities agreed at Helsinki in July 1992. The Council of Ministers at Stockholm in December 1992 provided for more effective decision making in the CSCE by establishing the Vienna group of the committee of senior officials. It also appointed a Secretary General and laid the foundation for a single organisational structure for the CSCE in Vienna. The institutions are lightly staffed but are contributing to the CSCE's varied activities notably in the resolution of disputes and preventive diplomacy.

Royal Family

Mr. Canavan: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what has been the total expenditure by his Department over the past 10 years on items connected with members of the royal family; and what is the itemised breakdown of such expenditure.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: The cost to the Department of royal visits overseas at the request of Government Departments during the last 10 years was £4,241,700, broken down as follows:

1983-84	409,800
1984-85	316,100
1985-86	388,200
1986-87	382,500
1987-88	386,600
1988-89	396,400
1989-90	424,000
1990-91	464,000
1991-92	620,800
[1]1992-93	453,300

[1] Bills presented to date.

Mr. Canavan: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the practice of his Department regarding financial assistance for members of the royal family to purchase items of clothing for overseas visits.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: The Department provides financial assistance to members of the royal family to cover expenses necessarily incurred in the performance of official duties overseas; this includes a contribution to clothing expenses.

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to his answer of 21 May, Official Report, column 350, which visits and of what duration were made at Government Department's request during the financial year 1992-93 by (a) the Queen and the Duke of Edinburgh, (b) the Prince and Princess of Wales and (c) other members of the royal family; and who made each of the visits by other members of the royal family.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: Overseas visits were made by the following members of the royal family at Government Department's request during the financial year 1992-93:

(a) The Queen and the Duke of Edinburgh:
12 May—France
27-31 May—Malta
13-14 July—USA
9-12 June—France
19-23 October—Germany
11-20 March—Dominica, Montserrat, Anguilla, British Virgin Islands, Turks and Caicos Islands

(b) The Prince and the Princess of Wales:
10-15 May—Egypt
2-5 November—Korea
5-7 November—Hong Kong
13-15 November—France
17-19 November—France
12-14 February—USA
14-18 February—Mexico
2-6 March—Nepal

(c) Other members of the Royal Family:
Prince Edward:
2-18 October—British Indian Ocean Territory, Brunei, Western Samoa

The Princess Royal:
11-19 May—Finland, Sweden, Norway
10-15 September—India

Princess Margaret:
23-25 June—Netherlands

Duke and Duchess of Gloucester:
12-13 October—Belgium

Duke of Kent:
14-23 May—Japan
30 June-1 July—Italy
9-10 November—Germany

Princess Alexandra:
22-25 April—USA
30 October-7 November—Trinidad and Tobago, Grenada

Overseas Visits (Clothing)

Mr. Canavan: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he will list by name and status all individuals who have received financial assistance from his Department over the past 10 years to purchase items of clothing for overseas visits; and what was the amount of each of such payments.

Mr. Goodlad: In the diplomatic wing, the payments derive from an officer's entitlement to a climatic clothing allowance when he or she is posted to a country where the climate is different from that in the United Kingdom. The allowance for a single officer is £468, with an additional £42 for "cold" countries, irrespective of the officer's grade. The figures for married officers are £712 and £309. Officers posted in the United Kingdom who go to such countries on an official visit may receive an accountable advance of this allowance. The rates are for visits of two months or less £187 plus "cold" supplement of £17; and for visits of more than two months £280 plus "cold" supplement of £26. In the aid wing, permanent staff making short visits are entitled to £295 in a three-year period, and contract officers up to £220. For travel over 16 weeks or for an overseas posting, there is an additional entitlement to £215 for single and £310 for married officers. Details of individual advances over the past 10 years are not readily available and could be provided only at disproportionate effort and cost.

Iraq

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations the Government will now undertake to the United Nations in relation to repeated violations of United Nations resolutions by the Iraqi Government; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Iraq continues flagrantly to defy the United Nation's authority across the board, including the mandatory requirements of UN Security Council Resolution (UNSCR) 687, which established the ceasefire and UNSCR 688, which condemns the repression of the Iraqi civilian population in many parts of Iraq.

We raise Iraqi violations of UNSCRS at the United Nations on every suitable occasion. At the 13th review of economic sanctions by the Security Council on 24 May, the United Kingdom Permanent Representative to the United Nations, Sir David Hannay, listed areas of Iraq's non-compliance with the relevant UNSCRs. The Security Council concluded once more that there were no grounds for the lifting or the easing of sanctions against Iraq. We will continue to insist that sanctions should not be lifted until Iraq complies fully with all the relevant UNSCRs.

Mr. Corbett: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps he proposes to take in the UN Security Council following the attack by Iranian fighter jets on the territory of Iraq on 25 May.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We have expressed our serious concern to the Iranian authorities at Iran's air-raids inside Iraq. The UN Security Council is permanently seized of this issue as part of the process of implementing Security Council Resolution 598 which laid down the terms of the ceasefire at the end of the Iran/Iraq war in 1988.

Departmental Buildings

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the buildings currently owned or rented by his Department and the Overseas Development Administration, together with (a) the estimated value, (b) the annual rent and (c) the annual maintenance cost of each building in the current financial year.

Mr. Goodlad: The information requested in respect of individual buildings is not readily available and could be provided only at disproportionate cost. Provisions contained within the FCO Supply Estimate for 1993-94 are as follows:

	Rentals £ million	Maintenance £ million
FCO
Home	(a) 35·9	(b) 7·3
Overseas	47·5	19·9
ODA
Home	9·3	1·4
Overseas	Apart from one building all ODA accommodation included in Diplomatic Wing baseline

Notes:
(a) Paid to Property Holdings for occupation of buildings on both common user and departmental estates.
(b) Includes the works charge paid to Property Holdings for its maintenance responsibilities for the common user estate.

Iran

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what action the Government will take following the air raid on 25 May by Iranian jets against two bases in Iraq of the People's Mojahedin Organisation of Iran; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We have expressed our serious concern to the Iranian authorities at the air raids carried out by Iran inside Iraq, as we have also done on previous similar occasions.

Kashmir

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how he intends to raise the issue of human rights violations in Kashmir during the course of the forthcoming Commonwealth conference; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: The agenda for the Commonwealth Heads of Government conference to be held in Cyprus in October is still under discussion. We have frequently raised the issue of human rights in Kashmir with the Indian Government and will continue to use appropriate opportunities to do so.

Relocation and Amalgamations

Mr. Robert Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the sections and organisations within his Department for which there are plans for relocation or amalgamation.

Mr. Goodlad: The diplomatic wing plans to relocate a small number of posts in 1993 and 1994. Otherwise, there are no plans to relocate or amalgamate sections and organisations of the Foreign and Commonwealth Office.

Gibraltar

Mr. Rogers: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many applications for exemption under section 12(2) of the Immigration Control Ordinance (Gibraltar) the Governor of Gibraltar has received for each year since 1988; how many of these have been received from (a) EC nationals, (b) Moroccan and (c) Indian nationals over the same period; and how many applications have been rejected by nationality.

Mr. Garel-Jones: A total of 102 applications were received for exemption under section 12(2) of Gibraltar's Immigration Control Ordinance since 1988 to date broken down by year and nationality of applicant as follows:

Year	Total	EC	Moroccan	Indian	Others
1988	23	12	8	2	1
1989	24	13	7	1	3
1990	16	8	7	1	0
1991	13	5	6	2	0
1992	25	5	10	3	7
1993	1	1	—	—	—

The total number of refusals was 48 broken down by nationality of applicant as follows:

	Number
EC nationals	12
Moroccan nationals	28
Indian nationals	5
Others	3

Mr. Christopher Ian Scott

Mr. Terry Davis: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what action was taken by Her Majesty's Government to arrange for the extradition of Mr. Christopher Ian Scott from Spain between March 1992 and December 1992 on the basis of the warrant for his extradition issue by West Midlands police on 8 March 1990.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: The British embassy in Madrid has remained in touch with the Spanish Government about Mr. Scott's extradition to the United Kingdom. The case is complicated by a charge in Spain outstanding against Mr. Scott for which he remains remanded in custody there. His extradition to the United Kingdom will take place only once the outstanding charge has been resolved, in accordance with article 19 of the European convention on extradition.

Non-proliferation Treaty Conference

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will place in the Library texts of all the submissions made by representatives of Her Majesty's Government to, and all of the official documents of, the 1995 NPT conference preparatory committee meeting held in New York in May.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: A copy of the statement delivered by the head of the United Kingdom delegation and copies of the official documents tabled at the preparatory committee meeting have been deposited in the Library of the House.

Cyprus

Mr. Fry: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made to the Greek Government regarding the number of settlers from mainland Greece who have emigrated to southern Cyprus.

Mr. Garel-Jones: Questions of settlement and property rights for both communities in Cyprus are intrinsic to the United Nations "Set of Ideas", endorsed by the Security Council as the basis of a settlement. We have urged acceptance of the "Set of Ideas" on both sides, including when my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs met Cypriot Foreign Minister Mr. Michaelides on 12 May.

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many non-Cypriots have been permitted by the Greek-Cypriot authorities to settle in southern Cyprus since 1963; and what is the estimated total population of southern Cyprus.

Mr. Garel-Jones: According to figures given by the Republic of Cyprus, the population of the area in question was estimated at 575,000, of whom 10,529 were resident aliens. We have no figures for immigration since 1963.

Mr. Maginnis: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made to the Greek-Cypriot authorities regarding Turkish-Cypriot men, women and children who went missing in 1963, 1967 and 1974.

Mr. Garel-Jones: We support the efforts of the United Nations intercommunal committee on missing persons; but its efforts depend on full co-operation from both sides.

Mr. Callaghan: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what plans he has to make an official visit to Cyprus; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Garel-Jones: Our aim is to give effective support to the continuing inter-communal negotiations on Cyprus under United Nations auspices. This year my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs has continued to have frequent meetings with Cypriot Ministers, and other parties to the dispute, in London and elsewhere. The timing of any possible visit to Cyprus must be carefully considered in that light.

Mr. Maginnis: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many Greek and Greek-Cypriot troops he estimates are under arms in Cyprus.

Mr. Garel-Jones: According to official figures of the Republic of Cyprus, the strength of the Greek Cypriot national guard is 10,000. In addition there is a regiment of 950 men of the Greek Army, plus 1,100 secondees from the Greek army to the Greek Cypriot national guard.

Mr. Fry: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many people are estimated to have been killed in Cyprus in connection with the political situation (a) between independence and 1974 and (b) 1975 and the present date.

Mr. Garel-Jones: No definitive figures are available. The United Nations committee on missing persons is attempting to trace and account for those reported missing in the earlier period.

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he will make representations to the Greek Cypriot régime regarding Turkish-Cypriot homes and farms occupied by Greek-Cypriots in southern Cyprus.

Mr. Garel-Jones: Questions of settlement and property rights for both communities in Cyprus are intrinsic to the United Nations "Set of Ideas", endorsed by the Security Council as the basis of a settlement. We have urged acceptance of the "Set of Ideas" on both sides, including when my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs met Cypriot Foreign Minister Mr. Michaelides on 12 May.

Mr. Alexander: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many British tourists visited the Turkish Republic of Northern Cyprus in each of the last three years.

Mr. Garel-Jones: The following are our estimated figures for British tourists visiting the north of Cyprus in the last three years:

	Number
1990	40,000
1991	30,000
1992	40,000

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what proportion of his time the British High Commissioner in Cyprus spends in the north of the island.

Mr. Garel-Jones: We do not recognise the "Turkish Republic of Northern Cyprus" or its "government". As a consequence, the High Commissioner himself spends considerably less of his time in the north of the island. However, we take care to keep in close touch with the Turkish Cypriot community at all levels, including through him; and members of his staff have regular and frequent dealings with the Turkish Cypriots.

China

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations Her Majesty's Government have made to the Government of the People's Republic of China on the deaths of Bishop Liu Difen and Liu Mangping.

Mr. Goodlad: We are disturbed about reports of the deaths of the two bishops mentioned and are seeking to establish the facts. We regularly raise human rights, including the persecution of religious believers, with the Chinese authorities.

Hong Kong

Mr. Callaghan: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he next intends to visit Hong Kong; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Goodlad: I visited Hong Kong from 29 May to 1 June. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs has no plans at present to visit Hong Kong.

Blackpool Football Club

Mr. Elletson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made to the Spanish Government about the arrest and detention in Majorca of Trevor Sinclair of Blackpool football club; whether he will protest to the Spanish Government about the mistreatment by the Majorcan police of other members of the Blackpool team; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: Mr. Sinclair was arrested on 18 May for damaging property. After his release the next day he made no complaint to Her Majesty's consul about his treatment by the Spanish authorities. We received no complaints from other members of the Blackpool football team. If they have any to make I shall be glad to look into the matter.

Drug Abuse

Mr. Callaghan: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of the adequacy of current United Nations policies to combat drug abuse; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: The United Nations with primary responsibility for action against drugs is the United Nations international drug control programme (UNDCP). Since its formation in 1991, the UNDCP has developed a wide range of programmes to deal with all aspects of drugs including cultivation, processing, trafficking and consumption. The United Kingdom is one of the major donors. It is too soon to make a firm assessment of UNDCP. But the programme is expanding its activities steadily and establishing itself as the co-ordinating agency with the United Nations system.

Bosnia

Lady Olga Maitland: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps the Government are taking to ensure the closure of all roads leading into Bosnia from the former Yugoslavia.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: President Milosevic's undertaking to close the border between Serbia/Montenegro and Bosnia to all non-humanitarian supplies has resulted in a significant reduction of cross-border traffic, but some movement of goods continues. Talks are taking place in the United Nations on a draft Security Council resolution to deploy international border monitors. President Milosevic at present refuses to accept the presence of such monitors. The international community is intensifying pressure on him to change this position.

Tibet

Mr. Callaghan: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made to the Government of the People's Republic of China about events in Tibet; and what response he has received.

Mr. Goodlad: We are deeply concerned by the recent reports of arrests and disturbances in Tibet. EC ambassadors, who visited Tibet on 17-23 May, raised the reported arrests with the authorities there and urged that those detained be released. On 1 June the presidency issued, on behalf of the Community and member states, a public statement reiterating concern about the recent events and the general human rights situation in Tibet and calling for dialogue without preconditions between the Chinese authorities and the representatives of the Tibetans including the Dalai Lama.

Middle East

Mr. Callaghan: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the peace process in the Palestine/Israeli dispute.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The ninth round of bilateral negotiations between Israel and the Arab parties took place in Washington from 27 April to 13 May. There are welcome indications that all parties engaged in serious discussion of substantive matters. We hope that talks will resume soon and build on what has been achieved.

EC Council of Ministers

Mr. Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will publish a statement of forthcoming business in the European Community's Council of Ministers.

Mr. Garel-Jones: The following meetings are planned:

A formal meeting of the Labour and Social Affairs Council is planned for Tuesday 1 June. The agenda has not yet been finalised, but the directives on working time, fishing vessels, Protection of Young Workers and European Works Councils are likely to be discussed. Further possible agenda items include the recommendation on access to training and the resolution on flexible retirement. There may also be a discussion of a Commission initiative on employment.

The Trevi Meeting/Meetings of Ministers for Immigration will take place on 1–2 June and will discuss the report to the European Council on free movement of people. Ministers will also discuss various immigration and asylum matters as well as "EUROPOL".

The Economic and Finance Council will meet on 7 June to discuss action to promote economic recovery in Europe consistent with the conclusions of the Edinburgh European Council. Discussion will also take place on the United Kingdom convergence programme; the inter-institutional agreement on budget discipline; matters relating to Community action to combat fraud against the Community Budget; and carbon/energy tax. The Council may consider the directive concerning the Commission's proposals for an EC cross-boarder interest and royalty payments; Euratom loans for nuclear power stations in the former Soviet union; EIB lending to Albania; and the proposal for a council directive on deposit guarantee schemes. The proposal to amend the 7th VAT Directive (Special VAT regime for second-hand goods, works of art, antique and collectors' items) may be discussed at this meeitng.

The Transport Council on 7/8 June will discuss a full and wide ranging agenda. Ministers will be keen to reach agreement on the Transport Infrastructure Regulation after the European Parliament invoked the "conciliation procedure". They will also wish to make further progress on the complex negotiations on Road Haulage Cabotage and Road Transport Taxation.

Other issues will include: 'aviation external relations'; 'computer reservation systems'; the 'white paper on common transport policy'; 'relations with Switzerland'; 'Trans-European Networks—Combined Transport/Road/Inland waterways'; 'transport to and from Greece—prompted by the troubles in the former Yugoslavia'; and 'maritime safety'.

In addition they may discuss the Commission proposals on 'classification societies' and 'minimum levels of education for the maritime professions'.

Under other business the Commission will be presenting statements on: 'road safety'; 'technical harmonisation of Community railways'; the 'promotion of combined transport'; and 'state aid for civil aviation'. Finally the German delegation will be making a statement on the 'application of competition to maritime transport' and the UK delegation on the 'application of Regulation 4055/86."

The Foreign Affairs Council will meet on 8 June and will discuss Relations with the European Parliament, Preparation of the proposed Inter-Institutional meeting and Second Commission Communication on access to Information. Ministers will also discuss Structural Funds and Enlargement Negotiations; Preparation for four Ministerial meetings. Relations with Central and Eastern Europe, Relations with Russia and the Ex-Yugoslavia will also be discussed. Trade Policy Questions, EC/Korea Relations: Commission Communication and Preparation of European Council on 21-22 June are also scheduled for discussion.

The Education Council will be meeting on 11 June. Ministers will discuss Educational Initiatives involving young people in working and social life, guidelines for Community action in the field of education and training and about furthering an open European Space in Higher Education. Also down for discussion are the Draft Resolution of the Council on Vocational Education and Training in the 1990's, the long term possibilities for reform of the European Schools and responses to the HE and Vocational Training Memoranda. Finally Ministers will also discuss the Working Group on HE Quality Assessment, Development of Pilot EC/US cooperation in HE and the proposed European Week for Scientific Culture.

The Internal Market Council will meet on 14 June. No Agenda has yet been set for this meeting.

The Agriculture Council will meet on 14-15 June. Ministers will discuss the agricultural aspects of the GATT negotiations. They may also discuss the 1993-94 price-fixing proposals; milk quotas (SLOM III); Review of the potato regime; sugar; set-aside; Spanish, Italian and Greek milk quotas; plant breeders' rights and minced meat.

The Telecommunications Council will meet on 16 June to discuss HDTV, Telecommunications Liberalisation, Postal Services Green Paper and the Satellite Earth Station Equipment Directive.

The Fisheries Council will meet on 24 June. Ministers may discuss the proposed control and enforcement regulation; EC Fisheries Agreement with Argentina; review of the accession arrangements applicable to Spain and Portugal; proposed harmonised technical conservation measures in the Mediterranean and the possible Commission negotiating mandate with the Russian Federation.

The Energy Council will meet on 25 June. Ministers will discuss the harmonisation of hydrocarbons licensing regimes, liberalisation of natural gas and electricity markets, coal state aids, nuclear safety and energy supply in Eastern Europe and the Former Soviet Union, and the European Energy Charter. Ministers are expected to adopt the SAVE directive on energy efficiency and the Altener decision on new and renewable energy sources.

The Environment Council will meet on 28-29 June. The Council may reach agreement on the directives on hazardous waste incineration, volatile organic compounds (Stage 1), emissions from motor vehicles and the decision on ratification of the Biodiversity Convention. Progress reports may be presented on revisions to the CITES Regulation, follow up to UNCED and proposals for a Carbon/Energy Tax. Discussions may also cover revisions to the Birds Directive, CO_2 emissions from cars and, possibly, implementation of the Montreal Protocol as regards sCFCs and methyl bromide.

Market Testing

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the cost to date and the expected future cost of his Department's market-testing programme; how many staff are engaged full-time in work relating to market testing; which firms of consultants have been used in connection with the market-testing programme; and how they were selected.

Mr. Goodlad: The consultancy costs and the direct staff costs of the Foreign and Commonwealth Office diplomatic wing's market-testing programme up to 31 March 1993 totalled £260,000. The cost for the aid wing was £290,000. In neither case is it possible to estimate the future cost.

Since November 1991, market testing has accounted for a significant proportion of the time of some 35 diplomatic wing, and 14 aid wing staff. The diplomatic wing has employed Coopers and Lybrand Deloitte and Capita Management Consultants on work relating to market testing. The aid wing has employed Coopers and Lybrand Deloitte, KPMG and CSL (Group) Ltd. In all cases, the consutants were originally selected by competitive tender.

Drug Imports

Mr. Callaghan: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the involvement of his Department in the effort to reduce illegal imports of drugs.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: One of the Foreign and Commonwealth Office's objectives is the promotion of effective international co-operation against drugs, particularly in the context of the 1988 United Nations drugs convention. The FCO department concerned plays an active part in international meetings on drugs, and is engaged in a range of activity to develop bilateral co-operation to reduce drug production and trafficking.

China

Mr. Callaghan: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on relations between the United Kingdom and the People's Republic of China.

Mr. Goodlad: We share with China the joint objective of maintaining the stability and prosperity of Hong Kong. We are also seeking to improve relations across a broad front. As fellow members of the Security Council, we maintain a dialogue on international issues. We would like by increasing our trade to participate in the rapid growth of the Chinese economy. We regularly raise a number of other matters including human rights and Tibet with the Chinese Government.

Nuclear Testing

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to the answer to the hon. Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn) of 15 February, Official Report, column 33, if he will place in the Library copies of correspondence arising from the letter from the British embassy in Washington to Senators Hatfield, Exon and Mitchell in August 1992.

Mr. Garel-Jones: The British embassy in Washington received one letter from Senator Hatfield in reply to the letter sent to Senators Hatfield, Exon and Mitchell in August 1992. A decision to make this reply public would have to be for the sender of the letter.

Belize

Mr. Wareing: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what changes he proposes in respect of policy towards Belize following recent developments in Guatemala; and if he will make a statement on policy towards Guatemala.

Mr. Garel-Jones: Our policy towards Belize remains unchanged. As regards the British garrison in Belize, I refer the hon. Gentleman to the answer I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Bosworth (Mr. Tredinnick) on 13 May at column 561. We are following closely current developments in Guatemala. As we and our European partners made clear in an EC statement on 27 May, we view the current situation in Guatemala with concern, and call for an early return to the democratic process.

Mr. Wareing: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what plans he has to visit Belize to discuss recent political changes in neighbouring Guatemala with the Prime Minister of Belize.

Mr. Garel-Jones: Neither my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs nor I have any plans to visit Belize at present. Our High Commissioner in Belmopan is, of course, in close touch with the Belize authorities, and we look forward to seeing the Belizean Prime Minister in London shortly.

Guatemala

Mr. Wareing: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what plans he has to meet the ambassador of Guatemala to discuss recent developments in his country.

Mr. Garel-Jones: Neither my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs nor I have any plans to meet the Guatemalan ambassador.

El Salvador

Mr. Wareing: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on Her Majesty's Government's relations with El Salvador in the light of recent developments in that country.

Mr. Garel-Jones [holding answer 27 May 1993]: We maintain good relations with El Salvador. We continue to work with our EC partners and the United Nations to help bring the peace process there to a full and successful conclusion.

EMPLOYMENT

EC Social Affairs Council

Mr. Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement on the outcome of the EC Social Affairs Council held on 1 June.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and I attended the meeting of the Labour and Social Affairs Council on 1 June in Luxembourg.

A number of important issues were discussed. The main debate related to the draft working time directive on which the Council reached political agreement on a common position. We made clear the United Kingdom Government's continued objections to the directive, and our intention to challenge the legal base of the directive, when it is adopted, before the European Court of Justice, on the grounds that it represents a misuse of the health and safety provisions introduced by the Single European Act. In consequence, my right hon. Friend registered his intention to abstain on the directive.

Three major concessions were secured which would allow the United Kingdom to maintain flexibility and freedom of choice for employers and employees, namely:

—the right for individual workers to work more than 48 hours a week if they wish;

—that Sunday working should remain a matter for national law;

—provision to allow company and plant agreements to derogate from the main provisions of the directive.

Exemptions from the scope of the directive were made for work at sea and doctors in training, to add to those previously agreed.

There was further discussion of both the young workers directive and the European works councils directive. No significant progress was made. The United Kingdom reiterated its major objections to both measures on grounds of subsidiarity and substance, reflecting, in the case of the young workers directive, the views expressed by the Scrutiny Committees of both Houses.

A Commission paper on employment, following up the earlier resolution adopted under the United Kingdom presidency, was discussed. We stressed the importance of protecting the international competitiveness of EC businesses if we were to be able to tackle the high and rising levels of unemployment in the Community, and the threat to jobs posed by high non-wage costs and over-regulation. The Council agreed to conclusions stressing the need to tackle the problem of severe unemployment and to seek solutions to it, welcoming the Commission's initiative and pledging its commitment to intensifying efforts in this field.

Other substantive agenda items were settled as follows:

A Recommendation on Access to Training secured political agreement, with the United Kingdom's outstanding concerns met;

A Directive on Safety on Fishing Vessels secured political agreement on a common position. The United Kingdom indicated its intention to abstain;

A Resolution on Flexible Retirement was agreed.

Unemployed

Mr. Raynsford: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many people were registered as unemployed in the London borough of Greenwich at the last count; and what was the figure three years ago.

Miss Widdecombe [pursuant to the reply, 25 May 1993]: I apologise for the fact that the figure quoted in the original reply related to the parliamentary constituency of Greenwich rather than the London borough of Greenwich. The correct reply follows.

Unadjusted claimant unemployment in the London borough of Greenwich stood at 16,643 in April 1993, and 8,214 in April 1990.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what was the number of unemployed (a) men and (b) women in each of the London boroughs on 20 May.

Miss Widdecombe: The claimant unemployment figures relating to April 8, which were released on 20 May, can be obtained from the NOMIS database in the Library.

Mr. Patchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what was the level of unemployment for the Barnsley, East constituency on the latest available date.

Miss Widdecombe: In April 1993, on the unadjusted basis, there were 3,892 claimant unemployed people in the Barnsley, East constituency.

Sex Discrimination

Ms Mowlam: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many claims were made to tribunals under the Sex Discrimination Act 1975 for each year since 1979; how many separate employers were involved; how many of those claims were successful; and what was the average amount of compensation awarded in each year.

Miss Widdecombe: The details where available are as follows:

[1] provisional

(The information is in financial years for the years after 1983.)

I regret that details of the number of separate employers are not readily available and could only be obtained at disproportionate cost.

Job Vacancies

Mr. Callaghan: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if she will make a statement on the current level of job vacancies in England and Wales.

Miss Widdecombe: On the seasonally adjusted basis unfilled jobcentre vacancies in April 1993 stood at 92,600 in England and 9,300 in Wales, increases of 8·4 per cent. and 4·5 per cent respectively on April a year ago.

Jobcentre vacancies do not represent the total number of vacancies available in the economy.

Earnings

Mr. Alan W. Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what are the latest figures for the average weekly earnings of full-time (a) male and (b) female workers.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The information requested is published in part A of the 1992 New Earnings Survey, table 1.1. A copy is available in the Library.

Mr. Alan W. Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what are the latest figures for the average hourly earnings of part-time (a) male and (b) female workers.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The information requested is published in part A of the New Earnings Survey, table 20.2. A copy is available in the Library.

Job Seekers

Mr. Dowd: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment, further to her answer of 25 May, Official Report, column 520, if she will list the figures for the total number of people seeking work for each quarter since 1985.

Miss Widdecombe: The available quarterly figures for Great Britain have been published in table 1 of the Labour Force Survey Historical Supplement, a copy of which is available in the Library.

Skill Shortages

Mr. Callaghan: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment when she will next meet representatives of British chambers of commerce to discuss skill shortages.

Miss Widdecombe: At present neither my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State nor I have current plans to meet the Association of British Chambers of Commerce. The Department regularly monitors skill shortages which currently are at a low level.

Training

Mr. Callaghan: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what percentage of young people entering employment for the first time receive training from their employers.

Miss Widdecombe: The Youth Cohort Study of England and Wales showed that in the spring of 1992 66 per cent. of 16 and 17-year-olds and 83 per cent. of 17 and 18-year-olds in full-time employment received either on or off-the-job training from employers.

Workplace Accidents

Mr. Callaghan: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what additional measures she is considering to reduce accidents at the place of work; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Responsibility for maintaining and improving health and safety standards rests with employers and others concerned at the workplace. The Health and Safety Commission's priorities for promoting improvements in health and safety at work are set out in their plan of work for 1993-94 and beyond, which is expected to be published within the next few weeks.

Departmental Buildings

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if she will list the buildings currently owned or rented by her Department, together with (a) the estimated value, (b) the annual rent and (c) the annual maintenance cost of each building in the current financial year.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: There are nearly 2,000 buildings in the Employment Department Group estate. The information requested could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Youth Training

Mr. Patchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many young people have been waiting for eight weeks or more for a place on a youth training scheme in the Barnsley, East constituency; and what steps he is taking to ensure that a place is provided for them.

Miss Widdecombe: The information is not available in the form requested.

The records held by Barnsley Careers Service show that in April only six young people had been waiting for a youth training place for over eight weeks. Barnsley/ Doncaster training and enterprise council is continuing to ensure that the Government's guarantee to young people is met and is pursuing individual cases.

Learning for Work

Mr. Patchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment whether participants in the new learning for work scheme who are removed from the claimant count, remain passported for housing benefit, council tax benefit, income support and free school meals and health benefits if applicable; and if he will make a statement.

Miss Widdecombe: Yes.

Redundancy Payments

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment (1) what has been the cost of statutory redundancy payments in each year since 1987-88; and how many workers have received payments by region;

(2) what has been the cost of statutory redundancy payments in each year since 1987-88; and how many workers have received payments.

Miss Widdecombe: Primary responsibility for the payment of statutory redundancy payments lies with employers. Information is not available on the number or cost of payments made by employers.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State may make payment from the national insurance fund to employees whose employer becomes insolvent or is otherwise unable to pay. The number and cost of such payments for each available year is as follows:

	Number (thousands)	Expenditure (£ million)
1987-88	30	34·9
1988-89	25	32·4
1989-90	20	25·7
1990-91	42	67·6
1991-92	96	131·8

Information is not available by region.

New Horizons for Women

Mr. Jamieson: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what is the cost of his predecessor's New Horizons for Women campaign.

Miss Widdecombe: Expenditure on the "New Horizons for Women" campaign in 1992-93 was £176,000. The budget for 1993-94 is £300,000, of which £79,000 has been paid so far.

Service Industry

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what is the current definition of service industry used by his Department; and if he will make a statement.

Miss Widdecombe: Service industry covers the following divisions of the Standard Industrial Classification 1980:

Division 6: distribution, hotels and catering,
Division 7: transport and communication,
Division 8: banking, finance, insurance, business services and leasing,
Division 9: other services.

Maternity Leave

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what account was taken of the Government's obligations under the Innocenti declaration on breastfeeding in drawing up the Government's policy on the length of maternity leave in the Trade Union Reform and Employment Rights Bill.
